Collingwood for Murrow Wed., Feb. 1, 1956

Good evening:

President Eisenhower and British Prime Minister Eden concluded their Washington talks today by issuing two important statements. One was the formal communique on the results of the three-day conference, which was expected. The other, unexpected statement was a joint declaration on the challenge confronting the free world. This statement... or declaration... proclaimed the willingness of Britain and the United States to negotiate with Russia, in the hope of freeing mankind from "the pall of fear and insecurity which obscures what can... and should be... a glorious future." But it points out, bluntly, that in the past 10 years, Russia has gobbled up 10 independent European countries.... this in a time when some 600-million people have been granted nationhood by the West. Other points in the declaration are: The United States and Britain "shall never initiate violence." They will persevere in seeking a just and lasting peace, and universal disarmament effectively controlled. "We are determined," say the two leaders "to make the conquest of

Collingwood for Murrow Wed., Feb. 1, 1956

Good evening:

President Eisenhower and British Prime Minister Eden concluded their Washington talks today by issuing two important statements. One was the formal communique on the results of the three-day conference, which was expected. The other, unexpected statement was a joint declaration on the challenge confronting the free world. This statement... or declaration... proclaimed the willingness of Britain and the United States to negotiate with Russia, in the hope of freeing mankind from "the pall of fear and insecurity which obscures what can... and should be... a glorious future." But it points out, bluntly, that in the past 10 years, Russia has gobbled up 10 independent European countries.... this in a time when some 600-million people have been granted nationhood by the West. Other points in the declaration are: The United States and Britain "shall never initiate violence." They will persevere in seeking a just and lasting peace, and universal disarmament effectively controlled. "We are determined," say the two leaders "to make the conquest of the atom a pathway to peaceful progress, not a road to doom."

The other statement... the communique... deals with specifics. The United States and Great Britain, it says, are "firmly united" in their determination to prevent expansion by force or subversion in the Far East. It conceded that "some differences remain in our judgments as to the most effective means to achieve these purposes"... a reference possibly to the question of recognition of Red China and the relaxing of controls on trade with Red China. The West German government, it says, is the only government "entitled" to speak for the German people. And we shall continue our efforts "to bring about the reunification of Germany in freedom." Regarding the Israeli-Arab dispute, a settlement is "the most urgent need". This will be possible, the communique says, only when both sides "are willing to reconcile the positions which they have hitherto taken."

Ed Murrow is in Israel tonight, and we shall have a first-hand report from him in a few minutes.

President Eisenhower asked Congress today for an increase in postal rates, to take the Post Office Department out of the red. Under the President's proposal, the cost of mailing a regular first-class letter would be raised to four cents. An Air Mail letter would cost seven cents. The rates for advertising matter, newspapers and magazines would also be raised... bringing in, altogether, an additional 400-million dollars a year. Postmaster General Summerfield says the increases are necessary because of higher operating costs. He points out that with the passing of every minute, the postal service is going a thousand dollars deeper in debt.

The House approved a 1½-billion-dollar Navy shipbuilding program today by an overwhelming vote of 358 to 3. The measure... which now goes to the Senate... includes authorization for the world's first atom-powered surface ship, a light cruiser especially designed for launching guided missiles. It also calls for construction of six atomic-powered submarines and a start on an atomic-powered supercarrier, in addition to 15 other warships of the conventional type. The bill merely authorizes the construction program. The money to put it through must be provided later in an appropriations measure.

→

Democratic Senator Jackson, of Washington State, renewed his warning today that Russia may win the race to develop an intercontinental ballistic missile. In a Senate speech, Jackson proposed that our ballistic missile program be placed under a full-time civilian administrator, reporting directly to the Secretary of Defense and to the President. Defense Secretary Wilson told a news conference, later in the day, that he does plan to name a "czar" to supervise the long-range missile program... but that, so far, he hasn't found the "right man". On another subject, Wilson said it may be possible by June, 1957, to let a hundred thousand draftees leave military service after serving only 18 months. The normal service period is 24 months. Wilson emphasized that he is only "considering" doing this. And if these men are let out of service early, they will have to agree to stay in the ready reserve for at least two and a half years. And monthly draft calls might have to be doubled.

Congress heard testimony today that a new warning system must be developed against the intercontinental missile. Dr. A.G. Hill of M.I.T., who is one of the country's top civil defense experts, told a House committee that the present radar warning system... designed to detect enemy planes... will soon be out of date. For the supersonic missile, a new, supplementary warning screen will be required.

An encouraging note was sounded today by Secretary of the Army Brucker. Brucker told a National Press Club luncheon, in Washington, that the Army is continually adapting itself "to the requirements of warfare in the atomic age." The Army is large enough, he said, to assure a proper margin of safety in the cold war.

The National Council of Churches announced today that it is sending a delegation of eight Protestant leaders to Russia, to further "mutual understanding". It will be the first broadly representative Protestant group to visit Russia since the Bolshevik revolution. They will be there about ten days.

Moscow today demanded the release of those 14 Russian fishing boats seized by Norway for alleged violation of its territorial waters. Moscow denied that the boats had been "poaching" in Norwegian waters... but admitted that in bad weather it is possible to make a "mistake".

South Africa today gave all Soviet consular officials, and their families, one month to leave the country. The government of South Africa charged the Russians with spreading Communist propaganda among the natives and creating unrest. In the future, whatever state business South Africa has with Russia will be handled by ~~thmm~~ diplomatic representatives in London.

The United States won its first gold medal today in the winter olympics in Cortina, Italy. Hayes Allan Jenkins of Colorado Springs won the men's figure skating championship. Ronald Robertson of Long Beach, California, took second. And Jenkins' younger brother Dave finished third... a clean sweep of first, second and third place.

Now let's have that report from Ed Murrow... a description he recorded of life in an Israeli village, or ka-butz, in the Gaza Strip.... where, as he says, rifles are as much in evidence as pitchforks.

tape runs 5:08
ends on cue: "This is Ed Murrow recording from Nachaloz in the Gaza strip."

Tonight, Mr. Murrow is on his way to the region of the Dead Sea. We hope to have another report from him tomorrow. I'll be back in a moment with a Footnote to the Day's News. (pause) First, here is Bob Dixon.

FOOTNOTE

Secretary of the Army Brucker used some colorful language in describing Russian diplomacy today. In a speech at the National Press Club in Washington, Secretary Brucker said: " The Kremlin is the biggest of all grifters, operating a gigantic global shell game. The world is always being asked to guess under which shell will be found the pea which stands for peace." The tragedy, he went on, is that this is no petty pastime of an oversize carnival... The stakes are nothing less than the freedom of all free men.

THAT THIS IS C.C.... SEE YOU TOMORROW

CBS RADIO DIVISION

ED. R. MURROW

Wednesday, February 1, 1956
7:45 - 8:00 P.M.

COLLINGWOOD: ... Now let's have that report from Ed Murrow, a description he recorded of life in an Israeli village, or kabuts?, in the Gaza strip, where - as he says - rifles are as much in evidence as pitch forks.

MURROW: We came down here from Jerusalem, down the winding road through a desolate area of huge gray boulders, lying in brick red soil. Off to the right, the Wady Sheriah?, where Samson courted Delilah. On the left, the Arab village, of Abrugot. On the other side of the road, on top of the hill, a prosperous-looking rural village, founded by German-Jewish immigrants who came here to escape Hitler. On down through the rolling and sometimes ...? hills of Judea, there to the left is the place where David met Goliath. A little further on is the remnant of a road built by Hadrian. And, finally, down to the flat rich land, heavy with winter green, reaching the northern edge of the Negev Desert, a country that reminds you of Wisconsin in the early spring, huge fields, modern mechanical equipment. As dusk came gently down, men with rifles were walking towards the bridges, the night guard against infiltration and sabotage. About twelve miles from this kabuts, we picked up an escort of two jeeps, loaded with Israeli soldiers. We were approaching the Egyptian frontier. When we arrived at Naharas?, it was almost time to turn on the lights, the floodlights, that surround this community of fifty-five families, seven thousand chickens, fifty-five head of cattle, seven tractors, and other modern equipment. Outside the flood-lit area is barbed wire, slit? trenches and concrete bunkers. Watch towers about forty feet high command the entire perimeter. This kabuts covers about twenty-four hundred acres. The boundary between Israel and Egypt is only about five hundred yards from the main buildings which are surrounded by the barbed wire and the floodlights. And the watch towers are manned every night, each man spending two nights a week on guard duty. And some of the outposts are modern and complete, even to field telephones. The buildings are small, wood or concrete. Outside some of the wooden buildings, extra concrete walls - about eight inches thick - go up to the second floor windows, that's to prevent sniper fire. This is a young kabuts, only about two and a half years old. It is manned and worked by Israelis. Most of them young; all of themex-soldiers - and rifles as much in evidense as pitch forks. The feontier here lies in a lovely green rolling valley. It is marked only by a deep furrow, down the middle. These youngsters cultivate right down to the demarkation line. When they get near to the line, frequently one man drives the tractor while two others with rifles ride along ~~xx~~ just in case. Here inside the barbed wire two huge silos dominate the scene. There is mud ankle deep everywhere. You remove your knee boots before entering the house. Right now there are four relatively new babies squalling or yawning on a porch in the winter sunshine. This kabuts is completely self-contained, has its own power and water, its own defense force.

There was quite a chess tournament here last night. The chess champion of Israel was here, played twenty-five simultaneous games and lost five of them.

The trees are beginning to grow. Some of them are a good fifteen feet tall. The food is adequate but plain. The milk, produced by the Holstein herd, is excellent. The clothing worn is nondescript, including a number of army cast-offs, and rubber boots at this time of year are required wearing for men and women. They sing in the cow sheds and in the showers in the evening, and I'm assured this is not an act put on for a visiting fireman.

In this kabuts I have ~~xxx~~ heard the word "we" more often than in any other community of comparable size. They will tell you that "we have brought in an oil well, not far from here," that "we are developing a long staple cotton of excellent qua_lity," they deplore the fact that in the limited area that they're able to irrigate they must bring the pipes inside the barbed wire at night. Most of the youngsters here came out from the cities. They can leave if theywant to. They get no pay. But their clothing and their basic needs are provided. The farm belongs to no one, but to all of them. One youngster told me last night that he went to Europe last summer to study cattle breeding. I asked him who sent him, and he said "the farm of course, who else?" This isn't free enterprise but it is enterprising. A curious combination of defense and agricultural production.

This is Ed Murrow recording from Naharas, in the Gaza strip.

COLLINGWOOD: We hope to have another report from Mr. Murrow tomorrow. I'll be back in a moment, with the footnote to today's news.

(30)

Ed. trans. P. O.

Collingwood for Murrow Thurs., Feb. 2, 1956

Good evening:

Soviet Premier Bulganin has sent President Eisenhower a new message... elaborating on his proposal for a 20-year friendship treaty with the United States. Mr. Eisenhower rejected that proposal last week, pointing out... politely... that under the United Nations charter both countries already are bound to seek peaceful settlements. The President said then, in so many words, that something much more basic than a stroke of a pen was needed to change world conditions; that there had to be, in the Russian government, a change of heart. The text of the new Bulganin message has not been released. It is a long message, and is still being translated... and studied. Like the original Soviet note, it was delivered by the Russian ambassador in Washington. But this time, instead of delivering the message to the White House, the ambassador delivered it to Secretary of State Dulles at the State Department.

British Prime Minister Eden went before Congress today, and made two addresses---one to the Senate, the other to the House. For a first-hand report on these speeches by Sir Anthony, let's switch now to Griffing Bancroft in Washington.

Bancroft report runs approximately 5 minutes ends on cue: "I return you now to Charles Collingwood in New York."

One of the decisions reached this week by Prime Minister Eden and President Eisenhower, was to invite France to join this country and Britain in discussing what to do to prevent war in ~~Palestine.~~ the Middle East. France tonight accepted that invitation. The Arab states, at the same time, warned that they will not allow decisions to be imposed on them. Any steps taken, they say, must be with their approval.

President Eisenhower's personal physician... Major General Snyder... told reporters today that Mr. Eisenhower should have more time to decide about a second term. Snyder said, "No man who is just four and a half months past a heart attack is in a position yet to determine his own physical fitness." He declined to say how much more time Mr. Eisenhower would need... but tentatively set February 14th as the date for the physical examination which may provide the answer.

The President talked politics today with former Governor Dewey, in a White House meeting that lasted about an hour. Dewey told correspondents afterwards that he couldn't conceive of not having President Eisenhower's leadership in these times. And underscoring this, he said: "I mean he is absolutely necessary to the world and the best prospects of peace." But he had no opinion on what the President would do; they had not discussed the question of a second term. Dewey reported that in addition to politics, they also talked about world problems. It seemed to him, Dewey said, that Asia was the most important area to watch.

For the President, it was a fairly busy day. In the morning he went to a "prayer breakfast"... attended by several hundred Washington figures... and said a revival of religion in this country has shown the world that "this nation is still a nation under God." After his conference with Dewey, Mr. Eisenhower drove to his Gettysburg farm... where he and Mrs. Eisenhower will spend the week-end. And while they're there, they'll both register for the upcoming elections.

Former President Truman is speaking tonight at a Democratic dinner, here in New York. And he will say, in his prepared speech, that the pressure Republicans are putting on President Eisenhower to run "in spite of everything is indecent." One of the advantages Democrats have, Mr. Truman will say, is that they have "a number of men of outstanding character and ability who are available to head the ticket." He will also accuse the Administration of "bluff and bluster with atomic weapons... and making the United States look ridiculous before the whole world." One of his specific charges will be that the Administration... in his words... "cut down our armed forces in the face of growing Communist strength."

Governor Harriman of New York and Senator Kefauver of Tennessee are both attending tonight's dinner. Each, in his way, is a candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination. And during the day, both had long private talks with Mr. Truman... who said he was favoring nobody until convention time rolls around. He agreed with Harriman's statement that "we're just trying to get a Democrat in the White House, and we're not concerned yet with who it is." Harriman is not an avowed candidate. Kefauver, who is, said Mr. Truman made it "very plain" that he wants an open convention, and will not put any roadblocks in anybody's way. (The former President has admitted that he blocked Kefauver's nomination in 1952).

Adlai Stevenson, campaigning on the West Coast, was not pesent at the Democratic dinner, but sent a message saying: "We all know in our hearts that this will be a year of great triumph for our cause."

In London today, a moderate Socialist... James Griffiths... was elected deputy leader of the British Labor Party in Parliament. Griffiths defeated leftist Aneurin Bevan by a vote of 141 to 111... in a close contest.

The Norwegian navy seized two more Russian fishing boats today for alleged violation of its territorial waters. That makes sixteen vessels the Norwegians have taken into custody, altogether, despite Moscow's demand yesterday that the fishing vessels and their crews be released.

In the United Nations today, the United States announced that it is giving the Sudan its full support, in that country's bid for U.N. membership. The Sudan achieved its independence from Egypt and Britain on January 1st... and asked, almost at once, to be admitted to the U.N. Britain, incidentally, agreed to general procedures today for granting early home rule to Malaya.

The United Nations Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East, opened its 12th session today in the city of Bangalore, in India. The conference... which is attended by the representatives of 22 governments... defeated a Soviet move to win membership in the commission for Communist China. Such a move... if successful... would have amounted to bringing Red China into the United Nations "through the back door", since the commission is an agency of the U.N.

[redacted]

A survey... made public at United Nations headquarters today... accuses Red China of holding more than 25-million persons in slave labor camps throughout the Chinese mainland. The detailed survey is based on evidence submitted by Nationalist China, the United States, and various international agencies dealing with slave labor practices. The United States charges... in the survey... that Red China maintains at least 2-thousand forced labor camps.

Buenos Aires marked a victory for democracy tonight... the reappearance of the celebrated newspaper "La Prensa" under the guidance of its rightful owner, Dr. Alberto Gainza Paz, exactly 1-thousand, 833 days after it was muzzled by Juan Peron.

General Motors announced today that its net income last year totaled 1-billion, 189-million dollars... marking the first time in history an industrial corporation's net earnings have exceeded one billion dollars in a single year. G.M. also announced new record payroll and employment figures. For the first time, G.M. paid more than 3-billion dollars in wages and salaries.

The National Safety Council reported today that 38-thousand, 300 persons died in traffic accidents in 1955. That's an eight percent increase over 1954... but not the worst year on record. Almost 40-thousand persons died on the nation's highways in 1941.

Bob Burns, the comedian who... with his bazooka... was always poking fun at his relatives in Van Buren, Arkansas, died of cancer today in a Hollywood hospital. He was 65.

In the Winter Olympics today, Tenley Albright of Newton, Massachusetts, won the women's figure skating championship. Sixteen-year-old Carol Heiss of Ozone Park, New York, was second. Today's gold and silver medals moved the United States into sixth place in the winter games. Russia remains in first place.

I'll be back in a moment with a footnote to the day's news — But first here is ~~Gay Aby~~ Hugh Holder

FOOTNOTE

This being Groundhog Day, people all over the country have been pulling the poor little beasts out of their holes to find out whether they're able to see their shadow. And, as usual, the weather bureau warns that the groundhog is hardly the best tool for long range forecasting..."Its not so much that they're all wrong, says the bureau. But they aren't all right for all times in all places." Well, of course, that's what some people say about the weather bureau.

THIS IS CHARLES COLLINGWOOD... . ~~GOODNIGHT~~ See you tomorrow

CBS RADIO DIVISION

EDWARD R. MURROW - Charles Collingwood

Thursday, February 2, 195
7:45-8:00 p.m.

COLLINGWOOD: ..... British Prime Minister Eden went before Congress today and made two addresses, one to the Senate, the other before the House. For a first-hand report on these speeches by Sir Anthony let's switch now to Griffing Bancroft in Washington.

BANCROFT: Britain's Prime Minister, Sir Anthony Eden, scored at least a real personal triumph today with American lawmakers, Capitol Hill visitors, and especially congressional secretaries. The handsome Sir Anthony (he does look sometimes more like a matinee idol than one of the world's top statesmen) played to standing-room-only crowds in separate speeches to the Senate and the House. An hour before the Prime Minister was to arrive the floors were full, galleries were crowded, and secretaries seemed to lurk in every corridor, waiting for a glimpse. We reporters, too, were crowded in the news galleries. Sir Anthony spoke first to the Senate. He read a prepared speech, interrupted several times by applause. He set forth three suggested courses of action for the United States and Great Britain: to maintain our friendships and alliances without excluding a willingness to talk to Communists. In areas where danger of conflict is most acute, and he mentioned the Middle East, to declare our unity of purpose. And, finally, the British Prime Minister said we should continue giving economic aid where it's most needed to our friends first, but not forgetting others.

Sir Anthony got his first big applause when he said Britain herself needed no more economic help and he got his greatest attention when he said he thought the threat of another war had diminished because both sides realize the atom bomb might mean mutual oblivion, but the Prime Minister's warmest reception came when he ended his prepared address, took off his glasses, raised his hands to silence the applause, and then off-the-cuff spoke in more heart-to-heart fashion about the accomplishments of his meetings here with President Eisenhower. In fact, this went over so well that when he walked to the other side of the capital to talk to the House he did the same thing and here, by recording, ishow he ended that speech.

EDEN: And so, Mr. Speaker, I sum up my message to you. Last night the President and I signed the declaration of Washington together. It embodies our faith. It expresses our principles and shows our confidence in our destiny. If we have the tenacity to maintain these before the world, and the courage to defend them, in conference or inconflict we can together face the future unafraid.

Mr. Speaker, in all conferences there are the written words of the published document, there are the discussions, there are the communiques, - call them what you will, but it's not enough, you know, Sir, to talk of these conferences merely in that sense, because there was much more in these three days in value to our countries than that. What there was, but lots more, is just this. The spirit which animates our two countries. (applause) It's that that counts above all. These have been the most encouraging three days I have ever spent among you here in Washington and I've been on many of these journeys. They were encouraging not only because it was so heartening to find your President in such wonderful health, (applause) they were also encouraging because I felt at alltimes how close we were in mind and thought and I've come away convinced that (unintelligible) that spirit, which you (unintelligible), sir, much closer than any written document whatever you put in it, that banded together we can really render service to this troubled universe and maybe bring peace to the world forever. (applause)

Ed. trans.-A.A.Cardiff (30)

Collingwood for Murrow Fri., Feb. 3, 1956

Good evening:

British Prime Minister Eden ended his Washington visit today by saying that Anglo-American relations "have never been in better shape." Eden expressed this view at the airport, just before taking off for Ottawa. Earlier, at a news conference, he said his three-day conference with President Eisenhower had shown "a very wide range of agreement." The prime minister told the Washington correspondents that he and Mr. Eisenhower "take very seriously" the possibility of taking joint action, with France, to keep peace in the Middle East. ~~And~~ Great Britain and the United States, he said, are firmly agreed that Germany should be united through free elections. Eden said that Britain wants a step-by-step relaxation of curbs on trade with Red China, to bring it on a level with Allied trade with Russia. He urged the West to do "everything possible" to raise living standards in underdeveloped areas. And he used the adjective "remarkable" to describe Soviet Premier Bulganin's latest offer of friendship treaties.. not only with the United States... but also with Britain and France. It was remarkable, he thought, because the Russians so recently "tore up" a non-aggression pact they had with Great Britain... simply because the British joined the Western European Union.

There has been no formal answer to the latest Bulganin message. But the feeling in both Washington and London is that the new offer of a friendship treaty, like the first one, will be refused. ~~President Eisenhower announced [illegible]~~ his rejection of the ~~first offer almost a week ago. The Moscow Radio got around to announcing it only today.~~

The United States banned American travel to Hungary today, except with special permission of the State Department. And we are planning new restrictions on travel by Hungarian diplomats in this country. The United States is taking this action because of the arrest of two Hungarians working for ~~[illegible]~~ American press services in Budapest, and the imprisonment of ~~two~~ OTHER Hungarians employed by the American legation. ~~Seven other employes of the legation have been arrested by the Secret Police, and their fate is unknown.~~

~~In Paris, the new French cabinet held its first meeting today. And it was decided that Premier Mollet will go to Algeria on Monday, to try to quell the revolt in that North African province.~~

There was a new incident today in the Gaza strip. Egyptian and Israeli troops exchanged fire for 20 minutes. Israel says the incident began when an Egyptian machinegun opened up on an Israeli patrol, in Israeli territory. (Ed Murrow obtained an exclusive interview today with Israeli Prime Minister Ben-Gurion. And we shall have that report for you in a moment).

~~Vice President Nixon announced today that the United States will lend Brazil an additional 55 million dollars for development of a steel plant. It's the big steel mill at Volta Redonda, and Mr. Nixon toured it today in company with the new Brazilian president.~~

~~In Washington, the Defense Department issued a draft call today for 6-thousand men in April. This entire draft call is for the Army.~~

The Air Force chief of staff... General Twining... indicated today that ~~[illegible]~~ some of our defense aircraft are now flying with atomic bombs, ready to retaliate immediately if this country is attacked. "It is only common sense," Twining said, "that whatever weapons our air force uses must be readily available." The danger of accidental nuclear explosions in the air was called "essentially non-existent".

There was a piece of sensational testimony in Congress today. Republican Senator Case charged that an attorney offered him 25-hundred dollars for his re-election campaign, believing that he... Case... was going to vote in favor of the natural gas bill. Democratic Senator Fulbright, who is co-sponsor of the measure, said he joined in "condemning" anyone who would make such an offer. Case named no names. The natural gas bill would exempt natural gas producers from regulation by the Federal Power Commission.

~~The House Appropriations Committee recommended today that 2-billion, 900-million dollars be spent for running the Post Office Department in the next fiscal year. That's 26-million dollars less than President Eisenhower requested for the department in his budget message.~~

Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey testified today ~~A suggestion by the President was opposed today by Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey. Humphrey testified~~ before the Senate-House economic committee, and said he is against enacting stand-by controls on consumer credit at this time. In his economic message, Mr. Eisenhower asked that serious consideration be given such controls. Humphrey expressed the view it would be better to act "when you know the conditions you have to meet."

A House sub-committee heard more testimony today regarding political broadcasts. ~~CBS Vice President Richard Salant urged that the~~ Communications Act be amended, "to give broadcasters, in the exercise of their journalistic functions, greater opportunity to inform the American public." The law, as it now stands, says that if a broadcaster provides time for one candidate, he must make equal time available for all other candidates for that office. CBS Vice President Richard Salant pointed out that, in 1952, there were 18 candidates just for President. Liberalization of the law, he said, would enable broadcasters to give major candidates more time on news and panel discussion programs. CBS, he said, would then offer free time to the major presidential candidates for a modern-day version of the famous Lincoln-Douglas debates.

In Detroit, a federal judge has dismissed an indictment charging the United Auto Workers with violation of the Corrupt Practices Act. The union had been accused of using dues-money illegally, to pay for broadcasts by political candidates.

Governor Lausche of Ohio filed as a candidate today, for the Democratic senatorial nomination. The Ohio primary will be held on May 8th. Lausche also is a candidate for Ohio's "favorite son" nomination for President.

~~And in Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, President and Mrs. Eisenhower registered for the November election.~~

Switch to Tr 14 at 7:49:20 in cue:

Now let's listen to that recorded report by Ed Murrow, on his interview today with the Israeli prime minister. The report is coming to us from Tel Aviv.

tape runs 7:35

returns on cue: "This is Ed Murrow recording from Tel Aviv."

That's an exclusive interview Mr. Murrow had today with the remarkable prime minister of Israel. This is Charles Collingwood. I'll be back in a moment with a Foot note to the Day's News. (pause) But first, Bob Dixon.

FOOTNOTE

The British got an unexpected look today at the kind of Western propaganda that's going behind the Iron Curtain. An unusual shift in the winds showered London with balloons bearing propaganda leaflets meant for Hungary. The text was in Hungarian so not very many Londoners knew what was being said, but the pictures were clear enough -- one of Sir Winston Churchill, the other of Grace Kelly... both of them pretty good examples of the products of Western civilization.

THIS IS CHARLES COLLINGWOOD.... SEE YOU MONDAY

CBS RADIO DIVISION

EDWARD R. MURROW-Charles Collingwood

Friday, February 3, 1956
7:45-8:00 p.m.

MURROW: This is Tel Aviv! To reach the Prime Minister of Israel these days you drive south from Beersheba through country that reminds you of the Mojave desert, looking like crumpled brown paper on which a careless child has drawn an occasional green line. Finally, the green line disappears, the hard-surface road deteriorates, even the camels and the goats disappear, the land appears lifeless. There is a sharp turning in the rough track. About twenty-five buildings surrounded by barbed wire, and that is Debeaucaire (?). On the right, outside the barbed wire, there is about two acres of green and the surprising sight of sprinklers working, the water flashing in the sunlight. As you drive into this kibbutz, or collective farm, you see tractors, plows, harrows, bulldozers, and towering above everything else the antenna of a radio transmitter. You're about halfway between the Jordanian and Egyptian frontiers. There isn't too much room on either side and we're not to tell you exactly how much.

Out of a brown, unpainted hut steps a short, powerful man, sixty-nine years of age. He looks younger. A fringe of white hair surrounding a bald head. He wears a British style battle dress, no decorations, David Ben-Gurion, who has spent all his adult life dreaming and at times fighting for the creation of the State of Israel. You sit with him in the winter sun for almost two hours while the wind builds up. An occasional fly makes a landing on his forehead and near the end the sand seems to have tinged his white hair with brown. What was the most difficult decision he evermade? To declare the independence of Israel. It was attacked by five Arab States the same day. That was in 1948. He was advised by a good friend, whom he admires, General George C. Marshall, not to do it, but sometimes risks must be taken. Were any of the people who had come to Israel disappointed in what they found? The answer was "yes." It's a hard life. The number departing has decreased. In the last couple of years only about 5% of those who had arrived had departed. Why had Ben-Gurion gone to the Negev when he retired temporarily and why does he spend his free time there now? Because there was nothing there and he liked the frontier. What would be Israel's relations to Asia? Close and continuing. There is much in common between Judaism and Buddhism, especially respect for the individual. Would the policy of unrestricted immigration into Israel be continued? The answer was "yes." What would Israel do if it did not receive arms from the west? He could not conceive that this would happen. He quoted President Eisenhower's remarks of last November to the effect that Israel's request for defensive armaments would receive sympathetic consideration and he said he knew the President and believed what he said.

What kind of arms did Israel need? Armor, aircraft, and artillery, to offset the supplies Egypt is receiving from Communist sources. He stressed qualitative equality rather than quantitative. What about minor rectification of the existing frontier? Ben-Gurion was prepared to discuss that and anything else with the Arab leaders and he thought that minor changes could be made to the mutual advantage of both sides. He is prepared to talk but implied that there was no possibility of his agreeing to any major changes. Could anything be done to settle the problem of the Arab refugees? Here, again, Ben-Gurion was prepared to talk and said it might be possible to arrange some method of compensation for those Arabs who had left their property behind them in Israel, but that those Jews who had left their property behind them, particularly in Iraq, would also have to be compensated. He viewed the problem of Arab refugees as basically a problem for the Arab nations to solve as Israel had solved the problem of Jewish refugees and he suggested with a slight smile that Israel will be prepared to counsel the Arabs on the subject since Israel had had such considerable experience in the matter of resettlement of refugees.

Asked about proposals that the line of demarkation should be broadened and that additional U. N. personnel be brought into to patrol or supervise the border areas, Ben-Gurion remarked that Israel was a small nation, not disposed to give up even one kilometer of land, and that even United Nations soldiers could not be put up in the air and that, he said, is where the danger is.

There was on the part of the Israeli Prime Minister throughout the entire conversation a note of confidence, but no arrogance. He said at one point that the Israeli Army was the strongest single force contributing to the unification of the country, the welding together of the many diverse peoples who had come there from different lands, and he said "it is not the worst army in the world and certainly the best in the Middle East," and then he repeated his requirement of qualitative rather than quantitative equality of arms with the Arab world.

Asked about thetreatment of Arabs in Israel he contended that they had political equality, but they were not conscripted into the Israeli Army, that they enjoyed all the rights and privileges of Israeli citizens. What reports did he have of the treatment of Jews in Egypt? Only what he read in the papers,he said, and they were not always reliable, but, as he understood it, the Egyptians themselves, living under a dictatorship, didn't have many rights and Ben-Gurion would not care to live there. Did the Prime Minister of Israel see any solution to a situation where the weight of men and metal in the Arab world continued to build up against his country? He did. He didn't know when or how long it would take, but eventually there would be an alliance between the Arabs and the Jews. That, he said, would come about when the Arab leaders recognized the rights of their own people, realized that health, social, and political progress, equality and dignity of the individual, were more important than guns, tanks, and planes. Again, he said, he didn't know how long this would take, but, meanwhile, Israel had no alternative but to remain strong in the face of repeated and recent threats, threats by Arab leaders, to destroy the nation of Israel.

This is Ed Murrow recording from Tel Aviv.

Ed.trans.-A.A.Cardiff (30)

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

CHARLES COLLINGWOOD REPORTING

Good Evening:

British Prime Minister Eden ended his Washington visit today by saying that Anglo-American relations "have never been in better shape." Eden expressed this view at the airport, just before taking off for Ottawa. Earlier, at a news conference, he said his three-day conference with President Eisenhower had shown "a very wide range of agreement." The prime minister told the washington correspondents that he and Mr. Eisenhower "take very seriously" the possibility of taking joint action, with France, to keep peace in the Middle East. Eden said that Britain wants a step-by-step relaxation of curbs on trade with Red China, to bring it on a level with Allied trade with Russia He urged the West to do "everything possible" to raise living standards in underdeveloped areas. And he used the adjective "remarkable" to describe Soviet Premier Bulganin's latest offer of friendship treaties..not only with the United States..but also with Britain and France, It was remarkable, he thought, because the Russians so recently "tore up" a non-aggression pact they had with Great Britain..simply because the British joined the Western European Union.

There has been no formal answer to the latest Bulganin message. But the feeling in both Washington and London is that the new offer of a friendship treaty, like the first one, will be refused.

The United States banned American travel to Hungary today, except with special permission of the State Department. And we are planning new restrictions on travel by Hungarian diplomats in this country. The United States is taking this action because of the arrsst of two Hungarians working for Ameri-ican legation.

There was a new incident today in the Gaza strip. Egyptian and Israeli troops exchanged fire for 20 minutes. Israel says the incident began when an Egyptian machine gun opened up on an Israeli patrol, in Israeli territory. (Ed Murrow obtained an exlcusive interview today with Israeli Prime Minister Ben-Gurion. And we shall have that report for you in a moment.

The Air Force chief of staff..General Twining..indicated today that some of our defense aircraft are now flying with atomic bombs, ready to retaliate immediately if this country is attacked. "It is only common sense," Twining said, "that whatever weapons our air force uses must be readily available." The danger of accidental nuclear explosions in the air was called "essentially non-existent."

There was a piece of sensational testimony in Congress today. Republican Senator Case charged that an attorney offered him 25-hundred dollars for his re-election campaign, believing that he..Case..was going to vote in favor of the natural gas bill. Democratic Senator Fulbright, who is co-sponsor of the measure, said he joined in "condemning" anyone who would make such an offer. Case named no names. The natural gas bill would exempt natural gas producers from regulations by the Federal Power Commission.

Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey testified today before the Senate-House economic committee, and said he is against enacting stand-by controls on consumer credit at this time. In his economic message, Mr. Eisenhower asked that serious consideration be given such controls. Humphrey expressed the view it would be better to act "when you know the conditions you have to meet."

A House sub-committee heard testimony today regarding political broadcasts. The law, as it now stands, says that if a broascaster provides time for one candidate, he must make equal time available for all candidates for that

C.B.S. Vice President Richard Salant pointed out that, in 1952, there were 18 candidates just for President. Liberalization of the law, he said, would enable broadcasters to give major candidates more time on news and panel discussion programs. CBS, he said, would then offer free time to the major presidential candidates for a modern day version of the famous Lincoln-Douglas debates.

In Detroit, a federal judge has dismissed an indictment charging the United Auto Workers with violation of the Corrupt Practices Act, The union had been accused of using dues-money illegally, to pay for boradcasts by political candidates.

Governor Lausche of Ohio filed as a candidate today for the Democratic senatorial nomination. The Ohio primary will be held on May 8th. Lausche also is a candidate for Ohio's "favorite son" nomination for President.

Now let's listen to that recorded report by Ed Murrow, on his interview today with the Israeli prime minister. The report is coming to us from Tel Aviv.

MURROW: This is Tel Aviv! To reach the Prime Minister of Israel these days you drive south from Beersheba through country that reminds you of the Mojave desert, looking like crumpled brown paper on which a careless child had drawn an occasional green line. Finally, the green line disappears, the hard-surface road deteriorates, even the camels and the goats diaappear, the land appears lifeless. There is a sharp turning in the rough track. About twenty-five buildings surrounded by barbed wire, and this is Debeaucaire.(?) On the right, outside the barbed wire, there is about two acres of green and the surprising sight of sprinklers working, the water flashing in the sunlight. As you drive into this kibbuts, of collective farm, you see tractors, plows, harrows, bulldozers, and towering above everything else the antenna of a radio transmitter.

You're about halfway between the Jordanian and Egyptian frontiers. There isn't too much room on either side and we're not to tell you exactly how much.

Out of a brown, unpainted hut steps a short, powerful man, sixty-nine years of age. He looks younger. A fringe of white hair surrounding a bald head. He wears a British style battle dress, no decorations. David Ben-Gurion, who has spent all his adult life dreaming and at times fighting for the creation of the State of Israel. You sit with him in the winter sun for almost two hours while the wind builds up. An occasional fly makes a landing on his forhead and near the end the sand seems to have tinged his white hair with brown. What was the most difficult decision he has ever made? To declare the independence of Israel. It was attacked by five Arab States the same day. That was in 1948. He was advised by a good friend, whom he admires, General George C. Marshal, not to do it, but sometimes risks must be taken. Were any of the people who had come to Israel disappointed in what they found? The answer was "yes." It's a hard life. the number departing has decreased. In the last couple of years only about 5% of those who had arrived had departed. Why had Ben-Gurion gone to the Negev when he retired temporarily and why does he spend his free time there now? Because there was nothing there and he liked the frontier What would be Isreel's relations to Asia? Close and continuing. There is much in common between Judaism and Buddhism, especially respect for the individual. Would the policy of unrestricted immigration into Israel be continued? The answer was "Yes." What would Israel do if it did not receive arms from the west? He could not conceive of that this would happen. He quoted President Eisenhower's remarks of last November to the effect that Israel's request for defensive armements would receive sympathetic consideration and he said he knew the President and believed what he said.

What kind of arms did Israel need? Armor, aircraft, and artillery, to offset the supplies Egypt is receiving from Communist sources. He stressed qualitative equality rather than quantitative. What about minor rectivication of the existing frontier? Ben-Gurion was prepared to discuss that and anything else with the Arab leaders and he thought that minor changes could be made to the mutual advantage of both sides. He is prepared to talk but implied that there was no possibility of his agreeing to any major changes. Could anything be done to settle the problem of the Arab refugees? Here again, Ben-Gurion was prepared to talk and said it might be possible to arrange some method of compensation for those Arabs who had left their property behind them in Israel, but that those Jews who had left their property behind them, particularly in Iraq, would also have to be compensated. He viewed the problem of Arab refugees as basically a problem for the Arab nations to solve as Israel had solved the problem of Jewish refugees and he suggested with a slight smile that Israel will be prepared to counsel the Arabs on the subject since Israel had had such considerable experience in the matter of resettlement of refugees.

Asked about proposals that the line of demarkation should be broadened and that additional U.N. Personnel be brought into patrol or supervise the border areas, Ben-Gurion remarked that Israel was a small nation, not disposed to give up even one kilometer of land, and that even United Nations soldiers could not be put up in the air and that, he said, is where the danger is.

There was on the part of the Israeli Prime Minister throughout the entire conversation a note of confidence, but no arrogance. He said at one point that the Israeli Army was the strongest single force contributing to the unification of the country, the welding together of many diverse peoples who had come there from different lands, and he said "it is not the worst army in the world and certainly the best in the Middle East." and then he repeated his requirements of qualitative rather than quantitative equality of arms with the Arab world.

Asked about the treatment of Arabs in Israel he contended that they had political equality, but they were not conscripted into the Israeli Army, that they enjoyed all rights and privileges of Israeli citizens. What reports did he have of the treatment of Jews in Egypt? Only what he read in the papers, he said, and they were not always reliable, but, as he understood it, the Egyptians themselves, living under a dictatorship, didn't have many rights and Ben-Gurion would not care to live there. Did the Prime Minister of Israel see any solution to a situation where the wieght of men and metal in the Arab world continued to build up against his country? He did. He didn't know when or how long it would take, but eventually there would be an alliance between the Arabs and the Jews. That, he said, would come about when the Arab leaders recognized the rights of their own people, realized that health, social and political progress, equality and dignity of the individual, were more important than guns, tanks, and planes. Again, he said, he didn't know how long this would take, but, meanwhile, Israel had no alternative but to remain strong in the face of repeated and recent threats, threats by Arab leaders, to destroy the nation of Israel.

This is Ed Murrow recording from Tel Aviv.

COLLINGWOOD: That's an exclusive interview Mr. Murrow had today with the remarkable prime minister of Israel. He will continue his report from Israel next week. This is Charles Collingwood. I'll be back in a moment with a Foot Note to the Day's News. But first, Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

COLLINGWOOD: The British got an unexpected look today at the kind of Western propaganda that's going behind the Iron Curtain. An unusual shift in the winds showered London with balloons bearing propaganda leaflets meant for Hungary. The text was in Hungarian so not very many Londoners knew what was being said, but the pictures were clear enough -- one of Sir Winston Churchill, the other of Grace Kelly..both of them pretty good examples of the products of Western civilization. This is Charles Collingwood. See you Monday.

Collingwood for Murrow Mon., Feb. 6, 1956

Good evening:

The Senate is driving toward a vote tonight on the natural gas bill... and the indications are that it will pass. A series of limiting amendments have been defeated. In contrast, Democratic Senator Douglas... an opponent of the measure... proposed a substitute bill which would have freed small natural gas producers from direct Federal price regulation but retain it for the big producers. That proposal was rejected by a vote of 55 to 38. [redacted] And that appears to reflect the sentiment of the chamber.

[redacted]

Earlier xxxx a Nebraska lawyer identified himself as the man who wished to contribute two thousand five hundred dollars to the campaign fund of Senator Francis Case (R- S.D.). The lawyer John Neff of Lexington Nebraska, denied that he had any intent of trying to influence Senator Case's vote on the gas bill. Case has indicated that he now intends to oppose the bill... Senator Douglas, leading the opposition to the bill, says Nebraska records indicate Mr. Neff had once registered there as a lobbyist for an oil company. Senator Hennings of Missouri says his committee will investifate the whole affair

Congress completed action today on legislation for continuing the government's polio vaccination program. The House approved the measure by a voice vote. It now goes to the White House for the President's signature.

A tax expert died today while presenting testimony to a Senate-House committee looking into the nation's economy. Randolph E. Paul, who was an official in the Treasury Department in the administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt, died in the hearing room of a heart attack. He had just testified against cutting taxes at this time.

Republican Senator Malone said tonight that the United States should bring home all its armed forces from Europe and Asia. Malone proposed that when this is done, we advise all potential enemies that we will destroy the war-making capacity "at home" of any country which attacks us, or any of our allies.

President Eisenhower returned to Washington today from his Gettysburg farm... and almost immediately went into a conference with Secretary of State Dulles, to discuss Soviet Premier Bulganin's new proposal for a friendship treaty. Afterward, Dulles said he did not know when the United States would answer the Bulganin note. Dulles said in a letter today... to 40 Republican members of Congress... [redacted] that the door is not closed on the possible sale of arms to Israel. [redacted] But the United States does not feel, [redacted] he said, that the security of [redacted] states in the Near East can "depend on arms alone." The congressmen had [redacted] urged that Israel "be allowed to obtain in the open market such weapons as would assure her protection against aggression."

White House News Secretary Hagerty announced today that the President's next full-scale physical examination will be completed on February 14th. Mr. Eisenhower has suggested that the outcome of this examination may be a major factor in deciding whether to seek another term.

President Eisenhower accepted the resignation today of General Services Administrator Edmund Mansure, "due to personal obligations." Mansure has been under congressional fire, in connection with the operation of a government nickel plant in Cuba. [There has been testimony he recommended a [redacted] political supporter to serve as insurance broker for a phase of the project... testimony he later denied under oath. His letter of resignation makes no mention of this controversy.]

The former owner of a GI training school refused to tell Senate investigators today whether she has ever been a Communist. Dr. Annette Rubenstein, of New York, refused to answer the question put to her by the Senate investigating subcommittee on grounds of possible self-incrimination. The subcommittee is investigating alleged Communist infiltration of schools subsidized under the GI Bill of Rights.

A court martial today sentenced Sergeant William E. Banghart of Muncy, Pennsylvania, to 15 years at hard labor for collaborating with the enemy while a prisoner of war in Korea. He was also sentenced to forfeiture of all pay and allowances.

The International Union of Electrical Workers has accepted a government proposal for ending the 113-day strike against Westinghouse Electric. The plan... approved earlier by the company... would sidetrack the most controversial issue, the question of time studies, until other, less troublesome problems have been settled. The dispute over the right of the company to make the time studies would then be negotiated after the strikers go back to work.

The government dropped its anti-trust action against the Hilton Hotel Corporation today, under a consent decree requiring the company to dispose of two of its largest properties. Under the decree, Hilton must sell the Mayflower Hotel in Washington and either the New Yorker or the Roosevelt Hotel here in New York. A third hotel... the Jefferson in St. Louis... already has been sold to the Sheraton chain.

In Tuscaloosa, Alabama, today, a crowd stoned a car that was taking the University of Alabama's only Negro co-ed to her classes. One window of the car was broken, but the co-ed... Autherine Lucy... was not hurt. The president of the university... Dr. O.C. Carmichael... has called for National Guard help and says it may be necessary to close the school if law and order is not maintained.

Algiers looks like a city under siege tonight, after the riot that greeted the arrival this morning of French Premier Mollet. Mollet flew to Algiers to try to settle the problem of Algerian nationalism and install the new resident-general, Georges Catroux. Instead, he was met by a mob of angry French colonists who shouted "Death to Mollet" and pelted him with vegetables and fruit. Mollet escaped injury, but the violent reception forced the resignation of Catroux, and roadblocks have been set up throughout the city as a precaution against fresh outbreaks.

Russia formally protested to West Germany today against the launching of American balloons from German territory. The protest said Russia expects the West German government, henceforth, "to prevent American organizations from launching the balloons." Yesterday, Moscow made a similar protest to the United States and Turkey, charging that American military forces were sending balloons equipped with cameras over Soviet territory. The State Department said the Russians apparently were referring to high-altitude weather balloons that were being launched by the Air Force in connection with the International Geophysical Year.

West Germany served notice today that, after May 5th, it will refuse to pay any more toward the support of Western troops in Germany. Identical notes to this effect were sent to the United States, Britain and France.

Ed Murrow is still in the Middle East, and our latest ~~[illegible]~~ recorded report comes to us tonight from Tel Aviv. His account tonight deals with some of Israel's military problems.

tape runs 5:35
ends on cue: "This is Ed Murrow recording from Tel Aviv."

Mr. Murrow will be in the Middle East for several more days, so we shall have more of these first-hand reports. This is Charles Collingwood. I'll be back in a moment with a Footnote to the Day's News. (pause) But first, Bob Dixon.

FOOTNOTE

Here's a note on our changing language. Federal Judge John Biggs, Jr. was testifying to the House Judiciary Committee today. He got to talking about our population in 1975. A Congressman wanted to know where he got his figures. "From demographers" said Judge Biggs. "Who?" said Congressman Keating. The Judge then defined a demographer as " a form of magician -- a medicine man -- who attempts to estimate population in advance."... Demographer.

THIS IS CHARLES COLLINGWOOD... SEE YOU TOMORROW

CBS RADIO DIVISION

EDWARD R. MURROW

Monday, Feb. 6, 1956
7:45-8:00 P.M.

MURROW: This is Tel Aviv!

This country of Israel is so small that a reporter can cover much ground in twenty-four hours. Here is a quick summary of one such period: Fishing on the Sea of Galilee, 11:00 o'clock at nite, bright stars overhead, the lights of Tiberius on the far shore. The fishermen use a big ring net. First a rowboat goes out, equipped with a huge bright light on the stern, shining down on the water. It sits there for a couple of hours, attracts the fish. Other boats then surround the light boat with the big net, draw it together at the bottom and haul it in. As they pull at the net, they sing songs straight out of the Bible. Many of the young men came here from Austria. The Israeli attack against a Syrian position, for which she was censured by the U.N., occurred about two miles north. You ask the fishermen what they think about it. They shrug and say it wasn't very pleasant sitting out there in the light boats, being shot at.

When the boats near the shore, the strains of a quartet playing Mozart seep out thru the trees, a concert in the recreation hall. It's more like an Army barracks. Faces old and young, from the four corners of the earth soak up the music. Early in the morning the collective farm is awake. The shepherd takes his flock to the hills, also his rifle - the frontier is only two miles away. You drive down around the bottom end of the Sea of Galilee, across the River Jordan, up thru Tiberius to a rich valley stretching in from the Sea of Galilee, and there on the hillside you encounter a man from Montana-- big, bluff, and obviously enjoying himself? -- Bud Mullahan, agricultural chief of our Point 4 program. Cattle are grazing on the hillside, brahma bulls crossed with native cattle. The cowboys are Israeli. Can they work cattle? "Sure", says Bud. Are they good farmers? "They love the soil" - and Bud is a little surprised, since the Jews have been away from the land for about two thousand years. He is teaching young Israelis scientific farming, speaks enthusiastically of one ranch down in the south where they have figured out exactly how many cattle it will handle before the first head is moved onto the ranch. Mullahan remarks that Mary Magdalen was born just down in that little village. The Miracle of the Loaves and Fishes occurred behind that clump of trees down by the sea; and the Sermon on the Mount was just over that hill.

In the irrigated valley below they get two crops of tmatoes from the same plant. The man from Montana is enjoying himself. You drive to Nazareth, stop at a cafe, the radio is blaring swing music. You encounter two young Americans, ex-Navy boys; they have a big dirt-moving outfit in Haifa, been doing a lot of the work for the Government. They're now working on a scheme with Arab farmers in Israel. They want to move in with eight rigs, six bottom ploughs, work around the clock and really do some ploughing. They think the Arabs are going to go for it, too.

You drive down to an airfield - a fighter wing, commanded by young Colonel Weizmann, nephew of Chaim Weizmann. He has a few Meteors, British jets, a type now being retired by the Royal Air Force, a few Spitfires and a few American P-51s. When his boys aren't flying they're cultivating gardens or milking cows or riding motorcycles. You ask him if his runways are really long enough for the Meteors, and he replies, "oh, yes, also long enough to handle F-86s". He explains that Israel is so small, he has trouble getting room enough for navigational training, always danger of violating a frontier. If he flies eight Meteors in spread-out battle formation, the wing man on the left will be along the edge of the Mediterranean and the one on the right almost over the Jordanian border. Four jets take off, heading for the border; it's only about six miles away. The colonel remarks, "The boys have to be careful of their turns and their instrument flying." You ask him how it feels to command these obsolete aircraft when the Egyptian Air Force is building up with Russian-made gear. He smiles and says, "It would be nice to have equality." The security officer asks that you do not mention name or location of the airfield. The Jordanians could practically read the numbers on the planes on the ground with a pair of powerful glasses. This country is as security-conscious as Britain was during the blitz.

Judging by the newspapers and conversations with officials, there is not the slightest possibility that Israel will settle for anything less than qualitative defense equality with the Arab world. They don't know how they're going to get it. But one thing is clear: they are convinced that their reliance must be in their own strength and not in paper guarantees from one or several nations. There are former Poles, Czechs, Roumanians living here who have fresh memories of how such guarantees worked for them in the past.

This is Ed Murrow recording from Tel Aviv!

-30-

Ediphone trans./E. Scheiner

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

CHARLES COLLINGWOOD REPORTING:

Good Evening:

The Senate is driving toward a vote tonight on the natural gas bill... and the indications are that it will pass. A series of limiting amendments have been defeated. In one test, Democratic Senator Douglas..an apponent of the measure..proposed a substitute bill which would have freed small natural gas producers from direct federal price regulation but retain it for big producers. That proposal was rejected by a vote of 55 to 38. And that appears to reflect the sentiment of the chamber.

Earlier a Nebraska lawyer identified himself as the man who wished to contribute two thousand five hundred dollars to the campaign fund of Senator Case (R-S.D.). The lawyer, John Neff of Lexington Nebraska, denied that he had any intent of trying to influence Senator Case's vote on the gas bill. Case has indicated that he now intends to oppose the bill..Senator Douglas, leading the opposition to the bill, says Nebraska records indicate Mr. Neff had once registered there as a lobbyist for an oil company. Senator Hennings of Missouri says his committee will investigate the whole affair.

Congress completed action today on legislation for continuing the government's polio vaccination program. The House approved the meauure by a voice vote. It now goes to the White House for the President's signature.

A tax expert died today while presenting testimony to a Senate-House committee looking into the nation's economy. Randolph E. Paul, who was an official in the Treasury Department in the administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt, died in the hearing room of a heart attack. He had just testified against cutting taxes at this time.

Republican Senator Malone said tonight that the United States should bring home all its armed forces from Europe and Asia. Malone proposed that when this is done, we advise all potential enemies that we will destroy the war-making capacity "at home" of any country which attacks us, or any of our allies.

President Eisenhower returned to Washington today from his Gettysburg farm..and almost immediately went into a conference with Secretary of State Dulles, to discuss Soviet Premier Bulganin's new proposal for a friendship treaty. Afterward, Dulles said he did not know when the United States would answer the Bulganin note. Dulles said in a letter today..to 40 Republican members of Congress..that the door is not closed on the possible sale of arms to Israel, but the United States does not feel, he said, that the security of states in the Near East can "depend on arms alone." The congressmen had urged that Israel "be allowed to obtain in the open market such weapons as would assure her protection against aggression."

White House News Secretary Hagerty announced today that the President's next full - scale physical examination will be completed on February 14th. Mr. Eisenhower has suggested that the outcome of this examination may be a major factor in deciding whether to seek another term.

President Eisenhower accepted the resignation today of General Services Administrator Edmund Mansure, "due to personal obligations." Mansure has been under congressional fire, in connection with the operation of a government nickel plant in Cuba. There has been testimony he recommended a political supporter to serve as insurance broker for a phase of the project...testimony he later denied under oath. His letter of resignation makes no mention of the controversy.

The former owner of a GI training school refused to tell Senate investigators today whether she has ever been a Communist. Dr. Annette Rubenstein, of New York, refused to answer the question put to her by the Senate investigating sub committee on grounds of possible self-incrimination. The subcommittee is investigating alleged Communist infiltration of schools subsidized under the GI Bill of Rights.

A court martial today sentenced Sergeant William E. Banghart of Muncy, Pennsylvania, to 15 years at hard labor for collaborating with the enemy while a prisoner of war in Korea. He was also sentenced to forfeiture of all pay and allowances.

The International Union of Electrical Workers has accepted a government proposal for ending the 113-day strike against Westinghouse Electric. The plan..approved earlier by the company..would sidetrack the most controversial issue, the question of time studies, until other, less troublesome problems have been settled. The dispute over the right of the company to make the time studies would then be negotiated after the strikers go back to work.

The government dropped its anti-trust action against the Hilton Hotel Corporation today, under a consent decree requiring the company to dispose of two of its largest properties. Under the decree, Hilton must sell the Mayflower Hotel in Washington and either the New Yorker or the Roosevelt Hotel here in New York. A third hotel..the Jefferson in St. Louis..already has been sold to the Sheraton chain.

In Tuscaloosa, Alabama, today a crowd stoned a car that was taking the University of Alabama's only Negro co-ed to her classes. One window of the car was broken, but the coed..Autherine Lucy..was not hurt, although spattered with eggs. The president of the university..Dr. O. C. Carmichael..has called for National Guard help and says it may be necessary to close the school if law and order is not maintained.

Algiers looks like a city under siege tonight, after the riot that greeted the arrival this morning of French Premier Mollet. Mollet flew to Algiers to try to settle the problem of Algerian nationalism and install the new resident-general, Georges Catroux. Instead, he was met by a mob of angry French colonists who shouted "Death to Mollet" and pelted him with vegetables and fruit. Mollet escaped injury, but the violent reception forced the resignation of Catroux, the roadblocks have been set up throughout the city as a precaution against fresh outbreaks.

Russia formally protested to West Germany today against the launching of American balloons from German territory. The protest said Russia expects the East German government, henceforth, "to prevent American organizations from launching the balloons." Yesterday, Moscow made a similar protest to the United States and Turkey, charging that American military forces were sending balloons equipped with cameras over Soviet territory. The State Department said the Russians apparently were referring to high altitude weather balloons that were being launched by the Air Force in connection with the International Geophysical Year.

West Germany served notice today that, after May 5th, it will refuse to pay any more toward the support of Western troops in Germany. Identical notes to this effect were sent to the United States, Britain and France.

Ed Murrow is still in the Middle East, and our latest recorded report comes to us tonight from Tel Aviv. His account tonight deals with some of Israel's military problems.

MURROW: This is Tel Aviv.

This country if Israel is so small that a reporter can cover much ground in twenty-four hours. Here is a quick summary of one such period: Fishing on the Sea of Galilee, 11:00 o'clock at night, bright stars overhead, the lights of Tiberius on the far shore. The fisherman use a big ring net. First a rowboat goes out, equipped with a huge bright light on the stern, shining down on the water. It sits there for a couple of hours, attracts the fish. Other boats then surround the light boat with the big net, they sing songs straight out of the Bible. Many of the young men came here from Austria. The Israeli attack against a Syrian position, for which she was censured by the U.N., occurred about two miles north. You ask the fishermen what they think about it. They shrug and say it wasn't very pleasant sitting out there in the light boats being shot at.

When the boats near the shore, the strains of a quartet playing Mozart seep out through the trees, a concert in the recreation hall. It's more like an Army barracks. Faces old and young, from the four corners of the earth soak up the music. Early in the morning the collective farm is awake. The shepherd takes his flock to the hills, also his rifle - the frontier is only two miles away. You drive down around the bottom end of the Sea of Galilee, across the River Jordan, up through Tiberius to a rich valley stretching in from the Sea of Galilee, and there on the hillside you encounter a man from Montana -- big, bluff, and obviously enjoying himself. --Bud Mullahan (?), agricultural chief of our Point 4 Program. Cattle are grazing on the hillside, brahma bulls crossed with native cattle. The cowboys are Israeli. Can they work cattle? "Sure" says Bud. Are they good farmers? "They love ths soil" - and Bud is a little surprised, since the Jews have been away from the land for about two thousand years. He is teaching young Israelis scientific farming, speaks enthusiastically of one ranch down in the south where they have figured out exactly of one ranch down in the south where they have figured oug exactly how many cattle it will handle before the first head is moved onto the ranch. Mullahan remarks that Mary Magdalen was born just down in that little village. The Miracle of the Loaves and Fishes occurred behind that clump of trees down by the sea; and the Sermon on the Mount was just over the hill.

In the irrigated valley below they got two crops of tomatoes from the same plant. The man from Montana is enjoying himself. You drive to Nazareth stop at a cafe, the radio is blaring swing music. You encounter two young Americans, ex-Navy boys; they have a big dirt-moving outfit in Haifa, been doing a lot of the work for the Government. They're now working on a scheme with Arab farmers in Israel. They want to move in with eight rigs, six bottom ploughs, work around the clock and really do some ploughing. They think the Arabs are going to go for it, too.

You drive down to an airfield - a fighter wing, commanded by young Colonel Weizmann, nephew of Chaim Weizmann. He has a few Meteros, British jets, a type now being retired by the Royal Air Force, a few Spitfires and a few American P-51's. When his boys aren't flying they're cultivating gardens or milking cows or riding motorcycles. You ask him if his runways are really long enough for the Meteors, and re replies, "Oh, yes, also long enough to handle F-86's". He explains that Israel is so small, he has trouble getting room enough for navigational training, always danger of violating a frontier. If he flies eight Meteors in spread-out battle formation, the wing man on the left will be along the edge of the Mediterranean and the one on the right almost over the Jordanian border. Four jets take off, heading for the border; it's only about six miles away. The colonel remarks "The boys have to be careful of their turns and their instrument flying." You ask him how it feels to command these obsolete aircraft when the Egyptian Air Force is building up with Russian-made gear. He smiles and says, "It would be nice to have equality." The security officer asks that you do not mention name or location of the airfield. The Jordanians could practically read the numbers on the planes on the ground with a pair of powerful glasses. This country is an security- conscious as Britain was during the Blitz.

Judging by the newspapers and conversations with officials, there is not the slightest possibility that Israel will settle for anything less than qualitative defense equality with the Arab world. They don't know how they're going to get it. But one thing is clear: They are convinced that their reliance must be in their own strength and not in paper guarantees from one or several nations. There are former Poles, Czechs, Roumanians living here who have fresh memories of how such guarantees worked for them in the past.

This is Ed Murrow recording from Tel Aviv.

COLLINGWOOD: Mr. Murrow will be in the Middle East for several more days, so we shall have more of these first-hand reports. This is Charles Collingwood. I'll be back in a moment with a Footnote to the Day's News. But first, Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

COLLINGWOOD: Here's a note on our changing language. Federal Judge John Biggs, Jr. was testifying to the House Judiciary Committee today. He got to talking about our population in 1975. A Congressman wanted to know where he got his figures. "From demographers" said Judge Biggs. "Who?" said Congressman Keating. The judge then defined a demographer as a "form of magician -- a medicine man -- who attempts to estimate population in advance"..Demographer.

This is Charles Collingwood. See you tomorrow.

Collingwood for Murrow Tues., Feb. 7, 1956

Good evening:

The Senate is conducting a double-barrelled investigation of that 25-hundred-dollar "campaign donation" Republican Senator Case refused to accept. Two Senate committees conducting the investigation want to know if the money was intended as a bribe, to influence Senator Case's vote on the natural gas bill, which the Senate passed last night. (The measure would exempt natural gas producers from direct federal price controls. Case voted against it). ~~[illegible]~~ One of the two committees looking into the matter was appointed today by Vice President Nixon, after the Senate voted unanimously for an investigation. It is a bipartisan committee... made up of two Democrats and two Republicans... with Senator George as chairman. The other group is the regular Senate Elections Subcommittee, of which Senator Hennings is chairman. And already there is quite a bit of rivalry between them. Senator Case was asked by both committees to testify at 2 o'clock this afternoon. He chose to accept the invitation of the special bipartisan committee... although later he did meet briefly with the Hennings group. Case is scheduled to appear before the special committee again on Friday. Meantime, the committee has issued six subpoenas. One of the subpoenas is for John Neff, the Lexington, Nebraska attorney who offered Case the 25-hundred-dollar donation. Neff, who has insisted there were "no strings" attached to the gift, says he welcomes the investigation. Two other subpoenas are for E. J. Kahler and John Griffin, both of Sioux Falls, South Dakota, with whom at various times the money was entrusted for safe-keeping. And the three remaining subpoenas are for members of Case's staff. The Hennings committee has also subpoenaed Neff, to appear at a public hearing on Monday.

Democratic Senator Kilgore asked the Justice Department today to investigate the disprders arising over the admission of a Negro student to the University of Alabama. The student... Autherine Lucy... was splattered with eggs yesterday by a mob protesting her attendance at the school. And last night the university board of trustees ordered her excluded from classes "until further notice."

Kilgore, who is chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, asked the Justice Department to find out whether any federal statutes had been violated. "If our nation is to uphold the banner of democracy," he said, "it cannot under any circumstances permit such despicable incidents." The attorney for Autherine Lucy has told the university he will take legal action, if she is not reinstated within 48 hours. She had been admitted to the school, originally, by order of the United States District Court.

In Los Angeles, Adlai Stevenson told a group of Negro leaders today that he favors desegregation. "But," he said, "you do not upset the tradition of generations overnight." Stevenson said his principal concern, at this time, is to see that the Negro is able to vote, no matter what part of the country he lives in. "The basic assumption of democracy," he said, "is that you have not only the right but the duty to vote."

President Eisenhower met with Republican congressional leaders today and urged them to press for speedy action on his farm program. House Republican Leader Martin said there was no discussion of a possible presidential veto of a farm measure calling for high, rigid price supports... instead of the lower, flexible supports advocated by the Administration. The Senate Agriculture Committee voted tentatively last week to restore rigid, high supports on cotton, wheat, corn, peanuts and rice.

The government announced today that 1-million, 274-thousand fewer persons had jobs in January than in December... due to less manufacturing activity. Still, nearly 63-million persons were employed in January. And for the month, that's a record high.

Washington sources say that Trevor Gardner, assistant secretary of the Air Force in charge of research, may resign because of a disagreement over the development of new weapons. Gardner reportedly feels that more money should be spent for military research, especially in the field of guided missiles. (Presumably, this is in addition to new funds requested by President Eisenhower in his budget message.) Tonight, Gardner is in the Bahamas, conferring with Secretary of Defense Wilson, who is taking a brief vacation.

Secretary of State Dulles told his weekly news conference today that the United States is giving careful study to Soviet Premier Bulganin's new offer of a 20-year friendship treaty. Dulles said this country wants to see if there is anything in the latest Bulganin message on which something constructive can be built. The United States and Great Britain, he revealed, have formally notified the United Nations of their belief that the U.N. truce team in Palestine should be enlarged, [redacted] as a means of preventing war. British Prime Minister Eden expressed his endorsement of this plan today, at a news conference in Ottawa, but Eden said he thought any concrete proposals for a larger international patrol [redacted] ought to come from Israel and the Arab states. Tomorrow, representatives of the United States, Britain and France will meet in Washington to consider this problem of preserving peace in the Middle East. Ed Murrow, incidentally, is in Israel tonight. And we will have a report from him in a moment.

Communist China accused the United States today of committing a "provocative act" in sending what it claimed were military reconnaisance balloons over Chinese territory. Communist Albania made a similar accusation today... all in line with the Russian complaint, last week-end, that American balloons equipped with cameras were passing over Soviet territory. The United States explained yesterday that the Russian protest apparently referred to high-altitude weather balloons, which had been released in Europe by our Air Force. Secretary Dulles told his news conference today that the United States has the right to send these weather balloons wherever it chooses. But if any nation has strong objections, he said, the United States is "disposed to try" to keep the balloons from crossing that country's frontiers. He conceded that this is a point on which international law is a bit obscure.

In Algeria, French Premier Mollet conferred with French and Moslem leaders today, in an effort to solve the nationalist problem. There were no new disorders in Algiers, where all public gatherings have been banned, but thousands of French colonists staged an anti-Mollet demonstration in the city of Constantine, 200 miles to the east. The French settlers oppose Mollet, because they are afraid he will grant the Arabs more political rights. And French ex-servicemen living in Algeria have formed what they call a Committee of Public Safety, which insists on the maintenance of full sovereignty for France. Nevertheless, Mollet told a news conference in Algiers today that he will stick to his promise to give the Arabs equal voting rights with the French settlers.

It was announced today, in England, that Malaya will be granted full independence within the British Commonwealth on August 31st, 1957. Malaya is presently a British protectorate with colonial status. Negotiations looking toward its independence have been in progress for several weeks.

In his journeyings around Israel, Ed Murrow has gone down to the region of Beersheba and the Dead Sea. Tonight, his recorded report might be titled "The Realization of a Dream".

tape runs 5:20

ends on cue: "This is Ed Murrow recording from Beersheba."

Tomorrow, Mr. Murrow plans to visit an Arab village in northern Israel. And we will try to bring you a report tomorrow night on his impressions.

This is Charles Collingwood. I'll be back in a moment with a Footnote to the Day's News. (pause) But, first, here is Bob Hall -

FOOTNOTE

Four high school boys in Illinois telephoned the Kremlin today for help on a ~~xxxxxx~~ theme they were asked to write for school on Russia's latest peace proposals. They asked for Premier Bulganin and got a man who said he was Bulganin. One of the boys asked whether any more proposals were forthcoming. "No, no," said the man.. "I don't know." At that the boy got flustered and said the word for goodbye in Russian which he had learned. There was a chuckle on the other end and the receiver dropped.

THIS IS CHARLES COLLINGWOOD.... SEE YOU TOMORROW

CBS RADIO DIVISION

EDWARD R. MURROW

Tuesday, Feb. 7, 1956
7:45-8:00 P.M.

MURROW: This is Beersheba, in Israel. It's Market Day here. The Bedouin tribesmen arrived on the bare, dusty plot of land on the edge of town - camels, chickens, eggs, burros, sheep, goats; little mounds of barley being weighed out on primitive scales; dust and stench and the noise of camels. And in the background, a towering and brand-new grain elevator, a modern hotel, attractive theatre, a gleaming white medical clinic. A 25-ton truck rolled along the road, and beside the road was a tree that may have been planted by Abraham. The truck was loaded with potash being hauled up from the Dead Sea. The Bedouin were mostly in heated argument. They wore old Army overcoats, shoes with no laces, occasionally a pair of sandals; the children were barefoot and dirty. Little enough romance here in the market place.

Six years ago this was a village of three hundred families. The Israelis took it in their war of independence, and in the last four years they've made it a city of about 25,000 - neat homes, just on the edge of the Negev. The country south of here is rather like that in the more arid parts of New Mexico, brown and gently rolling. Over here there is occasionally a camel or a herd of sheep on the skyline.

This afternoon we traveled down to the Dead Sea, lowest point on this earth's surface, 1200 feet below sea level. The trip down reminds one of the Grand Canyon and the Bad Lands rolled into one. The road was built in about two years. At the bottom is a plant capable of producing two million tons of salt per year. It's now producing 135 tons of potash and some magnesium - all from the water of the Dead Sea. The water is pumped into shallow lakes, where much of it evaporates. The brine is then pumped into the factory and converted, and the big trucks start the long haul to Beersheba. There is a Jordanian village just across the sea, a snow-capped mountain in the distance. Going down, we were discussing with an Israeli official the location of a new power line. We asked him about their strategic locations, and he laughed and said, "The whole country is vulnerable, so we don't have to worry too much about that sort of thing."

This country is living on a shoestring in more ways than one. So much of it resembles a shoestring stretched along the edge of the Mediterranean. After three days here one wonders how it was created and whether it can survive. This is a Jewish melting pot; newspapers published in sixteen languages, ten political parties, a record of much division and internal wrangling during both peace and war. Israel is the realization of a dream. Some say it's a crime against economics - and it's a place of enormous energy and hard work. In places, they have in fact made the desert bloom; in some places it blooms naturally at this time of year. They have planted enormous numbers of trees, there is a ferment of building. On one slope there will be those little tin shacks originally inhabited by the immigrant; a little higher up, a row of better wooden houses; and higher still, the permanent homes built of stone or concrete. The goats are now living in the tin shacks where the immigrants first lived.

I have never seen the carrying of arms so common amongst civilians. The rifle and hand-gun go along even on bus trips, on vacations. The keeping of arms is an old custom in this country - only now it is done openly. Every man here serves two-and-a-half years in the Army and remains in the reserve till 45. The women serve only two years. I am told by competent military experts that their mobilization system is as vast and comprehensive as any in the world. I have seen the Army only at company strength. Their weapons were clean, and they moved with that combination of speed and casualness which marks well-trained troops. They aren't afraid to offer suggestions to their superior officers.

They are obviously physically fit. I talked with one squad, chosen at random, and found boys from Poland, Roumania, Morocco, Iraq, Czechoslovakia, as well as Israel.

There is a sense of urgency and of fatalism in this country, no tension or excitement, but rather a belief in the future which no one can see. Some obviously came here expecting a Garden of Eden. It isn't here. This is a hard life, at least in the country, but there is pride of accomplishment and the physical results to prove it.

This is Ed Murrow recording from Beersheba.

-30-

Ediphone trans./E. Scheiner

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

CHARLES COLLINGWOOD REPORTING:

Good Evening:

The Senate is conducting a double-barrelled investigation of that 25-hundred-dollar "campaign donation" Republican Senator Case refused to accept. Two Senate committees conducting the investigation want to know if they money was intended as a bribe, to influence Senator Case's vote on the natural gas bill, which the Senate passed last night. (The measure would exempt natural gas producers from direct federal price controls. Case voted against it.) One of the two committees looking into the matter was appointed today by Vice President Nixon, after the Senate voted unanimously for an investigation. It is a bipartisan committee..made up of two Democrats and two Republicans.. with Senator George as chairman. The other group is the regular Senate Elections Subcommittee, of which Senator Hennings is chairman. And already there is quite a bit of rivalry between them. Senator Case was asked by both committees to testify at 2 o'clock this afternoon. He chose to accept the invitation of the special bipartisan committee..although later he did meet briefly with the Hennings group. Case is scheduled to appear before the special committee again on Friday. Meantime, the committee has issued six subpoenas. One of the subpoenas is for John Neff, the Lexington, Nebraska attorney who offered Case the 25-hundred-dollar donation, Neff, who has insisted there were "no strings" attached to the gift, says he welcomes the investigation. Two other subpoenas are for E.J. Kahler and John Griffin, both of Sioux Falls, South Dakota, with whom at various times the money was entrusted for safe keeping. And the three remaining subpoenas are for members of Case's staff. The Hennings committee has also subpoenaed Neff, to appear at a public hearing on Monday.

Democratic Senator Kilgore asked the Justice Department today to investigate the disorders arising over the admission of a Negro student to the University of Alabama. The student..Autherine Lucy..was splattered with eggs yesterday by a mob protesting her attendance at the school And last night the university board of trustees ordered her excluded from classes "until further notice." Kilgore, who is chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, asked the Justice Department to find out whether any federal statutes had been violated. "If our nation is to uphold the banner of democracy", he said, "it cannot under any circumstances permit such despicalbe incidents." The attorney for Autherine Lucy has told the university he will take legal action if she is not reinstated within 48 hours. She had been admitted to the school, originally, by order of the United States District Court.

In Los Angeles, Adlai Stevenson told a group of Negro leaders today that he favors desegregation. "But", he said, "you do not upset the tradition of generations overnight." Stevenson said his principal concern, at this time, is to see that the Negro is able to vote, no matter what part of the country he lives in. "The basic assumption of democracy," he said, "is that you have not only the right but the duty to vote."

President Eisenhower met with Republican congressional leaders today and urged them to press for a speedy action on his farm program. House Republican Leader Martin said there was no discussion of a possible presidential veto of a farm measure calling for high, rigid price supports..instead of the lower flexible supports advocated by the Administration. The Senate Agriculture Committee voted tentatively last week to restore rigid, high supports on cotton, wheat, corn, peanuts and rice.

The government announced today that 1-million, 274-thousand fewer persons had jobs in January than in December..due to less manufacturing activity. Still, nearly 63-million persons were employed in January. And for the month, that's a record high.

Washington sources say that Trevor Gardner, assistant secretary of the Air Force in charge of research, may resign because of a disagreement over the development of new weapons. Gardner reportedly feels that more money should be spend for military research, especially in the field of guided missiles. Presumably, this is in addition to new funds requested by President Eisenhower in his budget message. Tonight, Gardner is in the Bahamas, conferring with Secretary of Defense Wilson, who is taking a brief vacation.

Secretary of State Dulles told his weekly news conference today that the United States is giving careful study to Soviet Premier Bulganin's new offer of a 20-year friendship treaty. Dulles said this country wants to see if there is anything in the latest Bulganin message on which something constructive can be built. The United States and Great Britain, he revelaed, have formally notified the United Nations of their belief that the U.N.. truce team in Palestine should be enlarged, as a means of preventing war British Prime Minister Eden expressed his endorsement of this plan today, at a news conference in Ottawa, but Eden said he thought any concrete proposals for a larger international patrol ought to come from Israel and the Arab states. Tomorrow, representatives of the United States, Britain and France will meet in Washington to consider this problem of preserving peace in the Middle East. Ed Murrow, incidentally, is in Israel tonight. And we will have a report from him in a moment.

Communist China accused the United States today of committing a "provacative act" in sending what it claimed were military reconnaisance balloons over Chinese territory. Communist Albania made a similar accusation today.. all in line with the Russian complaint, last week-end, that American balloons equipped with cameras were passing over Soviet territory. The United States explained yesterday that the Russian protest apparently referred to high-altitude weather baloons which had been released in Europe by out Air Force. Secretary Dulles told his news conference today that the United States has the right to send these weather baloons wherever it chooses. But if any nation has strong objections, he said, the United States is "disposed to try" to keep the balloons from crossing that country's frontiers. He conceded that this is a point on which international law is a bit obscure.

In Algeria, French Premier Mollet conferred with French and Moslem leaders today, in an effort to solve the nationalist problem. There were no new disorders in Algiers where all public gatherings have been banned, but thousands of French colonists staged an anti-Mollet demonstration in the city of Constantine, 200 miles to the east. The French settlers oppose Mollet, because they are afraid he will grant the Arabs more political rights. And French ex-servicemen living in Algeria have formed what they call a Committee of Public Safety, which insists on the maintanance of full soverignty for France. Nevertheless, Mollet told a news conference in Algiers today that he will stick to his promise to give the Arabs equal voting rights with the French settlers.

It was announced today, in England, that Malaya will be granted full independence within the British Commonwealth on August 31st, 1957. Malaya is presently a British protectorate with colonial status. Negotiations looking toward its independence have been in progress for several weeks.

In his journeyings around Israel, Ed Murrow has gone down to the region of Beersheba and the Dead Sea. Tonight, his recorded report might be titled "The Realization of a Dream."

MURROW: This is Beerhheba, in Israel. It's Market Day here. The Bedouin tribesmen arrived on the bare, dusty plot of land of the edge of town- camels, chickens, eggs, burros, sheep, goats; little mounds of barley being weighed out on primitive scales; dust and stench and the noises of camels. And in the background, a towering and brand-new grain elevator, a modern hotel, attractive theatre, a gleaming white medical clinic. A 25-ton truck rolled along the road, and beside the road was a tree that may have been planted by Abraham. The truck was loaded with potash being hauled up from the Dead Sea. The Bedouin were mostly in heated argument. They wore old Army overcoats, shoes with no laces, occasionally a pair of sandals; the children were barefoot and dirty. Little enough romance here in the market place.

Six years ago this was a village of three hundred families. The Israelis took it in their war of independence, and in the last four years they've made it a city of about 25,000 - neat homes, just on the edge of the Negev. The country south of here is rather like that in the more arid parts of New Mexico, brown and gently rolling. Over here there is occasionally a camel or a herd of sheep on the skyline.

This afternoon we traveled down to the Dead Sea, lowest point on this earth's surface, 1200 feet below sea level. The trip down reminds one of the Grand Canyon and the Bad Lands rolled into one. The road was built in about two years. At the botton is a plant capable of pruducing two million tons of salt per year. It's now producing 135 tons of potash and some magnesium - all from the water of the Dead Sea. The water is pumped into shallow lakes, where much of it evaporates. The brine is them pumped into the factory and converted, and the big trucks start the long haul to Beershéba. There is a Jordanian village just across the sea, an snow-capped mountain in the distance. Going down, we were discussing with an Israeli official the location of a new power line. We asked him about their strategic locations, and he laughed and said, "The whole conntry is vulnerable, so we don't have to worry too much about that sort of thing."

This country is living on a shoestring in more ways than one. So much of it resembles a shoestring stretched along the edge of the Mediterranean. After three days here one wonders how it was created and whether it can survive. This is a Jewish melting pot; newspapers published in sixteen languages, ten political parties, a record of much division and internal wrangling during both peace and war. Israel is the realization of a dream. Some say it is a crime against economics - and it's a place of enormous energy and hard work. In places they have in fact made the desert bloom; in some places it blooms naturally at this time of year. They have planted enormous numbers of trees, there is a ferment of building. One slope there will be those little tin shacks originally inhabited by the immigrant; a little higher up, a row of better wooden houses; and higher still, the permanent homes build of stone or concrete. The goats are now living in the tin shacks where the immigrants first lived.

I have never seen the carrying of arms so common amongst civilians. The rifle and hand-gun go along even on bus trips, on vacations. The keeping of arms is an old custom in this country -- only now it is done openly. Every man here serves two-and-a-half years in the Army and remains in the reserve till 45. The women serve only two years. I am told by competent military experts that their mobilization system is as vast and comprehensive as any in the world. I have seen the Army only at company strength. Their weapons were clean, and they moved with that combination of speed and casualness which marks well-trained troops. They aren't afraid to offer suggestions to their superior officers.

They are obviously physically fit. I talked with one squad, chosen at random, and found boys from Poland, Roumania, Morocco, Iraq, Czechoslovakia, as well as Irrael.

There is a sense of urgency and of fatalism in this country, no tension or excitement, but rather a belief in the future which no one can see. Some obviously came here expecting a Garden of Eden. It isn't here. This is a hard life, at least in the country, but there is pride of accomplishment and physical results to prove it.

This is Ed Murrow recording in Beersheba.

COLLINGWOOD: Tomorrow, Mr. Murrow plans to visit an Arab village in northern Israel. And we will try to bring you a report tomorrow night on his impressions.

This is Charles Collingwood. I'll be back in a moment with a Footnote to the Day's News. But first, here is Bob Hall.

HALL: COMMERCIAL

COLLINGWOOD: Four high school boys in Illinois telephoned the Kremlin today for help on a theme they were asked to write for school on Russia's latest peace proposals. They asked for Premier Bulganin and got a man who said he was Bulganin. One of the boys asked whether any more proposals were forthcoming. "No, no " said the man.."I don't know." At that the boy got flustered and said the word for goodbye in Russian which he had learned. There was a chuckle on the other end and the receiver dropped.

This is Charles Collingwood. See you tomorrow.

Collingwood for Murrow Wed., Feb. 8, 1956

Good evening:

President Eisenhower hinted strongly today that he will announce his second-term decision around the first of March. What Mr. Eisenhower actually said at his weekly news conference was: "I ought to have as much information by the end of this month as I am going to get." Then he added:

(tape runs :28
(
(ends on cue: "--I think I'll have that information soon."

Mr. Eisenhower went on to say that he probably will announce his decision at a news conference, and then make a long explanation of his decision at a place other than at a news conference. This has aroused speculation that he might explain the decision in a nationwide broadcast. ~~In any case, he said, he would never~~ again go out ~~barnstorming around the country.~~ Mr. Eisenhower said if he does not seek re-election, he would have no objection to Chief Justice Warren as the Republican candidate. But he doubted very much that it would be proper for him to ask Warren to run. ~~The President indicated at his last news conference~~ that he would expect Warren to resign ~~from the Supreme Court, before taking any part in such a campaign. He felt politics and the Supreme Court should not get mixed up together.~~ Warren, of course, has said that under no circumstances would he leave the court to seek political office.

President Eisenhower said tonight that restoration of a rigid price support program for the nation's farmers would "defeat the main object" of creating a soil bank to reduce crop surpluses. The Senate Agriculture Committee has tentatively approved high rigid supports. The President made his statement in a letter to Republican Senator Aiken of Vermont.

On other subjects, Mr. Eisenhower said he has not decided to sign, or veto, the natural gas bill. ~~That measure... passed day before yesterday... would exempt natural gas producers from direct federal price controls.~~ The President said today that he has always felt the federal government should not interfere with the states any more than is absolutely necessary. He said that as long as he is in friendly correspondence with Soviet Premier Bulganin, there will always be a chance---no matter how small---for an East-West settlement. ~~He has not completed his reply to Bulganin's latest proposal for a friendship treaty.~~ Mr. Eisenhower promised to do everything within his constitutional powers, to prevent an outbreak of hostilities in the Middle East. He pointed out that American,

British and French diplomats were meeting in Washington today to determine what measures might best be taken. They will discuss proposals for lessening the risk of war... and what action to take if war finally does break out between Israel and the Arab states.

Today... in the Gaza strip... members of the Egyptian-Israeli truce commission met for the first time in more than four months. The meeting was held at a point on the United Nations truce line, for the purpose of arranging further sessions at which [redacted] both sides will be able to air their complaints. (Mr. Murrow is still in Israel, and we'll have a report from him in a few minutes).

In Cairo today, an Egyptian spokesman said an agreement in principle has been reached with the World Bank for financing the Aswan Dam... a huge hydroelectric project which would cost more than a billion dollars and irrigate two million acres of land. The World Bank reportedly has offered Egypt a loan of 250-million dollars to help build the dam.

Informed sources in Cairo say that Russia has offered arms to the Arab kingdom of Yemen. Yemen is located on the Arabian Peninsula, bounded on one side by Saudi Arabia and on the other by Aden, a small British protectorate. Great Britain and Yemen have often disagreed on boundary questions.

Britain granted full self-government today to the Federation of Malaya, as the first step toward complete independence. Malaya will obtain independence, within the British Commonwealth, in August, 1957.

Three more Soviet satellites... Albania, Bulgaria and Czechoslovakia... filed notes at United Nations headquarters today, protesting the appearance of United States weather balloons over their territory. At the same time, the American ambassador delivered a note in Moscow, explaining that the balloons are equipped with "safety devices" so as not to constitute a hazard to air traffic. But henceforth, to avoid misunderstanding, we will try to keep the weather balloons from drifting over Soviet territory. The State Dept said for the time being no more balloons will be launched from Germany + Turkey —

In Washington, the assistant secretary of the Air Force in charge of research, confirmed today that he has submitted his resignation. Trevor Gardner said he was quitting because of "an honest difference of opinion about the importance and scope of the AIR Force research and development program." Mr. Gardner made it plain that this included a difference of opinion about guided missiles. A crash program to develop an intercontinental ballistics missile, he said, "is badly needed." He said there is lack of support for such a program. President Eisenhower was asked about this today at his news conference... and he said the United States is giving top priority to this problem. He conceded Russia might be ahead of us in certain phases of missiles production... but he was sure that, in other fields, we are ahead.

General Ridgway testified before a House military appropriations subcommittee today, regarding his charge (in a magazine article) that some [redacted] defense cuts were based on politics. Ridgway wrote that these cuts took place when he was Army chief of staff. He gave his testimony today behind closed doors. No report so far on what he said.

Democratic Senator Hennings announced tonight that his elections subcommittee will not investigate that 25-hundred-dollar campaign contribution to Senator Francis Case... until the special Senate committee appointed to look into the matter is through with its investigation.

→

In this way, he said, the two investigations will not conflict. Hennings said he plans to resign from the elections subcommittee "very shortly".

President Eisenhower sent Congress a special message today, calling on it to overhaul the nation's immigration laws... so as to eliminate present "inequities". He proposed that 220-thousand foreigners be allowed to enter this country every year as permanent residents. That's about 65-thousand more than the present annual quota. He also asked that the requirement that visitors be fingerprinted be eliminated.

At his news conference today, Mr. Eisenhower described as "deplorable" the outbreak of rioting at the University of Alabama because of the admission of a Negro student. He said he hoped to avoid federal interference in the case, as long as there is any chance that university and state officials will straighten the matter out. The attorney for the student... Autherine Lucy... says he will take the case to the courts tomorrow, if she is not reinstated by that time. An official of the university said today that some persons in the mob that rushed her on Monday were screaming, "Let's kill her!" but, he said, they were outsiders, not students. Incidentally, an organization in Denmark invited Autherine Lucy today to enroll in the University of Copenhagen. The group... called the League for Tolerance... even offered to pay the costs of transportation to Denmark. But she declined.

Connie Mack, the grand old man of baseball, died in Germantown, Pennsylvania today at the age of 93. Connie Mack was manager of the Philadelphia Athletics for 50 years. And before his retirement in 1950, had led his team to five world championships. He had been in failing health since last fall, when he suffered a broken hip.

Ed Murrow recorded his latest report from Tel Aviv, where he interviewed Moshe Sharett, the Israeli foreign minister. He begins his report by saying:

(tape runs 4:25
(
(ends on cue: "This is Ed Murrow recording from Tel Aviv."

Sometime tomorrow, Mr. Murrow will board a plane to bring him back to the United States. Perhaps on Friday... certainly by next Monday... he will be back at this microphone. This is Charles Collingwood. I'll be back in a moment with a footnote to the day's news. (pause) But first, Bob Dixon.

FOOTNOTE

They've been holding an unusual trading session in Kansas City -- the directors of midwest zoos have been meeting to buy, sell, or trade their surplus stock... Not much action, because zoo men, like other traders all want to keep their good stuff and trade off their bad. For instance the Brookfield, Illinois Zoo has an AOUDAD, an Asiatic sheep -- friendly, too, the Director said... "Last year she only ate about a hundred dollars worth of chiffon frocks off little girls."..... no takers.

THIS IS CHARLES COLLINGWOOD.... SEE YOU TOMORROW

RADIO DIVISION

EDWARD R. MURROW - Charles Collingwood

Wednesday, February 8, 1956
7:45-8:00 p.m.

MURROW: This is Tel Aviv! A friend of mine said today "it's easier to live in Israel than to understand it." For example, there is slightly less than two hundred thousand Arabs still living in this country. They are obviously a potential fifth column. I talked with the Mayor and the Superintendent of the schools of an Arab village; population about forty-five hundred. They told me they had complete political equality. About 90% of the village voted in the last election. Their teachers were paid the same as teachers in the Jewish schools. Within the last year water has been brought to the village and now there is a faucet in every home. Water is no longer carried in from the well. Health has improved. The Mayor said everyone in the village listened to the Arabic broadcast from across the borders. He said the people in his village would like to have their neighbors and relatives who have left THE country; would like to have them come back. The Israeli Government, he said, was gradually doing something about reuniting families. He and his fellow-Arabs had to get a permit to travel in Israel. That, he said, was abit of a nuisance but aside from that he had no complaint.

There are some rather startling figures published in this morning's paper. Approximately 70% of Israel's imports are now being paid for by German reparations or other non-recurring funds. Immigrants are still coming in at the rate of four or five thousand a month. A planeload from India this morning, a shipload from Morocco tomorrow. These people must be housed, fed, given jobs, taught Hebrew and in many cases must be taught elementary personal hygiene and the use of modern cooking and eating utensils. This formidable task does not appear to confound officials in Jerusalem. Last night I raised the questions of balance of payment, the defense budget, the whole matter of how Israel could become a sound economic unit with Foreign Minister Sharett. He said he did not know the answerand added with complete seriousness that he believed in miracles, that the creation and survival of the State was in itself a miracle. He denied that Israel had any expansionist designs and contended that it would grow upward than outward; smaller farms, more people on less ground, greater concentration of factories. Mr. Sharett said the U. N. vote of censure came as no surprise, that it was regarded as a single isolated case without regard to the whole series of provocations and border incidents that had preceded it. He echoed what Prime Minister Ben-Gurion had told me a few days earlier, namely, that there is no possibility of Israel's accepting paper guarantees as a substitute for defensive arms. Sharett maintained that due to the size and location of Israel an Arab attack might well prove decisive before debate, consultation and action by the U. N., or any other group of powers, could produce effective retaliation or defense.

Right now, this country could be accurately described as a garrison state. The chief-of-staff told me yesterday something which is obvious even to the casual observer, that the collective farms, particularly those along the frontier, are an integral part of the defense system, that a well-organized kibbutz is the equivalent of a well-trained company, permanently in position, familiar with every inch of terrain and deeply rooted in the soil. Its defense requirements are equally obvious: aircraft, artillery and armor. I watched some paratroopers in action yesterday. They were as good as any I have ever seen, all volunteers. They get a dollar-and-a-half extra a month as "jump" pay. One of them laughingly explained: "We're all mercenaries." The women serve only two years in the army, are paid about five dollars a month. The only way they can escape service is to get married. But in spite of the universal military character of the country there is more political and personal freedom here than anywhere else in the Middle East. There are ten political parties, ranging from Right to Left, including a small Communist Party. There are ten daily newspapers. They are free to contend that Ben-Gurion is incompetent or that Sharett's foreign policy is leading the country to disaster, and some of them do. Some of the immigrants, who had never known freedom before, find it a heady wine in a country where they had been led to believe everything was milk and honey. There is no doubt that there are people here who are both bitter and disappointed. No one in the Government tries to conceal it,but their number is not considerable. This is the smallest melting pot with the greatest variety of ingredients and nearer the hot fire of Arab nationalism than has ever before been seen. No one pretends to see the future clearly, but no one seems to fear it. If a miracle is required, and it may be, there seems to be a feeling in this country that one is just around the corner.

This is Ed Murrow recording from Tel Aviv.

Ed.trans.-A.A.Cardiff (30)

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

CHARLES COLLINGWOOD REPORTING:

Good Evening:

President Eisenhower hinted strongly today that he will announce his second-term decision atound the first of March. What Mr. Eisenhower actually said at his weekly news conference was: "I ought to have as much information by the end of this month as I am going to get." Then he added:

EISENHOWER: I now should have some inkling of what the job demands, and its strains, its emotional strains, its periods of intense concentration, and I should know, therefore, from my own feeling, as much as anything else, and I think I will probably trust my own feelings more than I will the doctor's reports, so I am just trying to be honest in saying I will give an answer as quickly as I possibly can. And I think I will have that information soon.

COLLINGWOOD: Mr. Eisenhower went on to say that he probably will announce his decision at a news conference, and then make a long explanation of his decision at a place other than at a news conference. This has aroused speculation that he might explain the decision in a nationwide broadcast. Mr. Eisenhower said if he does not seek re-election, he would have no objection to Chief Justice Warren as the Republican candidate. But he doubted very much that it would be proper for him to ask Warren to run. Warren, of course, has said that under no circomstances would he leave the court to seek political office.

President Eisenhower said tonight that restoration of a rigid price support program for the nation's farmers would "defeat the main object" of creating a soil bank to reduce crop surpluses. The Senate Agriculture Committee has tentatively approved high rigid supports. The President made his statement in a letter to Republican Senator Aiken of Vermont.

On other subjects, Mr. Eisenhower said he has not decided to sign, or veto the natural gas bill. The President said today that he has always felt the federal government should not interfere with the states any more than is absolutely necessary.

He said that as long as he is in friendly correspondence with Soviet Premier Bulganin, there will always be a chance -- no matter show small-- for East-West settlement. Mr. Eisenhower promised to do everything within his constitutional powers, to prevent an outbreak of hostilities in the Middle East. He pointed out that American, British and French diplomats were meeting in Washington today to determine what measures might best be taken. They will discuss proposals for lessening the risk of war..and what action to take if war finally does break out between Israel and the Arab states.

Today..in the Gaza strip..members of the Egytian-Israeli truce commission met for the first time in more than four months. The meeting was held at a point on the United Nations truce line, for the purpose of arranging further sessions at which both sides will be able to air their complaints. (Mr. Murrow is still in Israel, and we'll have a report from him in a few minutes.)

In Cario today, an Egyptian spokesman said an agreement in principle has been reached with the World Bank for financing the Aswan Dam..a huge hydro-electric project which would cost more than a billion dollars and irrigate two million acres of land. The World Bank reportedly has offered Egypt a loan of 250-million dollars to help build the dam.

Informed sources in Cairo say that Russia has offered arms to the Arab kingdom of Yemen. Yemen is located on the Arabian Peninsula, bounded on one side by Saudi Arabia and on the other by Aden, a small British protectorate. Great Britain and Yemen have often disagreed on boundry questions.

Britain granted full self-government today to the Federation of Malaya, as the first step toward complete independence. Malaya will obtain independence, within the British Commonwealth, in August, 1957.

Three more Soviet satellites..Albania, Bulgaria, and Czechoslovakia.. filed notes at United Nations headquarters today, protesting the appearance of United States weather balloons over their territory. At the same time, the American ambassador delivered a note in Moscow, explaining that the balloons are equipped with "safety devices" so as not to constitute a hazard to air traffic. But henceforth, to avoid misunderstanding, we will ry to keep the weather balloons from drifting over Soviet territory. The State Department said for the time being, no more balloons will be launched from Germany and Turkey.

In Washington, the assistant secretary of the Air Force in charge of research confirmed today that he has submitted his resignation. Trevor Gardner said he was quitting because of "an honest difference of opinion about the importance and scope of the air Force research and development program." Mr. Gardner made it plain that this included a difference of opinion about guided missiles. A crash program to develop an intercontinental ballistics missile, he said, "is badly needed." He said there is lack of support for such a program. President Eisenhower was asked about this today at his news conference..and he said the United States is giving top priority to this problem. He conceded Russia might be ahead of us in certain phases of missile production..but he was sure that, in other fields, we are ahead.

General Ridgway testified before a House military appropriations subcommittee today, regarding his charge (in a magazine article) that some defense cuts took place when he was Army chief of staff. He gave his testimony today behind closed doors. No report so far on what he said.

Democratic Senator Hennings announced tonight that his elections subcommittee will not investigate that 25-hundred- dollar campaign contribution to Senator Francis Case..until the special Senata committee appointed to look into the matter is through with its investigation. In this way, he said, the two investigations will not conflict. Hennings said he plans to resign from the elections subcommittee "very shortly."

President Eisenhower sent Congress a special message today, calling on it to overhaul the nation's immigration laws..so as to eliminate present "inequities". He proposed that 220-thousand foreigners be allowed to enter this country every year as permanent residents. That's about 65-thousand more then the present annual quota. He also asked that the requirement that visitors be fingerprinted be eliminated.

At his news conference today, Mr. Eisenhower described as "deplorable" the outbreak of rioting at the University of Alabama because of the admission of a Negro student. He said he hoped to avoid federal interference in the case as long as there is any chance that university and state officials will stratighen the matter out. The attorney for the student..Autherine Lucy.. says he will take the case to the courts tomorrow, if she is not reinstated by that time. An official of the university said today that some persons in the mob that rushed her on Monday were screaming, "Let's kill her!", but, he said, they were outsiders, not students. Incidentally, an organization in Denmark invited Autherine Lucy today to enroll in the University of Copenhagen. The group..cllled the League for Tolerance..even offered to pay the costs of transportation to Denmark. But she declined.

Connie Mack, the grand old man of baseball, died in Germantown, Pennsylvania today at the age of 93. Connie Mack was manager of the Philadelphia Atheltics for 50 years. And before his retirement in 1950, had led his team to five world championships. He had been in failing health since last fall, when he suffered a broken hip.

Ed Murrow recorded his leatest report from Tel Aviv, where he interviewed Moshe Sharett, the Israeli foreign minister. He begins his report by saying:

MURROW: There are some rather startling figures published in this morning's paper. Approximately 70 % of Israel's imports are now being paid for by German reparations or other non-recurring funds. Immigrants are still coming in at the rate of four or five thousand a month. A plane load from India this morning a shipload from Morocco tomorrow. These people must be housed, fed, given jobs, taught Hebrew and in many cases must be taught elementary personal hygiene and the use of modern cooking and eating utensils. This formidable task does not appear to confound officials in Jerusalem. Last night I raised the questions of balance of payment, the defense budget, the whole matter of how Israel could become a sound economic unit with Foreign Minister Sharett. He said he did not know the answer and added with complete seriousness that he believed in miracles, that the creation and survival of the State was in itself a miracle. He denied that Israel had any expansionist designs and contended that it would grow upward than outward; smaller farms, more people on less ground, greater concentration of factories. Mr. Sharett said the U.N. vote of censure came as no surprise, that it was regarded as a singel-isolated case without regard to the whole series of provocations and border incidents that had preceded it. He echoed what Prime Minister Ben-Gurion had told me a few days earlier, namely, that there is no possibility of Israel's accepting paper guarantees as a substitute for defensive arms. Sharett maintained that due to the size and location of Israel and Arab attack might well prove decisive before debate, consultation and action by the U.N., or any other group of powers, could produce effective retaliation or defense.

Right now, this country could be accurately described as a garrison state. The chief-of-staff told me yesterday something which is obvious even to the casual observer, that the collective farms, particularly those along the frontier, are an integral part of the defense system, that a well-organized kibbutz is the equivalent of a well-trained company, permanently in position, familiar with every inch of terrain and deeply rooted in the soil. Its defense requriements are equally obvious: aircraft, artillery and armour. I watched some paratroopers in action yesterday. They were as good as any I have ever seen, all volunteers. They get a dollar-and-a-half extra a month as "jump" pay. One of them laughingly explained: "We're all mercenaries." The women serve only two years in the army, are paid about five dollars a month. The only way they can excape service is to get married. But in spite of the universal military character of the country there is more political and personal freedom here than anywhere else in the Middle East. There are ten political parties, ranging from Right to Left, including a small Communist Party. There are ten daily newspapers. They are free to contend that Ben-Gurion is incompetent or that Sharett's foreign policy is leading the country to disaster, and some of them do. Some of the immigrants, who had never known freedom before, find it a heady wine in a country where they had been led to believe everhthing was milk and honey. There is no doubt that there are people here who are both bitter and disappointed. No one in the Government tries to conceal it, but their number is not considerable. This is the smallest melting pot with the greatest variety of ingredients and nearer the hot fire of Arab nationalism than has ever before been seen. No one pretends to see the future clearly, but no one seems to fear it. If a miracle is required, and it may be, there seems to be a feeling in this country that one is just around the corner.

This is Ed Murrow recording from Tel Aviv.

COLLINGWOOD: Sometime tomorrow, Mr. Murrow will board a plane to bring him back to the United States. Perhaps on Friday..certainly by next Monday.he will be back at this microphone. This is Charles Collingwood. I'll be back in a moment with a footnote to the day's news. But first, Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

COLLINGWOOD: They've been holding an unusual trading session in Kassas City--the directors of midwest zoos havee been meeting to buy, sell, or trade their surplus stock..not much action, because zoo men, like other traders all want to keep their good stuff and trade off their bad. For instance the Brookfield, Illinois Zoo has an AOUDAD, an Asiatic sheep--friendly, too, the Director said..."Last year she only ate about a hundred dollars worth of chiffon frocks off little girls.".....no takers.

This is Charles Collingwood...See you tomorrow.

Collingwood for Murrow Thurs., Feb. 9, 1956

Good evening:

The Senate Agriculture Committee is defying President Eisenhower's warning of a possible presidential veto... if it goes ahead and writes rigid high price supports into a farm program. The Agriculture Committee has gone into a night session, and Democratic Chairman Ellender says the session will not break up until it has completed action on a farm measure. The indications are it will write high rigid supports into the bill. Republican Senator Young... who is a member of the committee... said this afternoon that the group already has voted, 9 to 6, in favor of supporting quality milling wheat at 90 percent of parity. Last week, the committee lined up for similar high rigid supports for corn, peanuts, cotton and rice. Mr. Eisenhower said last night that such supports would sabotage his "soil bank" program.

President Eisenhower has accepted the resignation of Trevor Gardner as assistant secretary of the Air Force for research and development. The resignation is effective Saturday. Gardner told a news conference yesterday ~~that he and the Administration have had "honest differences" regarding~~ the development of guided ~~missiles~~ that he believes a "crash program" for guided missiles is necessary. And President Eisenhower said yesterday that the United States already is giving top priority to this problem. Several congressional committees have indicated they would like to hear Gardner's views.

Senator George said today that his special Senate investigating committee is going to concentrate on the 25-hundred-dollar campaign contribution offered to Senator Francis Case... during the debate on the natural gas bill. George indicated that his committee, which starts hearings tomorrow, will not try to bring out the names of other senators who might have received similar contributions. He said he doubted the committee had that authority.

A congressman died today. Representative Chauncey Reed of Illinois succumbed in Bethesda Naval Hospital after a long illness. He was 65... and had served in the House since 1935.

In Birmingham, Alabama today, Autherine Lucy... through her attorney... filed suit in United States District Court to compel the University of Alabama to allow her to resume her college course. And the case was set for hearing on February 29th. Miss Lucy was suspended from the university last Tuesday, after the car she was riding in was stoned and she was splattered with eggs. Tonight, President Meany of the AFL-CIO urged President Eisenhower to broaden the scope of the FBI investigation of this "defiance of law", to include other instances of violence against members of the Negro race in Alabama.

In Washington today, a federal judge upheld the right of the State Department to use confidential information in denying a passport. Judge Joseph McGarraghy (MUH-GAIR-UH-GEE) ruled in the case of Weldon Dayton, a Corning New York scientist... and said the denial of his passport application had been "a reasonable exercise of discretion under valid regulations." Federal Judge Youngdahl ruled last November... in another passport case... that the State Department must base such decisions only on evidence appearing on the record. The question is expected, ultimately, to reach the Supreme Court.

Russia put some American weather balloons on display today in Moscow. Foreign correspondents who were called in to see the exhibition... in the courtyard of an old palace... were told that the balloons were designed for military reconnaissance, not for gathering weather information as the United States has insisted, and that America is using the balloons to further a "brink of war" policy. The Russian official... who lectured the newsmen... completely ignored the fact that the United States announced yesterday it was halting the launching of weather balloons from West Germany and Turkey, so they would no longer drift over Soviet territory. The idea occurred to western observers in Moscow that the Russians had gone to a lot of work in preparing their propaganda display, and couldn't stand to see it go to waste. The Russians even had television cameras set up today to catch the show.

Student rioting broke out in Madrid today for the third straight day. For the first time, there was an exchange of gunfire. At least 20 students were hurt, and one of them may have died. The battle was waged between students who support the Falangist Party, the only political party allowed in Spain, and those who oppose it. The police are reported to have made 40 arrests.

French Premier Mollet has named his economics affairs minister, Robert LaCoste, to be the new resident minister in Algeria. LaCoste replaces General Catroux, whose resignation was forced earlier this week by the rioting of French colonists in Algeria. Mollet made a broadcast in Algiers tonight condemning both French and Moslem extremists for resorting to violence... and appealing for a settlement by peaceful means.

Prime Minister Segni of Italy ended a conference today with West German leaders in Bonn. A joint communique said Italy and West Germany regard German reunification, on the basis of free elections, as an "indispensable precondition" to lasting peace. It also said both countries will continue to work for the union of Europe and effective European defense.

Another joint communique was issued today in Cairo... announcing an agreement whereby the World Bank will loan Egypt 200-million dollars to help it build the high Aswan Dam. The project... altogether... will cost more than a billion dollars.

Ceylon is reported to have turned down an offer... by Communist Hungary... to barter 70-thousand tons of rice. Hungary had got the rice from Burma, and wanted to exchange it for goods from Ceylon, such as rubber. But Ceylon already has a surplus of rice.

A new cold wave has swept over Europe... and the European death toll [redacted] is now placed at 208. [redacted] Food shortages are reported in parts of Greece, Turkey, and Italy. Sub-zero temperatures [redacted] are predicted [redacted] for Germany. Rome had its heaviest snow[redacted] in 16 years, [redacted] and dozens of Italian villages are snowbound . American GI's in Italy are rushing supplies to some of the marooned towns in 10-ton Army trucks.

All seven men aboard that Navy plane... lost in the Antarctic since last Friday... have been rescued. The missing plane was sighted early today, and the Navy reports: "All hands are safe and well."

Ed Murrow is on his way home. Before leaving Israel this morning he recorded this report on a small... and yet not so small... border incident.

(tape rune 5:00
(
(ends on cue: "This is Ed Murrow recording from Tel Aviv."

A little while ago, I am told, Mr. Murrow left Paris by plane on the last lap of his journey home. And so tomorrow night, weather permitting, he will be back at this microphone. This is Charles Collingwood. I'll be back in a moment with a footnote to the day's news. (pause) But, first, here is Bob Hall.

FOOTNOTE

Dr. Paul Dudley White, the President's heart specialist is cruising off the coast of Lower California trying to take an electrocardiograph of a gray whale. The problem is to first catch your whale. A small boat of the expedition approached a mother whale and her calf to get the apparatus on and got its side stove in for its pains. After chasing many whales, Dr. White has diagnosed their character as: "elusive, sagacious, formidable and wary."

THIS IS CHARLES COLLINGWOOD... ~~SEE YOU~~ Mr. Nixon TOMORROW

CBS RADIO DIVISION

EDWARD R. MURROW - Charles Collingwood

Thursday, February 9, 1956
7:45-8:00 p.m.

MURROW: Today I saw one of the smallest problems ever presented to the United Nations. It will never make a headline. It's unlikely to engage the attention of the Security Council, but it is part of the continuing crisis in this part of the country. The incident occurred yesterday, at one-thirty in the afternoon, local time. It was up in the northern tip of Israel, that little finger of land that stretches up between Syria and Lebanon, up above the Sea of Galilee and the hills of Canaan. And 18-year-old shepherd was tending a flock of sheep belonging to the collective farm of Dan. He was unarmed. His flock consisted of three hundred and thirty sheep. They were grazing about four hundred yards from the Syrian frontier. Three men in Arab dress, presumably Syrians, crossed the frontier. One of them had a rifle. He pointed it at the shepherd. The shepherd ran for help. The sheep were driven across the unmarked frontier. United Nations Truce Supervisors were called.

This afternoon we drove up to the scene (of the incident) ~~[illegible]~~. About five hundred people live there. The Secretary of the kibbutz confirmed the facts. The flock was thoroughbred, built up over twelve years, during which butter fat content had been more than doubled. The sheep lost were worth something like twenty-five thousand dollars. Three hundred and twelve sheep were missing. A few, with new lambs, had refused to cross the frontier. We stood with the Secretary about three hundred yards from the unmarked frontier. The tracks leading to Syria were clearly visible. We asked him whether he was tempted to take his men and their guns and get the sheep back. He said that wouldn't be much of a problem; it could be done but that will disturb the tranquility and the peace. He could only hope that the U. N. would get the flock back, but he wasn't very hopeful. Thirty cows were taken from a nearby settlement six months ago and still haven't been returned.

The young shepherd said he was scared when that gun was pointed at him. He ran for help. He thought after this he would carry a rifle when he took the flock out to graze. In case they got the flock, or some part of it back, that would be up to the United Nations.

Kibbutz Dan was the first collective farm where we have heard no singing. There was the usual mud, the bare benches and tables in the dining hall. Women in rubber boots working in the kitchen that mass-produces the food. Barbed wire and trenches around the main compound. Up on the hillside, only six or seven hundred yards away, across the frontier, sheep were grazing. They might have been part of the flock stolen yesterday. Kibbutz Dan was in a mood to fight rather than sing, but the place was calm. This is not to say that the Israelis have not engaged in similar provocations, but in this situation their frontiers cannot be crossed. It is only possible to report what one sees and hears. In what is generally called "informed circles" one hears that Israel will have nothing to do with the scheme of a larger neutral corridor ~~(word indistinct)~~ and more U. N. observers. It is pointed that to narrow the perimeter of Israel by one kilometer, slightly less than one mile, would mean the loss of about 5% of Israel's territory. In many cases, they would lose farms, ~~(one word indistinct)~~, would have to give up strategic defensive positions, in some cases whole villages. There is no possibility that this country will agree to anything like the twentieth-century mandate, to become a ward of the U. N. or the United States. Dependent upon one or the other for defense or survival is unthinkable to the people who live here. That may or may not be regarded as a reasonable and rational attitude, but that's what it is.

The memory of a war for both independence and survival is still very fresh here. In military circles there is the obvious need for arms, but there is nothing approaching panic as a result of the arms being supplied to Egypt by the Communist powers. It is believed that Egypt has received more equipment than she can man, that some of it may be, in effect, a stockpile for a future Communist use. Some of it may filter out to other Arab states in an effort to increase Egypt's stature. There is no belief here that war will be started by some border incident and so far as a visitor can tell there is no fear here that a war will be lost if it comes. There is here at present a confidence borne of a war and independence recently won against powerful odds. There may be overconfidence about the future. The Israelis may underestimate the Arab potential, but as of now there are no signs of jitters around this narrow strip of land beside the Mediterranean.

(?)

This is Ed Murrow recording in Tel Aviv.

Ed.trans.-A.A.Cardiff (30)

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

CHARLES COLLINGWOOD REPORTING:

Good Evening:

The Senate Agriculture Committee is defying President Eisenhower's warning of a possible presidential veto..if it goes ahead and writes rigid high price supports into a farm program. The Agriculture Committee has gone into a night session, and Democratic Chairman Ellender says the session will not break up until it has completed action an a farm measure. The indications are it will write high rigid supports into the bill. Republican Senator Young..who is a member of the committee..said this afternoon that the group already has voted, 9 to 6, in favor of supporting quality milling wheat at 90 percent of parity. Last week, the committee lined up for a similar high rigid supports for corn, peanuts, cotton and rice. Mr. Eisenhower said last night that such supports would sabotage his "soil bank" program.

President Eisenhower has accepted the resignation of Trevor Gardner as assistant secretary of the Air Force for research and development. The resignatio is effective Saturday. Gardner told a news conference yesterday.. that he believes a "crash program" for guided missiles is necessary. And President Eisenhower said yesterday that the United States already is giving top priority to this problem. Several congressional committees have indicated they would like to hear Gardner's views.

Senator George said today that his special Senate investigating committee is going to concentrate on the 25-hundred - dollar campaign contribution offered to Senator Francis Case..during the debate on the natural gas bill. George indicated that his committee, which starts hearings tomorrow, will not try to bring out the names of other senators who might have received similar contributions. He said he doubted the committee had that authority.

A congressman died today. Representative Chauncey Reed of Illinois succombed in Bethesda Naval Hospital after a long illness. He was 65...and had served in the House since 1935.

In Birmingham, Alabama, today, Autherine Lucy..through her attorney... filed suit in United States District Court to compel the University of Alabama to allow her to resume her college course. And the case wes set for hearing on February 29th. Miss Lucy was suspended from the university last Suesday, after the car she was riding in was stoned and she was splattered with eggs. Tonight, President Meany of the AFL-CIO urged President Eisenhower to broaden the scope of the FBI investigation of this "defiance of the law", to include other instances of violence against members of the Negro race in Alabama.

In Washington today, a federal judge upheld the right of the State Department to use confidential information in denying a passport. Judge Joseph McGarraghy ruled in the case of Weldon Dayton, a Corning New York scientist, and said the denial of his passport application had been "a reasonable exercise of discretion under valid regulations." Federal Judge Youndahl ruled last November ..in another passport case..that the State Department must base such decisoons only on evidence appearing on the record. The question is expected, ultimately, to reach the Supreme Court.

Russia put some American weather baloons on display today in Moscow. Foreign correspondents who were called in to see the exhibition..in the courtyard of an old palace..were cold that the baloons were designed for military reconnaissance, not for gathering weather information as the United States has insisted, and that America is using the baloons to further a "brink of war" policy. The Russians official..who lectured the newsmen..completely ignored the fact that the United States announced yesterday it was halting the launching of weather balloons from West Germany and Turkey, so they would no longer drift over Soviet territory. The idea occurred to western observers in Moscow that the Russians had gone to a lot of work in preparing their propaganda display, and couldn't stand to see it to to waste. The Russians even had television cameras set up today to catch the show.

Student rioting broke out in Madrid today for the third straight day. For the first time, there was an exchange of gunfire. At least 20 students were hurt, and one of them may have died. The battle was waged between students who support the Falangist Party, the only political party allowed in Spain, and those who oppose it. The police are reported to have made 40 arrests.

French Premier Mollet has named his economics affairs minister, Robert LaCoste, to be the new resident minister in Algeria. La Coste replaces General Catroux, whose resignation was forced earlier this week by the rioting of French colonists in Algeria. Mollet made a broadcast in Algiers tonight condemning both French and Moslem extremists for resorting to violence..and appealing for a settlement by peaceful means.

Prime Minister Segni of Italy endec a conference today with West German leaders in Bonn. A joint communique said Italy and West Germany regard German reunification, on the basis of free elections, as an "indispensable precondition" to lasting peace. It also said both countries will continue to work for the union of Europe and effective European defense.

Another joint communique was issued today in Cairo..announcing an agreement whereby the World Bank will loan Egypt 200-million dollars to help it build the high Aswan Dam. The project altogether..will cost more than a billion dollars.

Ceylon is reported to have turned down an offer..by Communist Hungary to barter 70-thousand tons of rice. Hungary had got the rice from Burma, and wanted to exchange it for goods from Ceylon, such as rubber, But Ceylon already has a surplus of rice.

All seven men aboard that Navy plane..lost in the Antarctic since last Friday..have been rescued. The missing plane was sighted early today, and the Nave reports: "All hands are safe and well."

A new cold wave has swept over Europe..and the European death toll is now placed at 208. Food shortages are reported in parts of Greece, Turkey, and Italy. Sub-zero temperatures are predicted for Germany. Rome had its heaviest snow in 16 years, and dozens of Italian villages are snowbound. American GI's in Italy are rushing supplies to some of the marooned towns in 10-ton army trucks.

Ed Murrow is on his way home. Before leaving Israel this morning he recorded this report on a small..and yet not so small..border incident.

MURROW: Today I saw one of the smallest problems ever presented to the United-Nations. It will never make a headline. It's unlikely to engage the attention of the Security Council, but it is part of the continuing crisis in this part of the country. The incident occurred yesterday, at one - thirty in the afternoon, local time. It was up in the northern tip of Israel, that little finger of land that stretches up between Syria and Lebanon, up above the Sea of Galilee and the hills of Canaan. And 18-year-old shepherd was tending a flock of sheep belonging to the collective farm of Dan. He was unarmed. His flock consisted of three hundred and thirty sheep. They were grazing about four hundred yards from the Syrian frontire. Three men in Arab dress, presumably Syrians, crossed the frontier. One of them had a rifle. He pointed it at the shepherd. The shepherd ran for help. The sheep were driven across the unmarked frontier. United Nations Truce Supervisors were called.

This afternoon we drove up to the scene of the indicent. About five hundred people live there. The Secretary of the kibbutz confirmed the facts. The flock was thoroughbred, built up over twelve years, during which butter fat content had been more than doubled. The sheep lost were worth something like twenty-five thousand dollars. Three hundred and twelve sheep were missing. A few, with new lambs, had refused to cross the frontier. We stood with the Secretary about three hundred yards from the unmarked frontier. The tracks leading to Syria were clearly visible. We asked him whether he was tempted to tkke his men and their guns and get the sheep back. He said that wouldn't be much of a problem; it could be done but that vill disturb the tranquility and the peace. He could only hope that the U.N. would get the flock back but he wasn't hopeful Thirty cows were taken from a near-by settlement six months ago ans still haven't been returned.

The young shepherd said he was scared when that gun was pointed at him. He ran for help. He thought after this he would carry a rifle when he took the flock out to graze. In cast they got the flock, or some of it back, that would be up to the United Nations.

Kibbutz Dan was the first collective farm where we have heard no singing. There was the usual mud, the bare benches and tables in the dining hall. Women in rubber boots working in the kitchen that mas produces the food. Barbed wire and trenches around the main compound. Up on the hillside, only six or seven hundred yards away, across the frontier, sheep were grazing. They might have been part of the flock stolen yesterday. Kibbutz Dan was in a mood to fight rather than sing, but the place was calm. This is not to say that the Israelis have not engaged in similar provocations, but in this situation their frontiers cannot be crossed. It is only possible to report what one seen and hears. In what is generallyc called "informed circles" one hears that Israel will have nothing to do with the scheme of a larger neautral corridor and more U.N. observers. It is pointed out that to narrow the perimeter of Israel by one kilometer, slightly less than one mile, would mean the loss of about 5% of Israel's territory. In many cases, they would lose farms, would have to give up strategic defensive positions, in some cases whole villages. There is no possibility that this country will agree to anything like the twentieth-century mandate, to become a ward of the U.N. or the United States. Dependent upon one or the other for defense or survival is unthinkable to the people who live here. That may or may not be regarded as a reasonable and rational attitude, but that's what it is.

The memory of a war for both independence ar survival is still very fresh here. In military circles there is the obvious need for arms, but there is nothing approaching panic as a result of the arms being supplied to Egypt by the Communist powers. It is believed that gypt has received more equipment than she can man, that some if it may be, in effect, a stockpile for a future Cummunist use. Some of it may filter out to other Arab states in an effort to increase Egypt's stature. There is no belief here that war will be started by some border incident and so far as a visitor can tell there is no fear here that a war will be lost if it comes. There is here at present a confidence born of a war and independence recently won against powerful odds. There may be over - confidence about the future. The Israelis may underestimate the Arab potential, but as of now there are no signs of jitters around this narrow strip of land beside the Mediterranean.

This is Ed Murrow recording from Tel Aviv.

A' little while ago, I am told, Mr. Murrow left Paris by plane on the last lap of his journey home. And so tomrorow night, weather permitting, he will be back at this microphone. This is Charles Collingwood. I'll be back in a moment with a footnote to the day's news. But, first, here is Bob Hall.

HALL: COMMERCIAL

COLLINGWOOD: Dr. Paul Dudley White, the President's heart specialist is cruising off the coast of Lower California trying to take an electrocardiograph of a gray whale. The problem is first to catch your whale. A small boat of the expedition approached a mother whale and her calf to get the apparatus on and got its side stove in for its pains. After chasing many whales, Dr. White has diagnosed their character as: "elusive, sagatious, formidable and wary."

This is Charles Collingwood. Mr. Murrow will see you tomorrow.

Edward R. Murrow Fri., Feb. 10, 1956

This is the news:

A special Senate committee opened public hearings today on that campaign contribution offered to Republican Senator Francis Case. My colleague, Griffing Bancroft, has been covering those hearings. So let's switch now to Washington for his first-hand report.

(Washington portion runs 2 mins, (returns on cue: "And that's how it stands now, Ed."
(

The Senate passed a bill today, providing the death penalty for sabotage of an airplane if one or more passengers are killed. The measure grew out of the destruction of an airliner last fall, due to a time-bomb placed in a piece of luggage. Forty-four persons died in the explosion, and John Gilbert Graham is being prosecuted by the state of Colorado on a charge of murder. The government did not prosecute because of the light penalties provided for sabotage under federal law. The bill passed by the Senate today now goes to the House.

White House News Secretary Hagerty today said President Eisenhower has not changed his position "one iota" on the subject of farm price supports. The President said earlier this week that high rigid supports might wreck the soil bank program. But despite that warning, the Senate Agriculture Committee last night approved a farm bill combining the President's soil bank plan and supports at 90 percent of parity for wheat, cotton, corn, peanuts and rice. Secretary of Agriculture Benson today called the bill "inconsistent". Congress, he said, will have to decide which way it wants to go... "we cannot go both directions at the same time."

Hagerty also said that President Eisenhower may go to Walter Reed Hospital tomorrow, to start his full-scale physical examination. The check-up is due to be completed on Tuesday. And the doctors may announce the results the same day.

Republican National Chairman Hall talked to presidential aides at the White House today and said afterwards that he feels "a little bit better" about the prospects of Mr. Eisenhower seeking a second term. He admitted that the subject had not been specifically discussed.

The name of Democratic Governor Harriman was entered today in the New Hampshire primary. / William A. Joyce of Nashua filed as a delegate-at-large "favorable" to Harriman, who has said he is not an active candidate for the presidential nomination. / In Albany, a spokesman for Harriman, said the action had been taken with neither the governor's knowledge nor consent. [Consent in the New Hampshire primary is not required. Senator Kefauver and Adlai Stevenson already are entered.] Kefauver also filed today for the primary in Minnesota.

In Cleveland today, six Communist leaders were convicted of conspiring to overthrow the government. They face a maximum penalty of ten years imprisonment, and a 10-thousand-dollar fine. / And the sentences will be pronounced on March 23rd. / Four other defendants were acquitted.

The western "Big Three" called on Russia tonight to prevent further demonstrations by armed civilians in East Berlin. / In identical notes to the Soviet ambassador in Berlin, the United States, Britain and France said that such activity "could have the gravest consequences." And the notes referred specifically to the demonstration, a month ago, in which thousands of civilians armed with automatic weapons marched through East Berlin. The Western powers said they could not ignore the formation of these "para-military groups and their employment in provocative displays."

→

In Algiers today, French colonists defied a ban on public gatherings, and swarmed into the center of the city to shout their protests against the reform policy of Premier Guy Mollet. Police broke up the demonstration, and Mollet left Algiers... temporarily... to talk to other Frenchmen fighting Arab nationalists in the hills.

In Paris, the National Assembly voted to expel another Poujadist deputy today... making two Poujadists that have been expelled from the Assembly this week. Ten more followers of the rightist leader Pierre Poujade have been marked for expulsion, on grounds they were elected illegally to Parliament.

~~The United States agreed today to supply Japan with 66-million dollars worth of surplus farm products. Commodities listed in the agreement... which still must be approved by the Japanese parliament... include cotton, wheat, barley and corn. Payment will be in yen, but most of it will be loaned back to Japan for economic development.~~

Talks to end the Westinghouse strike were broken off today in Pittsburgh. Federal Mediator John Murray said he was stepping out of the negotiations, "because I am convinced no useful purpose will be served by my continued participation at this time." His withdrawal, he said, would give the company and the union "an opportunity to assume their full responsibilities for the continuance, or the settlement, of this 118-day strike." Westinghouse and the International Union of Electrical Workers have issued statements blaming each other for the stalemant.

The president of the University of Alabama... Dr. O.C. Carmichael... said today that the issue of whether a Negro student, Autherine Lucy, is readmitted to the university, is now up to "the discretion of the court." Yesterday, the attorney for Miss Lucy filed a contempt of court action against the university trustees, for suspending her from the school... following the ~~[illegible]~~ pro-segregation riot on Monday. Governor Folsom of Alabama said today, that if Miss Lucy does return to the university, he would "resist with all his power", any further displays of mob rule.

Russia today announced the conclusion of an atomic agreement with Egypt. According to the Moscow radio, Russian experts will help Egypt in the building of a nuclear reactor in Cairo, "and the carrying out of work in the peaceful uses of atomic energy." Moscow said that, furthermore, Russia will supply Egypt with equipment for geological exploration.

Edward R. Murrow: February 10, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

The Premier of Jordan arrived in Cairo today. He was met by Egypt's Premier Nasser. The leader of Jordan has already visited Damascus, Beirut and Bagdad. From Cairo he will go on to Saudi-Arabia. An effort is being made to arrange a meeting of the heads of all Arab states to talk about what they call "Israeli aggressive designs."

There is no doubt that a crisis is building up in the Middle East. The flash point could be almost anywhere. It might well be on the Jordan River, between Syria and Israel. The Israelis contend that they have the right to tap the waters of the Jordan for power and irrigation. Syria claims that if this is done there may be an explosion. The proper time for construction of this nature will be about a month from now. It is quite likely that the Israelis will proceed with the project, unless what they regard as their legitimate defense requirements are met.

The Americans, British and French are trying to agree what to do in the event of renewed fighting on the borders of Israel. They are talking about appealing to the United Nations to order the fighting to stop, and if this fails, the application of an economic embargo and a naval blockade.

The military balance between Israel and her neighbors is shifting.

The Egyptians, in particular, are getting stronger. The Israeli leaders deny any aggressive intentions, but they recognize that their relative strength is declining. The danger lies, not in an isolated border incident, but rather in uncertainty as to what Western policy, and particularly American policy is. It seems to me unlikely that either platitudes or promises will prevent an explosion. The Israelis are determined that their new nation will not die without battle. They will fight, alone if necessary, because they have no alternative. They are seeking to buy arms, not in a quantity equal to those being supplied to the Arab world, but of a quality sufficient to ensure their protection, particularly in the air. There is always the danger that if they get those arms they might be tempted to use them for aggressive purposes. But neither their civilian nor military leaders give any hint of such designs. If they fail to secure the defensive weapons they require, the so-called activists may decide, that they must strike now, before the weight of men and metal against them becomes overwhelming.

The Jews in Israel have a fierce sense of belonging to their tiny state. There is a quiet but fervent determination to survive, fully equal to that in Britain during the year when Britain stood alone. Two things at least appear to be certain: the Israelis are not going to sit there for ever watching the Arab cliff that surrounds them grow higher and more menacing. If fighting comes it will be necessary to go back to biblical terms to describe its ferocity. And if the United States has a policy for this area, it should be stated and soon. If we have a policy no one in Israel knows what it is. There is surface calm in the country, but there is also a degree of desperation and a sense that time is running out.

Word for Today

I am a traveler come home, after two weeks away from this microphone. Benjamin Franklin had good counsel for travelers. Some of it is rather mundane like: "He that would travel much, should eat little." But he also had a piece of rather profound advice. "Best clean your finger," he said, "before you point to any spots."

Goodnight and good luck!

CBS RADIO DIVISION

EDWARD R. MURROW

Friday, Feb. 10, 1956
7:45-8:00 P.M.

MURROW: THIS IS THE NEWS:

A special Senate committee opened public hearings today on that campaign contribution offered to Republican Senator Francis Case. My colleague Griffing Bancroft has been covering those hearings. So let's switch now to Washington for his first-hand report.

BANCROFT: Senator Case of South Dakota looked rather small, bespectacled and serious as he sat thru the day in the big Senate caucus room, under the kleig lights, facing four fellow Senators, the special committee inquiring into the $2500 offered as a campaign contribution. The money was left, in hundred-dollar bills, with a friend of Case's in South Dakota by a Nebraska lawyer, John Neff, a man who favored the bill to free natural gas producers from Federal controls. After this bill was passed, with Case voting against it, the committee was named to find out if there was anything improper in it all. The chairman, Senator George of Georgia, said beforehand it would be a narrow, limited investigation - and it is. At one point Senator Case charged a telegram he got, signed by a friend, urging him to vote for the gas bill was a fake. But the committee counsel, Charles Steadman, showed little interest. The matter of the telegram, he said, probably was not pertinent. What was pertinent to Steadman, what he spent most of the day asking about, was whether Case thought the money was offered to try to influence him and why Case delayed several days before making his speech about it last Friday. On the whole, it was a friendly proceeding, as such things usually are when one Senator is being investigated by other Senators, but at times Counsel Steadman pressed Case pretty hard on those two points. Bluntly, was it attempted bribery, and why did Case wait until just before a vote on the gas bill to talk? Case said he told the Senate about it as soon as he had all the facts, and Case insisted he didn't know if there was anything improper, that's what the committee is supposed to find out, he said. Neff has denied any attempt to influence Case. The Senator said the committee should ask Neff where the money came from, in the first place. Twenty-five hundred dollars is a lot of money in South Dakota, said Case.

Well, the committee plans to ask Neff tomorrow or Monday about it, and after that Neff faces even more questions. When the hearing broke up for the day it was announced that Neff has been subpoenaed by a district grand jury also looking into the matter.

And, Ed, that's how it stands right now.

-30-

Ediphone trans./E. Scheiner

Edward R. Murrow Mon., Feb. 13, 1956

This is the news:

Russia warned the United States and Britain today against taking independent military action to preserve peace in the Middle East. The Soviet warning was contained in a five-page statement, handed to foreign correspondents in Moscow... and it referred to the communique issued at the conclusion of the recent conference between Prime Minister Eden and President Eisenhower in Washington. Among other things, the communique called for talks between the United States, Britain and France on the Middle East situation, under the tripartite declaration of 1950. That declaration called for the western Big Three to take action... either within or outside the United Nations... to prevent border changes in the area by force or threat of force. The Russian statement... issued today... said the introduction of foreign troops without the sanction of the United Nations Security Council would be a "crude violation" of the U.N. Charter and the national sovereignty of the nations involved. The Russian statement said such an act, moreover, "would be in obvious contradiction with the interests of strengthening peace." It also said: "Any action leading to a complication (in this area) cannot but be an object of legitimate concern of the Soviet government." The statement made no reference to the Anglo-American charge that Russia heightened tension in the Middle East by sanctioning the Czechoslovak-Egyptian arms deal.

Russia published a memorandum tonight... accepting an American proposal to discuss possible easing of restrictions on private travel between the United States and Russia. Russia urged the United States to drop fingerprinting as one of the requirements.

In London, Prime Minister Eden reported to the House of Commons today on his conference with the President. He said frankly "certain differences" persist... but there was "complete agreement" on Germany. And with regard to the Middle East, Eden said that Britain and the United States are ready to support any United Nations recommendations to ease tension between Israel and the Arab states.

The British foreign secretary... Selwyn Lloyd... told the House of Commons that "no credence" can be given to the week-end statements made by the former British diplomats, Guy Burgess and Donald Maclean. Burgess and Maclean disappeared behind the Iron Curtain in May, 1951. On Saturday, they "surfaced" in Moscow...and told reporters they had fled because a "small but powerful" group in the West opposed an understanding with Russia. They admitted they had been Communists while employed in the British Foreign Office.

~~Reports from Cairo say Egyptian Premier Nasser has refused to~~ join a meeting of Arab leaders, called to discuss the Israeli-Arab dispute. The meeting was proposed by Jordan... and representatives of Syria, Iraq and Lebanon already have agreed to attend. #

In Israel, the government of Premier Ben Gurion won a vote of confidence tonight on its handling of the week-long strike of professional workers. A motion of "no confidence" was defeated in the Israeli parliament by a vote of 58 to 29. The striking professional workers are all employed in government public service. They are demanding salary increases promised them last year. Ben Gurion argued defense necessities must come first.

In Washington tomorrow, a federal grand jury will start an investigation into a possible attempt to influence Republican Senator Case's vote on the natural gas bill. Today, a special Senate committee almost completed its investigation. It heard Attorney John M. Neff say that not since October of last year has he contributed to the "personal" campaign funds of any Senator. Neff has acknowledged offering a twenty-five-hundred-dollar contribution to Senator Case of South Dakota. CASE claims it was an attempt to influence his Senate vote. As the special committee completed most of its work, Charles Steadman, the committee counsel, said the committee knows of no other contribution by Neff, or anyone else, related to the Natural Gas Bill. This bill, since approved by the Senate and sent to the White House, would exempt producers of natural gas from direct federal price controls. The special committee has turned its transcript over to the Justice Department. The committee must now decide whether it should ask Senate approval to "broaden" its investigation. And another committee is interested in the same area. Democratic Senator Hennings of Missouri, who is up for re-election this year, resigned as head of the Senate Elections Subcommittee to permit this group to make a sweeping investigation "starting where the special committee left off today."

President Eisenhower will receive a report tomorrow on the condition of his heart. His physicians... including Boston heart specialist Dr. Paul Dudley White... will meet at the White House around noon to draw up their report, and then turn their findings over to the President. #

The medical report probably will be made public late tomorrow afternoon. #

White House Secretary Hagerty said Mr. Eisenhower will leave Wednesday morning for a week's vacation at Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey's Georgia plantation. He will be gone about a week, and Hagerty said he does not expect the President to make any announcement about a possible second term until after he returns to Washington. The regular White House news conference this week has been cancelled. #

The Democratic national chairman... Paul Butler... accused Vice President Nixon today of being "the leading practitioner of a cruel and malignant political weapon, the not quite libelous smear." Butler said that Republican National Chairman Leonard Hall was "splitting hairs", in offering a thousand dollars to anyone who could prove Mr. Nixon ever called former President Truman a traitor. He said Hall's offer WAS a "gimmick", designed to obscure "the ugly innuendoes which Mr. Nixon uttered throughout the 1954 campaign."

Vice President Nixon came to New York today to speak at a Lincoln Day dinner, and again... on his arrival at the airport... denied that he had ever called Mr. Truman a traitor, or even inferred it. Mr. Nixon told reporters, "I have always said that there is only one party of treason in the United States, and that is the Communist Party." In His prepared speech tonight, Mr. Nixon will say that the Republican Party "has registered the greatest advance" in Negro rights since the Emancipation Proclamation. He will say, "Perhaps in no other field is there a greater contrast between Democratic campaign promises and Democratic congressional performance."

Edward R. Murrow: February 13, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

Lincoln's birthday was not intentionally chosen by Adlai Stevenson and Averill Harriman as appropriate for statements on school segregation. The issue, and their statements about it, just happened to reach the calendar on this day. To be sure, it was in the news because Lincoln had been born and had lived to lead in the abolition of slavery. But Mr. Stevenson and Mr. Harriman were not appealing to the memory of Lincoln to bolster up their views on school integration.

The fact is that school integration has become a dominant theme, perhaps the most dominant theme, in the race for the democratic presidential nomination. Mr. Stevenson finds himself on the defensive, with Senator Kefauver somewhat less moderate and Mr. Harriman still less so. Mr. Harriman, in his statement yesterday, came out flatly for the Powell amendment, that calls for withholding federal school funds from states resisting school integration. Senator Kefauver has not gone so far. He has said that his vote on the Powell amendment would depend on whether its wording was consistent with the Supreme Court's desire for orderly transition, and whether it made allowances as recommended, for complex local conditions. He also said he would have to consider whether the amendment might result in defeating federal school aid.

Mr. Harriman yesterday recognized that the Supreme Court had kept jurisdiction over the issue for a period of adjustment. "It is up to the Court," he declared, "to deal with the adjustment period in their wisdom." But he rejected any idea that the executive branch of the government need do nothing more than enforce the laws. "I don't think it is up to the Federal Government" he said, "to talk about ten years, or that sort of thing." He said he was for the Powell amendment. "We should see to it" he said, "that the laws as interpreted by the Supreme Court should be enforced." "In other words" a questioner suggested, "you don't think we ought to wait till '65." To this Mr. Harriman replied: "No, not at all."

At Lincoln's tomb in Springfield yesterday, Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, declared that his race should resent and reject Adlai Stevenson's advice (as he put it), "to accomodate themselves to 'gradual' enjoyment of their citizenship rights."

But Mr. Stevenson yesterday stressed that he accepted the dictum of the Supreme Court that integration should be achieved "with all reasonable speed." And coercive federal action at this time, he thought, would "arm the extremists and disarm the men of good will in the South, who with courage and patience, have already accomplished so much. "I suggest" he said, "no slowing down of the effort to bring reality to the American concept of full equality for all citizens.

He went on to propose that the issue be taken out of politics so, as he said, "that an orderly resolution of the problem would be possible without the emotional coloration of a presidential contest." It is the observation of this reporter that proposals to "take subjects out of politics," usually come from candidates who feel their position is being misrepresented. Mr. Stevenson has a good record on race discrimination. He helped integrate negroes into the Navy during the war, and he fought for an anti-discrimination law in Illinois when he was governor. But it probably is natural that negro leaders should try to make him now appear over-cautious. That is pressuring him not to grow more cautious if nominated or elected, and is pressuring southern politicians not to be more cautious than Stevenson. Mr. Stevenson is resisting the pressure, which also is natural. And one way to resist it is to propose that the integration question be taken out of politics.

The discussion of school integration is becoming unreasonably impassioned by the injection of quite different negro issues. One is the episode of Miss Lucy at the University of Alabama. This has become a scandal the world over, because the University closed its doors to a negro girl as a result of rioting, after the Supreme Court had pried the door open by a special ruling. But this ruling has no direct connection with the previous ruling on school integration.

Another issue in the segregation debate is the Till case, also notorious the world over, in which a negro boy who gave a white woman a wolf-whistle was kidnapped and murdered in Mississippi, and the white men suspected of the crime were set free. Mr. Stevenson pointed out yesterday that federal intervention in this instance was constitutionally impossible simply because state boundaries were not crossed in committing the crime.

Mob rule in Tuscaloosa, and the default of justice in Mississippi, do not touch the integration issue directly. This, for the time being, at least, is being kept within the strong walls of the law, and can remain there while the federal courts still exercise jurisdiction over it. ~~XXXXXXXXXXXXXX~~ Misrepresentations of this issue are to be expected so long as politicians hope to gain from such tactics. But there can be comfort in the fact that voters often do a pretty good job of sifting the truth in political campaigns and vote accordingly.

Word for Today

Segregation is a problem for which there wo~~uld seem to be~~ no simple, easy solution. It may be, as George Herbert said, that "the shortest answer is doing." In any case, those in whose hands the decisions lie, would do well to remember the words of Abraham Lincoln: "I shall do nothing in malice, for what I deal with is too vast for malicious dealing."

Goodnight and good luck!

Edward R. Murrow Tues., Feb. 14, 1956

This is the news:

President Eisenhower's doctors have told him that... medically... he should be able to serve another term. The doctors based their judgment on a report on Mr. Eisenhower's condition, issued today at the White House. /The report, in turn, was based on a series of tests which the President underwent last week at Walter Reed Hospital. In brief, it said Mr. Eisenhower has made "a good recovery" from his heart attack of last September. /There are no symptoms "indicating either weakness of the heart muscle or insufficient coronary reserve." There has been no enlargement of the heart. /And the general circulation is "excellent". /The formal report was read to the correspondents by Mr. Eisenhower's personal physician, Major General Snyder. Later... when the news conference was thrown open to questions... Dr. Paul Dudley White, the Boston heart specialist, made this statement: "After weighing very carefully all available evidence," he said, "and fully aware of the hazards and uncertainties that lie ahead, we believe that medically the President should be able to carry on an active life satisfactorily for another five to ten years." A reporter asked Dr. White if he meant that to include another five to ten years in the presidency. Dr. White said he did. But he emphasized: "The choice is his, not ours." White House News Secretary Hagerty also made a statement. He reminded the correspondents that President Eisenhower himself had said that... in deciding whether to seek another term... he would rely more on his own feelings, than on the doctors' reports.

→

Nevertheless, the favorable report caused a burst of buying on the stock exchanges in San Francisco and Los Angeles. (The market here in New York had already closed). [redacted] And Republican Senator Aiken, one of the original Eisenhower boosters, said, "It looks to me as though they've given him the green light." Democratic Senator Sparkman expressed gratification at the President's recovery, but said: "There's a difference between carrying on the full load of the presidency and just staying at the White House."

In Moscow today, Soviet leader Khrushchev addressed the 20th congress of the Communist Party...(the first party congress since the death of Stalin.) It was a major speech, lasting more than five hours. Khrushchev said, "There is no fatal inevitability of war." But he also said, "As long as imperialism exists, the economic basis for the outbreak of war persists." And Russia, he warned, "has the means of delivering "a powerful rebuff", should war come. Russia, he said, desires improved relations with the West---that is why it has offered the United States a treaty of friendship. It also "welcomes the desire of the peoples of the Arabian countries to uphold their national independence." Khrushchev said that in strengthening ties with other countries, "trade plays a big part." And Communism, he said, is bound to expand. He said it is now possible to take over some countries "by winning stable parliamentary majorities," instead of by violent revolution and civil war. Meantime, Khrushchev declared, the Soviet Union must maintain vigilance, accompanied by the "necessary steps" to strengthen its defense.

The United States has reacted to Russia's warning... yesterday... against taking independent military action to preserve peace in the Middle East. Russia said it would consider the sending of foreign troops into the area, without United Nations sanction or permission of the countries involved, "a flagrant violation" of the U.N. Charter. A State Department spokesman said today, "Of course, we want to work through the United Nations as far as we possibly can. But should the United Nations become paralyzed (as it might because of Russia's veto power) then there is no alternative to working outside the United Nations." In London, the British Foreign Office said there has been "no question" of sending troops to the Middle East countries without their consent.

In Washington today, a federal grand jury began its investigation of the 25-hundred-dollar campaign contribution offered to Senator Francis Case. Senator George... who is chairman of a special Senate committee looking into the case... invited anyone "with any evidence of improper pressure" in connection with the natural gas bill "to come forward and state the facts." ~~Senator Case [illegible]~~

~~offer of the campaign contribution shortly before the Senate was to vote on the measure. The bill... which would exempt natural gas producers from direct price controls... was passed and now awaits the President's signature.~~

The House Ways and Means Committee opened hearings today on legislation to pay for a multi-billion-dollar highway program. Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey testified that the bill introduced by Democratic Representative Boggs would not raise "nearly enough revenue" to pay for the new highway system. The measure calls for increased taxes on gasoline, diesel fuel, tires, buses and trucks. Humphrey said additional revenue might be raised by imposing a new federal registration fee of one dollar per 1-thousand pounds, for all highway vehicles.

Edward R. Murrow: February 14, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

This week Thailand is the scene of the first military exercises ever held in the name of SEATO, the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization. They include the landing at Bangkok of U.S. Marines by helicopter, the ~~landing~~ dropping of U.S. ~~Infantry by parachute~~ Paratroops, and of American heavy equipment by parachute from flying boxcars, the firing of "Honest John" rockets, and a Marine assault on a fortified position. A Philippine contingent will be there. British Commonwealth ships are part of the Naval task force involved, led by the U.S. carrier Princeton. Pakistan and France, though members of SEATO, are not represented, because Thailand's invitation ~~only~~ was received only seven days ago, too late for them to send forces.

The haste of the decision to hold exercises over Thailand has not been explained. Exclusively American exercises were to have been held at and around Iwo Jima in May, and apparently were moved up. They are called Atomic Age tests. Iwo Jima is to be invaded by U.S. Marines on Friday. Today the advancing U.S. Naval force was attacked by a simulated airborne atomic bomb, and four transports were theoretically sunk. The ~~AMERICAN~~ American force is made up of 70 ships, 360 landing craft and 40,000 men. It is a major display, with the Thailand exercise a kind of picturesque sideshow.

Officials in Thailand explained today that the exercises over its territory are not based on the supposition of imminent danger, but are to demonstrate the reality of SEATO power. The U.S. maneuvers at Iwo Jima may be highly desirable as training, but just the same they will count in Asia as a demonstration of power for the benefit of Asian observers.

Whether or not this is the best way at this moment to win friends in Asia is open to debate. Many observers agree that the uncommitted Asian countries do not like any harping on the danger of war. The Kremlin bases much of its propaganda on the West being warlike, while Soviet activity is kept ostensibly on the economic level.

But the accent on power does not mean that this country counts on meeting Soviet rivalry with power alone. The State Department has announced it will give Ceylon $5,000,000 worth of assistance, and this is an important move on the economic front. The Ceylon decision, however, was not planned to coincide with the military exercises, or to offset them. They just happen to supplement each other. The Pentagon organized the Iwo Jima maneuvers, not the State Department. And the decision about Ceylon has been brewing for some time. It actually was reached before the Eden visit, the State Department now says.

A word more as to why Ceylon is being aided. This is a decision not to penalize Ceylon because it is selling rubber to Red China, as provided in the Battle Act. About the time the act was passed, Ceylon signed a contract with Red China to deliver 250,000 tons of rubber over five years. Rubber is Ceylon's chief export, and Ceylon had to choose whether to break the contract and hope for adequate economic compensation, or carry it out. It decided to live up to the contract. Since then, trade restrictions on the Soviet Union have been relaxed and rubber can go to that country. It then can be forwarded to Red China. So the punishment of Ceylon for selling rubber to Red China has lost its logic. And the fact that Ceylon is perhaps the most vigorously anti-Communist country in Asia, can now be belatedly recognized.

We have virtually no central planning in implementing our cold war policy. A fresh instance of this has come to light in the disclosure that the United States had the opportunity to supply technical assistance to Burma and passed it up. It was only after we had done so that Premier U Nu made the deal with the Kremlin to supply machine tools, technicians and cotton in exchange for Burmese rice.

When U Nu was in Washington last summer he asked for American technical aid. He said he much preferred it to Soviet aid. For political reasons at home, he explained, he could not take it "for free", he had to pay for it, and all he could pay with was rice. He offered 10,000 tons of rice, ~~worth a million-and-a-quarter dollars~~, to pay for forty to fifty American technicians. We could stockpile the rice in Burma, and leave it there until we used it some day for famine relief.

The State Department consulted congressional leaders and they absolutely vetoed the proposal. This was because of the high feelings over agricultural surpluses. It was despite the fact that 10,000 tons of rice would not have mattered much to a rice surplus of 700,000 tons. And a million-and-a-quarter dollars was a trifling sum in so important a political transaction.

The Kremlin, in the present phase of the cold war, has an advantage that is hard for us to match. It can choose its objectives and decide how they are to be attained. Its nationals and satellites then have to comply. We were unable to keep Burma out of the arms of the Kremlin, because Congressional leaders vetoed it. We had to wait two years to treat Ceylon as generously as it deserves. It takes a lot of wisdom to be able to match the concentrated power of the Kremlin. We have some, but still not enough. Yet it may be doubted whether the military demonstrations in Bangkok and Iwo Jima this week, will prove to be adequate substitutes for the wisdom and co-ordination we still lack.

Bob Hite

Word for Today

American influence has suffered in Southeast Asia, for want of buying 10-thousand tons of rice. (To some, there may seem to have been good and sufficient reasons.) ~~Others~~ Some would agree with Ralph Waldo Emerson, who said: "A man often pays dear for a small frugality." For as Dorothy Fosdick observed, "To make a fine choice, yet decline to pay for it, is folly."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

President Eisenhower's doctors have told him that ..medically..he should be able to serve another term. The doctors based their judgment on a report on Mr. Eisenhower's condition, issued today at the White House. The report, in turn, was based on a series of tests which the President underwent last week at Walter Reed Hospital. In brief, it said Mr. Eisenhower has made "a good recovery" from his heart attack of last September. There are no symptoms "indicating either weakness of the heart muscle of insufficient coronary reserve." There has been no enlargement of the heart. And the general circulation is "excellent". The formal report was read to the correspondents by Mr. Eisenhower's personal physician, Major General Snyder. Later..when the news conference was thrown open to questions..Dr. Paul Dudley White, the Boston heart specialist, made this statement: "After weighing very carefully all available evidence," he said, "and fully aware of the hazards and uncertainties that lie ahead, we believe that medically the President should be able to carry on an active life satisfactorily for another five to ten years." A reporter asked Dr. White if he meant that to include another five to ten years in the presidency. Dr. White if he meant that to include another five to ten years in the presidency. Dr. White said he did. But he emphasized:"The choice is his, not ours." White House News Secretary Hagerty also made a statement. He reminded the correspondents that President Eisenhower himself had said that ..in deciding whether to seek another term..he would rely more on his own feelings, than on the doctors' reports.

Nevertheless, the favorable report caused a burst of buying on the stock exchanges in San Francisco and Los Angeles. (The market here in New York and already closed.) And Republican Senator Aiken, one of the original Eisenhower boosters, said, "It looks to me as though they've given him the green light." Democratic Senator Sparkman expressed gratification at the President's recovery, but said: "There's a difference between carrying the the full load of the presidency and just staying at the White House."

In Moscow today, Soviet leader Khrushchev addressed the 20th congress of the Communist Party..the first party congress since the death of Stalin. It was a major speech, lasting more than five hours. Khrushchev said, "There is no fatal inevitability of war." But he also said, "as long as imperialism exists, the economic basis for the outbreak of war persists." And Russia, he rarned, "has the means of delivering "a powerful rebuff", should war come. Russia, he said, desires improved relations with the West -- that is why it has offered the United States a treaty of friendship. It also "welcomes the desire of the peoples of the Arabian countries to uphold their national independence." Khrushchev said that in strengthening ties with other countries, "trade plays a big part." And Communists, he said, is bound to expand. He said it is not possible to take over some countries "by winning stable parliamentary majorities," instead of by violent revolution and civil war. Meantime, Khrushchev declared, the Soviet Union must maintain vigilance, accompanied by the "necessary steps" to strengthen its defense.

The United States has reacted to Russia's warning..yesterday..against taking independent military action to preserve peace in the Middle East. Russia said it would consider the sending of foreign troops into the area, without United Nations sanction or permission of the countries involved, "a flagrant violation" of the U.N. Charter. A State Department spokesman said today, "Of course, we want to work through the United Nations as far as we possibly can. But should the United Nations become paralyzed (as it might because of Russia's veto power) then there is no alternative to working outside the United Nations." In London, the British Foreign Office said there has been "no question" of sending troops to the Middle East countries without their consent.

In Washington today, a federal grand jury began its investigation of the 25-hundred- dollar campaign contribution offered to Senator Francis Case. Senator George..who is chairman of a special Senate committee looking into the case..invited anyone "with any evidence of improper pressure" in connection with the natural gas bill, "to come forward and state the facts."

The House Ways and Means Committee opened hearings today on legislation to pay for a multi-billion-dollar highway program. Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey testified that the bill introduced by Democaatic Representative Boggs would not raise "nearly enough revenue" to pay for the new highways system. The measure calls for increased taxes on gasoline, diesel fuel, tires, busses and trucks. Humphrey said additional revenue might be raised by imposing a new federal registration fee of one dollar per one thousand pounds, for all highway vehicles.

This week Thailand is the scene of the first military exercises ever held in the name of SEATO, the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization. They include the landing at Bangkok of the U.S. Marines by helicopter, the dropping of U.S. paratroops, and of American heavy equipemnt by parachute from flying boxcars, the firing of "Honest John" rockets, and a Marine assault on a fortified position. A Philippine contingent will be there. British Commonwealth ships are part of the Naval task force involved, lead by the U.S. carrier Princeton. Pakistan and France, though members of SEATO, are not represented, because Thailand's invitation was received only seven days ago, too late for them to send forces.

The haste of the decision to hold exercises over Thailand has not been explained.

Exclusively American exercises were to have been held at and around Iow Jima in May, and apparently were moved up. They are called Atomic Age tests. Iwo Jima is to be invaded by U.S. Marines on Friday. Today the advancing U.S. Naval force was attacked by a simulated airborne atomic bomb, and four transports were theoretically sunk. The American force is made up of 70 ships, 360 landing craft and 40,000 men. It is a major display, with the Thailand exercise a kind of picturesque sideshow.

Officials in Thailand explained today that the exercises over its territory are not based on the supposition of imminent danger, but are to demonstrate the reality of SEATO power. The U.S. maneuvers at Iwo Jima may be highly desirable as training, but just the same they will count in Asia as a demonstration of power for the benefit of Asian observers.

Whether or not this is the best way at this moment to win friends in Asia is open to debate. Many observers agree that the uncommitted Asian countries do not like any harping on the danger of war. The Kremlin bases much of its propaganda on the West being warlike, while Soviet activity is kept obstensibly on the economic level.

But the accent on power does not mean that this country counts on meeting Soviet rivalry with power alone. The State Department has announced it will give Ceylon $5,000,000 worth of assistance, and this is an important move on the economic front. The Ceylon decision, however, was not planned to coincide with the military exercises, or to offset them. They just happen to supplement each other. The Pentagon organized the Iwo Jima maneuvers, not the State Department. And the decision about Ceylon has been brewing for some time. It actually was reached before the Eden visit, the State Department now says.

A word more as to why Ceylon is being aided. This is a decision not to penalize Ceylon because it is selling rubber to Red China, as provided in the Battle Act. About the time the act was passed, Ceylon signed a contract with Red China to deliver 250,000 tons of rubber over five year.. Rubber is Ceylon's chief export, and Ceylon had to choose whether to break the contract and hope for adequate economic compansation, or carry it out. It decided to live up to the contract. Since then, trade restrictions on the Soviet Union have been relaxed and rubber can go to that country. It then can be forwarded to Red China. So the punishment of Ceylon for selling rubber to Red China has lost its logic. And the fact that Ceylon is perhaps the most vigorously anti-Communist country is Asia, can not be belatedly recognized.

We have virtually no central planning in implementing our cold war policy. A fresh instance of this had come to light in the disclosure that the United States had the opportunity to supply technical assistance to Burma and passed it up. It was only after we had done so that Premier U Nu made the deal with the Kremlin to supply machine tools, technicians and cotton in exchange for Burmese rice.

When U Nu was in Washington last summer he asked for American technical aid. He said he much preferred it to Soviet aid. For political reasons at home, he explained, he could not take it "for free", he had to pay for it, and all he could pay with was rice. He offered 10,000 tons of rice, to pay for forty to fifty American technicians. We could stockpile the rice in Burma, and leave it there until we used it some day for famine relief.

The State Department consulted congressional leaders and they absolutely vetoed the proposal. This was because of the high feelings over agricultural surpluses. It was despite the fact that 10,000 tons of rice would not have mattered much to a rice surplus of 700,000 tons. And a million-and-a-quarter dollars was a trifling sum in so important a political transaction.

The Kremlin, in the present phase of the cold war, has an advantage that that is hard for us to match. It can choose its objectives and decide how they are to be attained. Its nationals and satellites then have to comply. We were unable to keep Burma out of the arms of the Kremlin, because Congressional leaders vetoed it. We had to wait two years to treat Ceylon as generously as it deserves. It takes a lot of wisdom to be able to match the concentrated power of the Kremlin. We have some, but still not enough. Yet it may be doubted whether the military demonstrations in Bangkok and Iwo Jima this week will prove to be adequate substitutes for the wisdom and coordination we still lack.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is a word from Bob Hite.

HITE : COMMERCIAL

MURROW: American influence has suffered in Southeast Asia, for want of buying 10-thousand tons of rice. To some, there may seem to have been good and sufficient reasons. Some would agree with Ralph Waldo Emerson, who said: "A man often pays dear for a small frugality." For as Dorothy Fosdick observed, "To make a fine choice, yet decline to pay for it, is folly."

Goodnight and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Wed., Feb. 15, 1956

This is the news:

A high American official warned tonight of the danger of war in the Middle East. The assistant secretary of state, George V. Allen, said in a Voice of America broadcast that it is "likely" the Middle East countries "could be involved in serious military operations." He said, "I think that the likelihood is serious." He also expressed unwillingness to admit that war anywhere is inevitable. Allen said the fact Egypt has received "a very considerable amount" of modern weapons from the Soviet bloc "inclines" the United States to grant Israel's request for arms. But this country, he said, does not want to get involved in an arms race in the Middle East.

Allen is the State Department's top expert on Middle East affairs. During the day, he met with British and French representatives in Washington... for further exploratory talks on how to keep peace in the Middle East. There is no report as to what progress they may have made.

Israel has presented Bulgaria with a claim for more than two and a half million dollars, for the shooting down of an Israeli airliner last July. The aircraft was destroyed by two jet fighters, after it strayed over Bulgarian territory. Fifty-eight persons died in the crash.

There has been more violence in French North Africa. According to French officers, 88 persons have met violent deaths in Algeria and Tunisia in the past 24 hours. Most of the dead are listed as belonging to the rebel forces.

In Paris today, the sultan of Morocco called on France to grant Morocco its independence now... before working out what the relationship will be between the two countries later on. The sultan also indicated that he wants sovereignty, not only over French Morocco, but also over Spanish Morocco and the international territory of Tangiers.

Reports from Madrid say that General Franco has fired two members of his cabinet, as an outgrowth of last week's student riots. One of the dismissed cabinet members is the secretary general of the Falange Party, the only political party allowed in Spain. The other is identified as the minister of education. Both are pro-Monarchist.

In Helsinki, Premier Kekkonen today was elected president of Finland. Kekkonen, who is leader of the Agrarian Party, won on the third ballot in the electoral college. He succeeds Juho Paaskikivi, who has been president for six years.

(OO-HO)

In Moscow today, the second session of the Communist Party Congress was taken up mostly with routine discussion of the major speech made yesterday by party boss Khrushchev... words of praise by party lieutenants and promises that, in their areas at least, the new five-year plan will be fulfilled. Soviet Premier Bulganin probably will speak on the five-year plan on Friday.

Communist China today attacked Allied military maneuvers in the Far East... specifically, the SEATO exercises in Southeast Asia and the mock invasion of Iwo Jima by more than 10-thousand Marines. The Peiping radio claimed the SEATO maneuvers are designed to intimidate countries like Burma and India, that do not belong to the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization.

Public hearings on East-West trade were opened today by the Senate investigations subcommittee. Chairman McClellan said the evidence at hand indicates that goods indispensable to building or maintaining a war machine are being shipped to Russia in "a very disturbing volume". McClellan charged that "heads of departments" (whom he did not name) are holding back information on the exact extent of this trade.

A House subcommittee issued a report tonight on its investigation of the Veterans Administration housing program. The subcommittee... headed by Representative Edmondson of Oklahoma... said it had found many instances of poor workmanship in houses sold under G.I. loans, attributable to "inadequate and faulty inspections by the V.A." The subcommittee said another serious problem exists in the illegal use of veterans' home loan rights. Some real estate operators, it said, have been guilty of trading these rights "on a wholesale basis".

President and Mrs. Eisenhower flew to Georgia today, for a vacation at the estate of Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey. They will be gone a week or ten days. And there was no hint when Mr. Eisenhower will announce his plans regarding a possible second term.

Former President Truman has accused Mr. Eisenhower, in the 1952 campaign, of using the Korean War for political advantage. Mr. Truman says... in the latest installment of his memoirs in Life Magazine... that in promising to go to Korea "to put an end to the fighting", Mr. Eisenhower "must have known that he was weakening our hand in the negotiations."

Truman accuses Eisenhower of "using this tragedy for political advantage"

~~"I felt," Mr. Truman writes, "that we had reached a situation that was politically and morally intolerable."~~

Today... in New Orleans... a three-judge Federal Court declared the segregation laws of Louisiana unconstitutional. The laws had been passed in 1954, to circumvent the Supreme Court decision prohibiting racial segregation in the public schools. In compliance with today's ruling, United States District Judge J. Skelly Wright ordered New Orleans to desegregate its public schools "with all deliberate speed". He conceded it would not be an easy adjustment, and might require some time.

Edward R. Murrow: February 15, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

Nikita Khrushchev made a marathon speech nearly seven hours long, at the twentieth Communist Party conference in Moscow yesterday. All that he said has not yet reached this country. But enough has come through to show that he emerged as the true successor to Stalin, not only as Secretary of the Party, but as the big boss of the Soviet Union, and the Soviet world. He made some tactful remarks about collective leadership. Probably he is less headstrong and vindictive than Stalin, and so less of a menace to his associates. But he re-wrote hallowed Soviet scriptures into his speech. And anyone who appreciates the over-riding importance of orthodoxy in the Soviet Communist Party will recognize that only a man of supreme power would have done so.

Not all his re-writing of dogma was sensational. One tenet he proclaimed was that war no longer is inevitable. Marx and Lenin had not foreseen nuclear weapons and that they would make all-out war virtually unthinkable. So it is not heretical for a communist to bow to the fact. But Khrushchev gave a glad welcome to social democrats - till now known to Communists as the jackals and lackeys of the capitalist system. And he preached that the socialist revolution can be won without violence through parliamentary methods. These innovations set Communist dogma on its head.

It is notable that Khrushchev used the Stalin technique of being the bringer of good news, so as to add popularity to his prestige. He did it by announcing in some detail the seven-hour day with even shorter hours in some classes of work, to be introduced next year.

The speech was a soft one. It contained less imprecation and more cordial effusiveness than Communist Party faithfuls have heard before. Clearly the accepted Soviet line is to extend influence with a gush of sweet reasonableness. But it would be a mistake to report only this, simply because it is interesting. For that is what Khrushchev expects to have reported.

Actually the speech did not depart basically from the historic address Stalin made at the last Party conference in 1952. On that occasion he frankly outlined how Communism would win the world. He predicted that the Soviet Union would not have to fight for conquest, because wars would break out, or threaten, between capitalist countries.

Khrushchev did a mischievous job yesterday of trying to turn Britain against the United States, France against Germany, the Western coalition against Washington, egging them on, as it were, to behave the way Stalin had foretold. He said that the United States, under the banner of the Atlantic commonwealth, is laying hands on the key economic and strategic positions of the British empire, is straddling that empire's communications, shattering its preferential tariff links, and subjugating its sterling bloc. Britain, he said, also was displeased with the United States for disorganizing the world market with unilateral trade, fencing off its home market, banning trade with the East, and dumping its agricultural surpluses. He added that Britain was displeased with West Germany and Japan, and West Germany and Japan were displeased with Britain. The revival of West Germany not only is making of France a third-rate power, he said, it is aggravating the problems of the world market. Two world wars, he declared, had proved that in the struggle for world markets the German monopolies would stop at nothing.

He called it sheer hypocrisy for the United States to say that its foreign military bases and its military blocs - NATO, Western European Union, SEATO and the Bagdad pact - are set up against the communist menace. "The new feature here" he explained, "is that the United States wants the dominating position in the capitalist world, and the reduction of its bloc partners to the status of docile executors of its will." And he came to the general conclusion that the economic struggle between the capitalist countries "is flaring up with ever-growing force."

Though he did not go as far as Stalin, to speak outright of inter-capitalist wars, he sowed all the dissension he could. # In view of his coming visit to London in April, he revealed how excited he is over the possibility of turning Britain against the United States. And his conversion to parliamentary methods as approved substitutes for violent revolution, is clearly expected to take the British Labor Party by storm.

But for all the poison he strewed on Western relations, he made a great point of wanting friendship with all countries, including Britain, France and indeed the United States. # He made an eloquent plea for the so-called five-point treaty Premier Bulganin proposed to President Eisenhower.

So for once the Russians were not harangued about Western encirclement, and this time they were not expected to blame their low standard of life on this peril. # Khrushchev did not stand on the defensive. He did not clench his fists and snarl. He was smiling and artful. All the same he was the heir of Stalin. The strategy definitely has changed. But the objective remains the same.

Word for Today

The speech by Nikita Khrushchev was a major pronouncement of Soviet policy, and as revised doctrine, doubtless will be studied for years to come. William Graham Sumner had a great fear of doctrines, calling them "the most frightful tyrants" to which men are subject. "Doctrines," he said, "get inside of a man's reason and betray him against himself."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

A high American official warned tonight of the danger of war in the Middle East. The assistant secretary of state, George V. Allen, said in a Voice of America broadcast that it is "likely" the Middle East countries "could be involved"in serious military operations." He said, "I think that the likelihood is serious." he also expressed unwillingness to admit that war anywhere is inevitable.Allen said the fact Egypt has received "a very considerable amount" of modern weapons from the Soviet bloc "inclined" the United States to grant Isreal's request for arms. But this country, he said, does not want to get involved in an arms race in the Middle East.

Allen is the State Department's top expert on Middle East affairs. During the day, he met with British and French representatives in Washington..for further explaratory talk on how to keep peace in the Middle East. There is no report as to what progress they may have made.

Israel has presented Bulgaria with a claim for more than two and a half million dollars, for the shooting down of an Israeli airliner last July. The aircraft was destroyed by two jet fighters, after it strayed over Bulgarian territory. Fifty-eight persons died in the crash.

There was been more violence in French North Africa. According to French officers, 83 persons have met violent deaths in Algeria and Tunisia in the past 24 hours. Most of the dead are listed as belonging to the rebel forces.

In Paris today, the sultan of Morocco called on France to grant Morocco its independence now..before working out what the relationship will be between the two countries later on. The sultan also indicated that he wants soverignty, not only over French Morocco, but also over Spanish Morocco and the international territory of Tangiers.

Reports from Madrid say that General Franco has fired two members of his cabinet, as an outgrowth of last week's student riots. One of the dismissed cabinet members is the secretary general of the Falange Party, the only political party allowed in Spain. The other is identified as the minister of education. Both ore pro-monarchist.

In Moscow today, the second session of the Communist Party Congress was taken up mostly with routine discussion of the major speech made yesterday by party boss Khrushchev..words of praise by party lieutenants and promises that the new five year plan will be fullfilled. Soviet Premier Bulganin probably will speak on the five-year plan on Friday.

Communist China today attacked Allied military maneuvers in the Far East.. specifically, the SEATO exercises in Southeast Asia and the mock invasion of Iwo Jima by more than 10-thousand Marines. The Peiping radio claimed the SEATO maneuvers are designed to intimidate countries like Burma and India, that do not belong to the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization.

Public hearings on East-West trade were opened today by the Senate investigations subcommittee. Chairman McClellan said the evidence at hand indicates that goods indispensable to building or maintaining a war machine are being shipped to Russia in "a very disturbing volume." McClellan charged that "heads of departments" (whom he did not name) are holding back information on the exact extend of this trade.

A House subcommittee issued a report tonight on its investigation of the Veterans Administration housing program. The subcommittee..headed by Representative Edmondson of Oklahoma..said it had found many instances of poor workmanship in houses sold under G.I. loans, attributed to "inadequate and faulty inspect ons by the V.A." The subcommittee said another serio s problem exists in the illegal use of veterans' home loan rights. Some real estate operators, is said, have been guilty of trading these rights "on a wholesale basis."

President and Mrs. Eisenhower flew to Georgia today, for a vacation at the estate of Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey. They will be gone a week or ten days. And there was no hint when Mr. Eisenhower will announce his plans regarding a possible second term.

Former President Truman has accused Mr. Eisenhower, in the 1952 campaign, of using the Korean War for political advantage. Mr. Truman says..in the latest installment of his memoirs in Life Magazine..that in promising to go to Korea "to put an end to the fighting", Mr. Eisenhower "must have known that he was weakening our hand in the negotiations." Truman accuses Eisenhower of "using this tragedy for political advantage."

Today..in New Orleans..a three-judge Federal Court declared the segregation laws of Louisiana unconstitutional. The laws had been passed in 1954, to circumvent the Supreme Court decision prohibiting racial segregation in the public schools. In compliance with today's ruling, United States District Judge J. Skelly Wright ordered New Orleans to desegregate its public schools "with all deliberate speed." He concluded it would not be an easy adjustment and might require some time.

Nikita Khrushchev made a marathon speech nearly seven hours long, at the twentieth Communist Party conference in Moscow yesterday. All that he said has not yet reached this country. But enough has come through to show that he emerged as the true successor to Stalin, not only as Secretary of the Party, but as the big boss of the Soviet Union, and the Soviet world. He made some tactful remarks about collective leadership. Probably he is less headstrong and vindictive than Stalin, ars so less of a menace to his associates. Byt he re-wrote hallowed Soviet scriptures into his speech. And anyone who appreciates the over-riding importance of orthodoxy in the Soviet Communist Party will recogniae that only a man of supreme power would have done so.

Not all his re-writing of dogma was sensational. One tenet he proclaimed was that war no longer is inevitable. Marx and Lenin had not forseen nuclear weapons and that they would make all-out war virtually unthinkable. So it is not heretical for a Communist to bow to the fact. But Khurschev gave a glad welcome to social democrats - till now known to Communists as the jackals and lackeys of the capitalist system. And he preached that the socialist revolution can be won without violence through parliamentary methods. These innovations set Communist dogma on its head.

It is notable that Khrushchev used the Stalin technique of being the bringer of good news, so as to add popularity to his prestige. He did it by announcing in some detail the seven-hour day with even shorter hours in some classes or work, to be introduced next year.

The speech was a soft one. It contained less imprecation and more cordial effusiveness than Communist Party faithfuls have ever heard before. Clearly the accepted Soviet line is to extend influence with a gush of sweet reasonableness. But it would be a mistake to report only this, simply because it is interesting. For that is what Khrushchev expects to have reported.

Actually the speech did not depart basically from the historic address Stalin made at the last Party conference in 1952. On that occasion he frankly outlined how Communism would win the world. He predicted that the Soviet Union would not have to fight for conquest, because wars would break out or threaten between capitalist countries.

Khrushchev did a mischievous job yesterday of trying to turn Britain against the United States, France against Germany, the Western coalition against Washington, egging them on, as it were, to behave the way Stalin foretold. He said that the United States, under the banner of the Atlantic commonwealth, is laying hands on the key economic and strategic positions of the British empire, is straddling that empire's communications, shattering its preferential tariff links, and subjugating its sterling bloc. Britain, he said, also was displeased with the United States for disorganizing the world market with unilateral trade, fencing off its home market, banning trade with the East, and dumping its agricultural surpluses. He added that Britain was displeased with West Germany and Japan, and West Germany and Japan were displeased with Britain. The revival of West Germany not only is making of France a third-rate power, he said, it is aggravating the problems of the world market. Two world wars, he declared, had proved that in the struggle for world markets, the German monopolies would stop at nothing.

He called is sheer hypocracy for the United States to say that its foreign military bases and its military blocs- NATO, Western European Union, SEATO and the Baghdad pact - are set up against the Communist menace. "The new feature here" he explained, "is that the United States wants the dominating position in the capitalist world, and the reduction of its bloc partners to the status of docile executors of its will." And he came to the general conclusion that the economic struggle between the capitalist countries "is flaring up with ever-growing force."

Though he did not go as far as Stalin, to speak outright of intercapitalist wars, he sowed all the dissension he could.

In view of his coming visit to London in April, he revealed how excited he is over the possibiliby ot turning Britain against the United States. And his conversion to parliamentary methods as approved substitutes for violent revolution, is clearly expected to take the British Labor Party by storm.

But for all the poison he strewed on Western relations, he made a great point of wanting friendship with all countries, including Britain, France and indeed the United States.

He made an eloucent plea for the so-called five- point treaty Premier Bulganin proposed to President Eisenhower.

So for once the Russians were not harangued about Western encirclement, and this time they were notexpected to blame their low standard of life in this peril.

Khrushchev did not stand on the defensive. He did not clench his fists and snarl. He was smiling and artful. All the same he was the heir to Stalin. The strategy definitely has changed. But the objective remains the same.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. But first, here is a word from our announcer.

ANNOUNCER: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: The speech by Nikita Khrushchev was a major pronouncement of Soviet policy, and as revised doctrine doubtless will be studied for years to come. William Graham Sumner had a great fear of doctrines, calling them "the most frightful tyrants" to which men are subject. "Doctrines," he said, "get inside of a man's reason and betray him against himself."

Good Night and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Thurs., Feb. 16, 1956

This is the news:

The Senate elections subcommittee voted unanimously today, for a sweeping investigation of campaign contributions. Chairman Albert Gore said the subcommittee was "disturbed" by reports that certain interests may have sought by means of political contributions "to exercise an undue and improper influence on legislative proposals." The subcommittee, he said, "intends to explore this matter fully, to the end that the American people may be advised of the facts." The investigation... growing out of the campaign contribution offered to Senator Francis Case... must still be approved by the Senate.

A government technician told the Senate investigations subcommittee today, that the shipment of machine tools to Russia is helping Soviet war production. John Williams, a Defense Department specialist, said the relaxation of trade restrictions... in 1954... resulted in Russia getting British machine tools "primarily" useful for military production. Chairman McClellan said yesterday that his subcommittee was encountering resistance from certain Government quarters. At the start of today's hearing, he announced that the Defense Department had agreed to cooperate "to the limit".

→

Secretary of Agriculture Benson said today... in a speech in San Francisco... that increased wages in food industries have contributed to the lower income of farmers. He said that in recent years (in those industries) less than half the rise in wages was justified by increased labor productivity. The acting Senate Democratic leader, Clements of Kentucky, immediately accused Benson of trying to get farmers to forget his own mistakes by attacking labor.

~~The director of the federal mediation service... Joseph Finnegan... today summoned both sides in the four-month-old Westinghouse strike to meet in Washington on Monday for an all-out effort to reach a settlement. Two labor experts... Dr. George W. Taylor and David L. Cole... will sit in on the Monday meeting.~~

The president of the University of Alabama... Dr. O.C. Carmichael... asked the student body today "to show to all the world" that the recent violence on the campus does not represent their true spirit. Dr. Carmichael defended the decision of the university trustees to exclude Autherine Lucy from classes until further notice. The action, he said, was taken "to insure safety on the campus." He said he was sure "the state" would protect the university against future mob violence, and that "with patience, wisdom and good will the problem will be solved." He said, "The ~~[illegible]~~ now before the university is not ~~segregation versus integration... but law~~ and order ~~[illegible]~~."

In Georgia today, President Eisenhower went quail hunting on the plantation owned by Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey. He bagged the limit of 12 birds. Before taking to the fields, Mr. Eisenhower signed an executive order. The order sets up a voluntary program...aimed at establishing a nationwide pool of trained executives, to be brought into Government service in the event of general mobilization. It is called "The National Defense Executive Reserve", and comes under the administration of Dr. Arthur Fleming, director of defense mobilization.

In Washington, the White House announced another executive order... signed by Mr. Eisenhower yesterday... which means fewer fathers will be subject to the draft. Under the new plan, registrants without children, in the 19-through-25 age group, are placed at the top of the list of eligible draftees. The oldest in this group, however, will be called first.

The Air Force chief of staff... General Twining... today said that Russia is building long-range jet bombers, which can reach "our people, our schools, and our cities." He said that, consequently, the Air Force must establish jet interceptor bases, close to densely populated areas. Twining addressed the third annual Conference of Mayors, in Washington.

French Premier Mollet today presented his Algerian proposals to the National Assembly. Mollet said he still intends to call free elections in Algeria, despite the opposition of French colonists. Algeria, he said, cannot be held by force alone. He also promised immediate and long-range economic reforms.

My colleague, David Schoenbrun, cables from Paris that Spain has asked France to "go slow" in granting Morocco full independence. ~~The request, Schoenbrun says, was made by the Spanish ambassador... who was told France intends to carry out its pledge of November 6th, 1955.~~ ~~At that time~~, France has promised the Moroccans "independence in inter-dependence", linking a new independent Morocco to France as an equal, sovereign partner. Spain, Schoenbrun says, is obviously concerned over how this may affect Spanish Morocco.

Informed sources in Cyprus say that Great Britain and leaders of the union-with-Greece movement have agreed on a plan for home rule. British officials acknowledge such a plan has been offered. The report that it has been accepted is unconfirmed.

In London today, the Bank of England raised the interest rate on loans an additional one percent. The increase was ordered as an inflation curb. The official British interest rate is now the highest in 24 years.. and new austerity measures will be announced tomorrow in Parliament.

The House of Commons voted tonight to abolish the death penalty for murder. The vote was 293 to 262.

And Queen Elizabeth ~~ended her tour of Nigeria today. She is~~ returning to England by ~~plane, in company with her husband, the Duke~~ of ~~Edinburgh.~~

Reports from New Delhi tonight, say that India is ready to reject a Russian offer of some jet bombers, at half price, in favor of Canberra jet bombers from Britain. The only condition is reported to be, that the British bombers ~~which~~ be equipped with a new secret bombsight. Reportedly, this condition is likely to be met.

Edward R. Murrow: February 16, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

American, British and French representatives have been meeting in Washington trying to figure out a way of heading off a war in the Middle East. The tension was eased somewhat when Israel's Prime Minister Ben Gurion said he would wait awhile before starting on the project to divert the waters of the Jordan. The Syrians have threatened to start shooting if the Israeli's started digging. Eric Johnston, the President's special representative on the Jordan Valley project, had tried without success to work out an agreement on the division of the Jordan waters between Israel and her neighbors. Ben Gurion is willing for him to try again, but Mr. Johnston is leaving for the Far East next week on a business trip, in his capacity as President of the Motion Picture Association. Apparently the Jordan must wait.

From time to time Mr. Dulles and his associates deplore an arms race in the Middle East, and say we want to have nothing to do with it. This is a plausible attitude, except for one thing: an arms race is now in progress. One of the competitors is hog-tied. Israel wants to buy defensive weapons, particularly fighters and armor. We refuse to sell. There is a report today that an Israeli mission is in Tokyo, trying to buy thirty million dollars' worth of equipment.

No one can be sure exactly how much equipment Egypt has received from the Russian bloc; but there is sound reason to believe that Cairo has already acquired more planes and armor than she can man or maintain. A considerable number of modern bombers have been delivered, and as the Israelis point out, bombers are not normally considered defensive weapons. A pool of armaments is being built up in Egypt, which can either be used by that country or funneled off to other Arab states, thereby increasing the already considerable prestige and power of Egypt in the Arab world.

The American position in this matter can be compared to the even-handed, impartial justice of a law which prohibits both rich men and poor men from begging in the street.

It is only fair to point out that Egypt's Colonel Nasser, before he made the arms deal with the Communists, called in the British and American Ambassadors and told them that since he couldn't get arms from them he was going to deal with the Communists. They thought he was bluffing.

Israel is asking to buy arms, not in the same amount, but it wants qualitative equality of defensive weapons. If they cannot buy from this country, they will buy where they can. A moderate supply, especially of modern fighter planes, would strengthen the hands of the moderates in Israel, but if that doesn't happen, then the extremists, watching the military balance go more and more against them, will demand action, and soon.

In the present climate there appears to be no possibility of fruitful negotiations between Israel and her neighbors. The violent history of this area, even during the last decade, provides blame enough for both sides. But the situation that confronts us, is not a study of recent history or the apportionment of blame. It is an arms race in the Middle East. It is an overt and increasing threat of war in the area. What our policy is, other than to deplore the situation, I do not know; nor do I pretend to know what the policy should be. But in this vacuum there is danger that both sides may miscalculate our intentions and objectives in the area.

One thing is certain: the Arab states cannot carry out any of their various objectives, whether it be a partition of Israel, or the expunging of it from the map, without a terrible war, which might well involve the entire planet. There will be no Munich in the Middle East. Everyone there, Jew and Arab alike, professes to be searching for security, and to find it only in terms of armor and aircraft. This may be deplorable, certainly it is dangerous, but it is a fact.

Apparently Saudi-Arabia is looking for some more security, too. That country is linked by treaty to Egypt. Tomorrow eighteen M-41 light tanks are due to leave Brooklyn aboard the James Monroe for a Saudi-Arabian port. We sold them the tanks. The State Department declined to say how much Saudi-Arabia paid for them. # The question that confronts this country is what, if anything, can be done by us, or in conjunction with our allies, to prevent a war in the Middle East. This reporter is mindful of something Jan Masaryk, then Czecho-slovakian Ambassador to London said, on the night the Munich agreement was signed. We were discussing the war that was bound to come, and Masaryk said: "In a world where there is no security for little nations, there ain't no security for big ones."

Hugh Holden.

Word for Today

To doubt the existence of an arms race in the Middle East is to ignore the realities. But Carl Becker said, "Realities are less dangerous than fancies." As for who will win, Hugh Keough (KEY-O) had a suggestion. He said, "The race is not always to the swift, but that is where to look."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

The Senate elections subcommittee voted unanimously today for a sweeping investigation of campaign contributions. Chairman Albert Gore said the subcommittee was "disturbed" by reports that certain interests may have sought by means of political contributions "to exercise an undue and improper influence on legislative proposals." The subcommittee, he said, "intends to explore this matter fully to the end that the American people may be advised of the facts." The investigation..growing out of the campaign contribution offered to Senator Francis Case..must still be approved by the Senate.

A government technician told the Senate investigations subcommittee today that the shipment of machine tools to Russia is helping Soviet war production. John Williams, a Defense Department specialist said the relaxation of trade restrictions..in 1954..resulted in Russia getting British machine tools "primarily" useful for military production. Chairman McClellan said yesterday that his subcommittee was encountering resistance form certain Government quatters. At the start of today's hearing, he announced that the Defense Department had agreed to cooperate "to the limit".

Secretary of Agriculture Benson said today..in a speech in San Francisco.. that increased rates in food industries have contributed to the lower income of farmers. He said that in recent years (in those industries) less than half the rise in wages was justified by increased labor productivity. The acting Senate Democratic leader, Cements of Kentucky, immediately accused Benson of trying to get farmers to forget his own mistakes by attacking labor.

The president of the University of Alabama..Dr. O. C. Carmichael..asked the student body today "to show to all the world" that the recent violence on the campus does not represent their true spirit. Dr. Carmichael defended the decision of the university trustees to exclude Autherine Lucy from classes until further notice. The action, he said, was taken "to insure safety on the campus." He said he was sure "the state" would protect the university against future mob violence, and that "with patience, wisdom and good will the problem will be solved."

In Georgia today, President Eisenhower went quail hunting on the plantation owned by Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey. He bagged the limit of 12 birds. Before taking to the fields, Mr. Eisenhower signed an executive order The order sets up a voluntary program..aimed at establishing a nationwide pool of trained executives, to be brought into Government service in the event of general mobilization. It is called "the National Defense Executive Reserve." and comes under the administration of Dr. Arthur Fleming, director of defense mobilization.

In Washington, the White House announced another executive order..signed by Mr. Eisenhower yesterday..which means fewer fathers will be subject to the draft, Under the new plan, registrants without children in the 19-through 25 age group are placed at the top of the list of eligible draftees. The oldest in this group, however, will be called first.

Thei Air Force chief of staff.. General Twining..today said that Russia is building long-range jet bombers which can reach "our people", our schools, and our cities." He said that, consequently, the Air Force must establish jet interceptor bases clost to densely populated areas. Twining addressed the third annual Conference of Mayors, in Washington.

French Premier Mollet today presented his Algerian proposals to the National Assebly. Mollet said he still intends to call free elections in Algeria, despite, the opposition of French colonists. Algeria, he said, cannot be held by force alone. He also promised immediate and long-range economic reforms.

My colleague, David Schoenbrun, cables from Paris that S ain has asked France to "go slow" in granting Morocco full independence. France has promised the Moroccans "independence in inter-dependence", linking a new independent Morocco to France as an equal, soverign partner. Spain, Schoenbron says, is obviously concerned over how this may affect Spanish Morocco.

Informed sources in Cyprus say that Great Britain and leaders of the union-with-Greece movement have agreed on a plan for home rule. British officials acknowledge such a plan has been offered. The report that it has been accepted is unconfirmed.

In London today, the Bank of England raised the interest rate on loans an additional one percent. The increase was ordered as an inflation curb. The official British interest rate is now the highest in 24 years..and new austerity m asures will be announced tomorrow in Parliament.

The House of Commons voted tonight to abolish the death penalty for murder. The vote was 293 to 262.

Reports from New Delhi tonight say that India is ready to reject a Russian offer of some jet bombers, at half price, in favor of Canberra jet bombers from Britain. The only condition is reported to be, that the British bombers be equipped with a new secret bombsight. Reportedly, this condition is likely to be met.

American, British and French representatives have been meeting in Washington trying to figure out a way of heading off a war in the Middle East. The tension was eased somewhat when Isreal's Prime Minister Ben Gruion said he would wait awhile before starting on the project to divert the waters of the Jordan. The Syrians have threatened to start shooting if the Israeli's started digging. Eric Johnston, the President's special representaitve on the Jordan Valley project, had tried without success to work out an agreement on the division of the Jordan waters between Israel and her neighbors. Ben Gurion is willing for him to try again, but Mr. Johnston is leaving for the Far East next week on a business trip, in his capacity as President of the Motion Picture Association. Apparently the Jordan must wait.

From time to time Mr. Dulles and his associates deplore an arms race in the Middle East, and say we want to have nothing to do with it. This is a plausible attitude, except for one thing: an arms race is now in progress. One of the competitors is hog-tied. Israel wants to buy defensive weapons, particularly fighters and armor. We refuse to sell. There is a report today that an Israeli mission is in Tokyo, trying to buy thirty million dollar's worth of equipment.

No one can be sure exactly how much equipment Egypt has received from the Russian bloc; but there is sound reason to believe that Cairo has already acquired more planes and armor than she can man or maintain. A considerable number of modern bombers have been delivered, and as the Israelis point out, bombers are not normally considered defensive weapons. A pool of armaments is being built up in Egypt, which can either be used by that country or funneled off to other Arab states, thereby increasing the already considerable prestige and power of Egypt in the Arab world.

The American position in this matter can be compared to the even-handed impartial justice of a law which prohibits both rich men and poor men from begging in the street.

It is only fair to point out that Egypt's Colonel Nasser, before he made the arms deal with the Communists, called in the British and American Ambassadors and told them that since he couldn't get arms from them he was going to deal with the Communists. They thought he was bluffing.

Israel is asking to buy arms, not in the same amount, but it wants qualitative equality of defensive weapons. If they cannot buy from this country, they will buy where they can. A moderate supply, especially of modern fighter planes, would strengthen the hands of the moderates in Israel, but if that doesn't happen, then the extremists, watching the military balance go more and more against them, will demand action, and soon.

In the present climate there appears to be no possibility of fruitful negotiations between Israel and her neighbors. The violent history of this area, even during the last decade, provides blame enough for both sides. But the situation that confronts us is not a study of recent history or the apportionment of blame. It is an arms race in the Middle East. It is an overt and increasing threat of war in the area. What our policy is, other than to deplore the situation, I do not know; nor do I pretend to know what the policy should be. But in this vacuum there is danger that both sides may miscalculate our intentions and objectives in the area.

One thing is certain: the Arab states cannot carry out any of their various objectives, whether it be a partition of Israel or the expunging of it from the map, without a terrible war which might well involve the entire planet. There will be no Munich in the Middle East.

Everyone there, Jew and Arab alike, professes to be searching for security, and to find it onyy in terms of armor and aircraft. This may be deplorable, certainly it is dangerous, but it is a fact.

Apparently Saudi-Arabia is looking for some more security too. That country is linked by treaty to Egypt. Tomorrow eighteen M-41 light tanks are due to leave Brooklyn aboard the James Monroe for a Saudi-Arabian port. We sold them the tanks. The State Department declined to say how much Saudi-Arabia paid for them.

The question that confronts this country is what, if anything, can be done by us, or in conjunction with our allies, to prevent a war in the Middle East. This reporter is mindful of something Jan Masaryk, then Czecho-slovakian Ambassador to London said, on the night the Munich agreement was signed. We were discussing the war that was bound to come, and Masaryk said: "In a world where there is no security for little nations, there ain't no security for big ones."

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Hugh Holder.

HOLDER: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: To doubt the existence of an arms race in the Middle East is to ignore the realities. But Carl Becker said, "Realities are less dangerous than fancies." As for who will win, Hugh Keough had a suggestion. He said,"The race is not always to the swift, but that is where to look."

Edward R. Murrow Fri., Feb. 17, 1956

This is the news:

President Eisenhower vetoed the natural gas bill today. In his veto message, Mr. Eisenhower said: "Since the passage of this bill, a body of evidence has accumulated, indicating that private persons... apparently representating only a very small segment of a great and vital industry... have been seeking to further their own interests, by highly questionable activities. I believe," Mr. Eisenhower said, "I would not be discharging my own duty, were I to approve this legislation, before the activities in question have been fully investigated by the Congress, and the Department of Justice." The President emphasized that he is in accord with the basic objectives of the bill, which would have freed natural gas producers, from direct federal price regulation. Such regulation, he said, "will discourage individual initiative and incentive to explore for, and develop, new sources of supply. In the long run," he said, "this will limit supplies of gas, which is contrary not only to the national interest, but especially to the interest of consumers."

By the phrase "highly questionable activities", Mr. Eisenhower obviously referred to the 25-hundred-dollar campaign contribution offered to Republican Senator Francis Case. The offer was made shortly before the Senate was to vote on the controversial gas measure. Case rejected the offer, and voted against the measure. The money later was traced to an executive of the Superior Oil Company of Los Angeles.

Democratic Senator Fulbright... co-author of the bill... calls President Eisenhower's veto message "very weak". / And Democratic Senator Kerr of Oklahoma said, "The message is 100 percent political buncombe". Both said they regard it as an indication Mr. Eisenhower will run for re-election. / Democratic Senator Gore said that in vetoing the gas bill, Mr. Eisenhower performed "a notable act in the public interest." / Gore is chairman of the elections subcommittee which has ordered a broad investigation of the contribution offer. Democratic Senator Douglas said the President had done the people [redacted] "a great public service."

Mr. Eisenhower vetoed the gas bill at his vacation retreat in Georgia. During the day, he went out on a golf course for the first time since his heart attack in September... and played nine holes, scoring an 11-over par 47.

Early today, President Eisenhower cancelled the shipment of 18 M-41 tanks to Saudi Arabia. Saudi Arabia had applied for the tanks last April, along with other equipment. / They came to public view yesterday, as they were about to be loaded aboard a freighter, here in New York. / The shipment was immediately protested by Israel, which has been trying... unsuccessfully... to obtain American arms for months. And Democratic senators, in Congress, denounced the move as threatening to upset the balance of power in the Middle East. Although the shipment has been cancelled, Chairman George of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, says he will demand an explanation from Secretary of State Dulles, as soon as Mr. Dulles returns from vacation. / Saudi Arabia, in turn, has protested the cancellation at the State Department. // And a spokesman for the Arab League charged that the American action "violates treaty commitments of long standing."

~~The Arab League spokesman said the light tanks were "intended solely for training purposes," in connection with the work of an American training mission in Saudi Arabia. In Jerusalem, the Israeli Foreign Ministry said it viewed the cancellation "with satisfaction". But Israel's request for arms, it said, is as urgent as ever.~~

France announced today that it has suspended all light arms shipments to foreign buyers, in view of the tense situation in North Africa and the Middle East. In London, Great Britain announced it was continuing arms shipments to the Middle East "for the time being".

It was reported last night on this program that Israel was trying to order 30-million dollars worth of arms from Japan. [redacted] The Japanese foreign office says it has checked the reports... carried by several Japanese newspapers... and that they are unfounded. The Israeli diplomatic mission in Tokyo also denies the reports.

The British government issued a "white paper" today, outlining Britain's defense program for [redacted] the next fiscal year. The defense budget will be increased slightly.... by 32-million dollars... and work will be expanded on what the paper calls "a variety of nuclear weapons".

→

Major priority is assigned to ballistic rockets of the "intercontinental type", as a deterrent to aggression. "Our forces," the White Paper said, "must be prepared against the outbreak of limited wars. There is no sign that the leaders of the Soviet Union have abandoned their aim of world domination."

New, drastic measures to control inflation in Britain were announced today in the House of Commons. Food subsidies were cut, public works construction slashed, and terms for installment buying tightened. A 50 percent down payment on radio and television sets is now required. Bread and milk prices will go up, because of lower food subsidies. The Labor Party immediately presented a motion of censure, and it will be debated next week.

In Moscow, the speech by Soviet Premier Bulganin... scheduled for today... did not come off. Instead, the Communist Party congress heard an address by former Premier Malenkov, who endorsed the continuing emphasis on the heavy industry program.

A Marine Corps transport plane, with 38 servicemen aboard, has crashed in rugged hill country in Alameda County, California. The aircraft was flying from the El Toro marine base, in Southern California, to Oakland international airport. Wreckage of the plane has been sighted from the air. There was no sign of life.

Edward R. Murrow: February 17, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

A few minutes' flying time from Communist China, is the main airport of Bangkok, the capital of Thailand. It has been the scene this week, of a concourse of military men and equipment, mostly American, taking part in the first SEATO maneuvers. # The drift toward meutralism in Southeast Asia has been getting stronger. ~~Prince Norodom~~ The, Premier of Cambodia, is in Peiping ~~Pekin~~ this week, receiving red carpet treatment, and probably confirming Cambodia's determination to keep clear of SEATO. Public opinion in Thailand apparently had been headed the same way, which is why the Thai government asked for the SEATO exercises. It, and Washington, hoped the show of power would convince the Thais that SEATO really can defend them. Yesterday SEATO contingents paraded through Bangkok watched by 250,000 excited people. Now the State Department and the Pentagon can study the results. They have given the theory of keeping friends by showing power a thorough test.

But the proximity of Red China also has been a factor in these exercises. They are linked with the bigger maneuvers of the United States forces at Iwo Jima, still more impressive, because simulated atomic bombs are being used. The two demonstrations are announcing with emphasis, that we and our SEATO associates not only are pledged to act against aggression in this area, but are able to do so. Peiping resents the message, and the Peiping radio is bitterly accusing the United States of following a "policy of strength, clamoring and blackmail."

But our accent on power in Asia is due to shift somewhat to economic aid. Secretary Dulles is to be in Karachi on March 6th, when Pakistan is host to the SEATO Foreign Ministers. Here he will propose that the economic clauses of SEATO, neglected up to now, be implemented. Washington wants to prove that SEATO is not exclusively a military alliance, as its critics allege, as well as to offset Communist economic penetration in Southeast Asia.

Pakistan has a lively interest in economic aid. It is finding its greatly enlarged military establishment a heavy burden. Its weapons and equipment from the United States come free, but the maintenance of a big military force takes so much of the nation's revenue that not enough is left for social and educational needs. As in Thailand, opposition has been growing against the military commitment to the West. Moscow knows the Pakistani are growing restive, and hopes to lure the country out of the Western alliance altogether.

When the question of economic aid in South Asia is raised at Karachi, the United States and Britain will be found at odds, not over giving the aid, but how to give it. The United States wants the aid program to be part of SEATO. The British distrust any link with military power. They want the Colombo plan used instead. They argue that after being in existence for six years, the Colombo plan has the confidence of its members, is a co-operative Asian effort, has no big implications in the world power struggle, and for this reason is particularly well thought of by India and Indonesia. The United States is one of the donor powers, and the recipient members include not only the three Asian states belonging to SEATO, Pakistan, Thailand and the Philippines, but virtually all the non-communist countries in Asia. The Colombo plan has successes to its credit, but never has had vast sums to work with. Now if the United States is going to finance a bigger aid program in Asia, the British will urge that it be done through a non-military agency. They think it a far more effective way to stem the spread of communism.

Mr. Dulles is not expected to agree to soft-pedal the military approach. At Karachi he will press the recommendations for increased military activity made by SEATO's military experts at their last meeting in Melbourne. These include co-ordinated military planning, standardization of weapons and joint maneuvers. The British are expected to oppose joint maneuvers. They do not like this week's exercises in Thailand and are only taking a minor part in them.

So Anglo-American differences, over this and the aid program, are anticipated at Karachi. They may not be dangerous, still they will bear out the lack of Anglo-American agreement loudly advertised by Khrushchev in his speech at the Communist Party Congress in Moscow this week. No doubt he knew that these differences loomed up in the recent Eisenhower-Eden talks, despite reports of full accord. Sir Anthony went home admitting that an understanding over Asian policy had not been reached.

In the meantime opinion in some American quarters is veering toward economic measures as the best way to serve our interests in Asia. Ambassador John Sherman Cooper, on leave in Washington, has made some impression on Republican congressmen over the importance of economic aid to India. Paul Hoffman, former head of the E.C.A. attracted wide attention with a proposal to check Soviet gains in Asia with a full-blown Marshall Plan for that area. It should be designed, he said, to help all ten Asian countries that have won their independence in the last decade, and be extended as well to include Japan, Thailand and Formosa. #

Word for Today

In Southeast Asia... this past week... we have been trying "to make friends and influence people" by a show of force. Horace said, "Force, unaccompanied by prudence, sinks under its own weight." So, with the British, we are also devising a program of economic aid. For as Albert Einstein observed, "An empty stomach is not a good political adviser."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

President Eisenhower vetoed the natural gas bill today. In his veto message, Mr. Eisenhower said: "Since the passage of this bill, a body of evidence has accumulated, indicating that private persons..apparently representing only a very small segment of a great and vital industry..have been seeking to further their own interests by highly questionable activities."I believe," Mr. Eisenhower said, "I would not be discharging my own duty were I to approve this legislation before the activities in question have been fully investigated by the Congress and the Department of Justice." The President emphasized that he is in accord with the basic objectives of the bill, which would have freed natural gas producers from direct federal price regulation. Such regulation, he said, "will discourage individual initiative and incentive to explore for and develop new sources of supply. In the long run," he said, "this will limit supplies of gas which is contratry not only to the national interest, but especially to the interest of consumers."

By the phrase "highly questionable activities", Mr. Eisenhower obviously referred to the 25-hundred dollar campaign contribution offered to Republican Senator Francis Case. The offer was made shortly before the Senate was to vote on the controversial gas measure. Case rejected the offer, and voted against the measure. The money laterwas traced to an executive of the Superior Oil Company of Los Angeles.

Democratic Senator Fulbright..co-author of the bill..calles President Eisenhower's veto message "very weak"; and Democraiic Senator Kerr of Oklahoma said, The message is 100 percent political buncombe." Both said they regard it as an indication Mr. Eisenhower will run for re-election. Democratic Senator

Gore said that in vetoing the gas bill, Mr. Eisenhower performed "a notable act in the public interest." Gore is chairman of the elections subcommittee which has ordered a broad investigation of the contribution offer. Democratic Senator Dougles aaid the Freisdnet has done the people "a great public service."

Mr. Eisenhower vetoed the gas bill at his vacation retreat in Georgia. During the day, he went out on a golf course for the first time since his heart attack in September.. and played nine holes, scoring an 11-over par 47.

Early today, President Eisenhower cancelled the shipment of 18 M-41 tanks to Saudi Arabia. Saudi Arabia had applied for the tanks last Arpril, along with other equipment. They came to public view yesterday, as they were about to be loaded aboard a freighter, here in New York. Thi shipment was immediately protested b Israel, which has been trying,...unsuccessfully..to obtain American arms for months. And Democratic senators, in Congress denounced the move as threatening to upset the balance of power in the Middle East. Although the shipment has been cancelled, Chairman George of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee says he will demand an explanation from Secretary of State Dulles, as soon as Mr. Dulles returns from vacation. Saudi Arabia, in turn, has protested the cancellation at the State Department.

And a spokesman for the Arab League charged that the American action "violates treaty commitments of long standing."

France announced today that it has suspended all light arms shipments to foreign buyers, in view of the tense situation in North Africa and the Middle East. In London, Great Britain announced it was continuing arms shipments to the Middle East "for the time being."

It was reported last night on this program that Israel was trying to order 30-million dollars worth of arms from Japan. The Japanese foreign office says it has checked the reports..carried by several Japanese newspapers.. and that they are unfounded. The Israeli diplomatic mission in Tokyo also denies the reports.

The British government issued a "white paper" today, outlining Britain's defense program for the next fiscal year. The defense budget will be increased slightly..by 32 million dollars...and work will be expanded on what the paper calls " a variety of nuclear weapons." Major priority is assigned to ballistics rockets of the "intercontinental type", as a deterrent to aggression. "Our forces", the White Paper said, "must be prepared against the outbreak of limited wars. There is no sign that the leaders of the Soviet Union have abandoned their aim of world domination."

New, drastic measures to control inflation in Britain were announced today in the House of Commons. Food subsidies were cut, public works construction slashed, and terms for installment buying tightened. A 50 percent down payment on radio and television sets is now required. Bread and milk prices will go up, because of lower food subsidies. The Labor Party immediately presented a motion of censure, and it will be debated next week.

In Moscow, the speech by Soviet Premier Bulganin..scheduled for today... did not come off. Instead, the Communist Party congress heard an address by former Premier Malenkov, who endorsed the continuing emphasis on the heavy industry program.

A Marine Corps transport plane, with 38 servicemen aboard, has crashed in rugged hill country in Alameda County, California. The aircraft was flying from the El Toro Marine Base, in Southern California, to Oakland International Airport. Wreckage of the plane has been sighted from the air. There was no sign of life.

A few minutes' flying time from Communist China is the main airport of Bangkok, the capital of Thailand. It has been the scene this week of a concourse of military men and equipment, mostly American, taking part in the first SEATO Maneuvers.

The drift toward neautralism in Southeast Asia has been getting stronger. The Premier of Cambodia, is in Peiping this week, receiving rod carpet treatment, and probably confirming Cambodia's determination to keep clear of SEATO. Public opinion in Thailand apparently had been headed the same way, which is why the Thaigovernment asked for the SEATO exercises. It and Washington hoped the show of power would convince the Thais that SEATO really can defend them. Yesterday SEATO contingents paraded through Bangkok watched by 250,000 excited people. Now the State Department and the Pentagon can study the results. They have given the theory of keeping friends by showing power a thorough test.

But the proximity of Red China also has been a factor in these exercises. They are linked with the bigger maneuvers of the United States forces at Iwo Jima, still more impressive because simulated atomic bombs are being used. The two demonstrations are announcing with emphsais that we and our SEATO associates not only are pledged to act against aggression in this area, but are able to do so. Peiping resents the message and the Peiping radio is bitterly accusing the United States of following a "policy of strength, clamoring and blackmail."

But our accent on power in Aisa is due to shift somewhat to economic aid. Secretary Dulles is to be in Karachi in March 6th, when Pakistan is host to the SEATO Foreign Ministers. Here he will propose that the economic clauses of SEATO, neglected up to now, be implemented. Washington wants to prove that SEATO is not exclusively a military alliance, as its critics allege, as well as to offset Communist economic penetration in Southeast Asia.

Pakistan has a lively interest in economic aid. It is finding its greatly enlarged military establishment a heavy burden. Its weapons and equipment from the United States come free, but the maintenance of a big military force takes so much of the nation's revenue that not enough is left for social and educational needs. As in Thailand, opposition has been growing against the military commitment to the West. Moscow knows the Pakistani are growing restive, and hopes to lure the country out of the Western alliance altogether.

When the question of economic aid in South Asia is raised at Kracchi, the United States and Britain will be found at odds not over giving the aid, but how to give it. The United States wants the aid program to be part of SEATO. The British distrust any ling with military power. They want the Colombo plan used instead . They argue that after being in existence for six years, the Colombo plan has the confidence of its members, is a co-operative Asian erfort ass no big implications in the world power struggle, and for this reason is particularly well thought of by India and Indonesia. The United States is one of the donor powers, and the recipient members include not only the three Asian states belonging to SEATO, Pakistan Thailand and the Philippines, but virtually all the non-communist cou tries in Asia. The Colombo plan has successes to its credit, but never has had vast sums to work with. Now if the United States is going to finance a bigger aid program in Asia, the British will urge that it be done through a non-military agency. They think it a far more effective way to stem the spread of Communism.

Mr. Dulls is not expected to agree to soft-pedal the military approach. At Karachi he will press the recommendations for increased military activity made by SEATO's military experts at their last meeting in Melbourne. These include co-ordinated military planning, standardization of weapons and joint maneuvers. The British are expected to oppose joint maneuvers. They do not like this week's exercises in Thailand and are only taking a minor part in them.

So Anglo-American difference, over this and the aid program, are anticipated at Karachi. They may not be dangerous, still they will bear out the lack of Anglo-American agreement loudly advertised by Khurshchev in his speech at the Communist Party Congress in Moscow this week. No doubt he knew that these differences loomed up in the recent Eisenhower-Eden talks, despite reports of full accord. Sir Anthony went home admitting that an understanding over Asian policy had not been reached.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today.. first, here is a word from our announcer.

ANNOUNCER: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: In Southeast Asia ..this past week..we have been trying "to make friends and influence people" by a show of force. Horace said, "Force, unaccompanied by prudence, sinks under its own weight." So, with the British, we are also devising a program of economic aid. For as Albert Einstein observed, "An empty stomach is not a good political adviser."

Good Night and Good Luck!

Edward R. Murrow Mon., Feb. 20, 1956

This is the news:

A former United States attorney testified today that... while he was still in office... oil lobbyist John Neff tried to make his family a gift of 500 dollars. The testimony was given by Donald R. Ross, before the special Senate committee investigating the campaign contribution offered to Republican Senator Francis Case... at the time the Senate was about to vote on the natural gas bill. Case rejected the offer. Ross said that, at Neff's request, he arranged for Neff to meet Nebraska's two Republican senators, to discuss the gas measure. # Ross testified... in tears... that after he arranged those meetings, Neff tried to set up a bank account, in the amount of 100 dollars, for each of his five children. Ross said that, at soon as he received the bankbooks, he sent them back. Ross resigned as United States attorney for Nebraska, only last week. He denied any wrongdoing, but said he thought it best to resign... since he had become involved in the gas controversy. In further testimony today, Ross said that Neff... a lobbyist, identified as serving the Superior Oil Company of Los Angeles... also donated 25-hundred dollars to the Nebraska State Republican Committee.

Another Senate group looking into the subject of lobbying... the elections subcommittee, headed by Senator Gore... decided today to ask for 300-thousand dollars, to finance a sweeping investigation.

Tonight, the Senate Democratic policy committee recommended unanimously, that a new special bipartisan committee be set up to make a broad inquiry into campaign gifts and lobbying in Congress. Senator Johnson, the Democratic leader, said a resolution to create the new group will be brought before the Senate "at the earliest possible date", probably tomorrow. Senator Knowland... the Republican minority leader.. previously had urged the establishment of such a committee. Membership of the new committee, Johnson said, will be equally divided between Republicans and Democrats.

The House passed and sent to the Senate today a bill to make the military services do more of their buying through competitive bidding... and less through negotiated contracts. The vote was 372 to 2.

President Eisenhower did some more quail hunting today on Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey's Georgia plantation. News Secretary Hagerty said Mr. Eisenhower will return to Washington on Friday or Saturday... probably Saturday... and Hagerty said he "assumes" the President's next regular news conference will be held on February 29th.

President Eisenhower sent a message of greeting today to the meeting of the American Association of School Administrators in Atlantic City. Mr. Eisenhower wished the educators "wisdom and courage" in their deliberation on school problems.

Federal mediators brought both sides in the Westinghouse strike together today in Washington, for an "all-out effort" toward a settlement. The strike has lasted 127 days.

Twenty-two persons... identified as pickets... were arrested today, in a strike of 12-thousand production workers, against the Republic Aviation Corporation at Farmingdale, New York. All were accused of disorderly conduct. The strike began yesterday, on the issue of wages.

The Ford Motor Company today reported net earnings totaling 437-million dollars in 1955... and production, in the 12-month period, of more than two and a half million cars and trucks. Production, sales and earnings were the highest in the company's history. Ford's last production record was set in 1923... in the day of the Model-T.

The freighter James Monroe sailed from Brooklyn today with those 18 light tanks for Saudi Arabia. President Eisenhower embargoed the shipment last Thursday, then revoked the embargo on Saturday. Chairman George, of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, says he wants to question Secretary of State Dulles about the arms deal, when Mr. Dulles returns from vacation later this week. An Israeli request for American arms, to off-set Communist arms shipments to Egypt, was made last November... and has not been granted.

→

Experts from the fifteen Nato countries met in Paris today, to study the continuing problems of defense. The talks will last for two weeks. And the emphasis will be on the role of nuclear weapons.

In Moscow today, the Communist Party congress unanimously approved the new policy line laid down last week by party boss Khrushchev. In that prohouncement, Khrushchev proclaimed war no longer inevitable... and said the Communist revolution, in some instances, can be won without violence through parliamentary means. Tomorrow, the party congress is expected to hear the long-delayed speech by Soviet Premier Bulganin on the new Soviet five-year plan.

Fifty-two persons died when a French airliner crashed near Cairo early today and burst into flames. The aircraft was flying to Paris from Saigon... and had developed engine trouble.

West German Chancellor Adenauer has suffered a serious political defeat. His coalition has lost control of North Rhine-Westphalia, Germany's largest state. The German Chancellor loses his two-thirds majority in the Bundesrat, Germany's Upper House. This may mean trouble in passing the necessary legislation for West German re-armament. Dick Hottelet cables me from Bonn that Adenauer's prestige has been painfully damaged, and the result could be unsettling on German foreign and domestic policy.

Adenauer was accused of neglecting German interests in the Saar - making too many concessions to France - accused also of tying Germany too rigidly to the Western Alliance - and of failing to negotiate directly with Russia for German re-unification. His critics contended that German membership in NATO and the Paris Treaties stand in the way of German re-unification, and they won.

Late, almost complete returns in the general election in Greece give the pro-Western coalition of Premier Karamanlis a margin of only 13 seats in the new parliament. ~~At the same time, it is apparent that the Communist-supported opposition has a majority of the popular votes.~~

No one in the West, certainly not the State Department or the British Foreign Office, can greet the narrow victory of the pro-Western party of Premier Karamanlis in the Greek election with much satisfaction. It was better than his being beaten outright. But to have won by so slim a margin is only a little better than defeat, because the opposition got a majority of the popular vote, and failed to gain control of the Greek chamber only because the Karamanlis regime altered the electoral laws to assure extra seats in districts where it was strongest.

Greece now stands on the brink of neutralism. It hasn't gone over to it, but to be so close is a startling transformation for a nation that was made a full-fledged member of NATO, and ranks as the country that has received more American aid than any other of its size in the world. It is hard to deny that the foundations of Western power in this region are shaking, and since this is happening in the heat of the arms crisis in the Middle East, the gravity of such events is obvious.

The near-defeat of the Pro-Western Karamanlis must be written down first of all to the trouble over Cyprus. It is the latest of the colonial issues to beset Western governments.

The United States ought to be the most influential foreign government in Athens. The Truman doctrine saved Greece from Communist guerillas in the first place, and American military and economic aid lifted Greece to its exalted place in European affairs as a member of NATO. But American as well as British policy tripped on the Cyprus issue. We failed to vote for a debate of the question by the U.N. Assembly. And after the anti-Greek riots in Turkey, the State Department addressed identical notes to Greece and Turkey, which to the Greeks was unpardonable, since they were the victims and the Turks the perpetrators. It can be said that had we sided with the Greeks against Turkey, we would have lost influence in Turkey, which is even more important to Western defense. But that observation does not make the developments in Greece any happier to contemplate.

But the bad news in Greece must not be exaggerated. The popular vote against the government is not a pro-communist majority. The combined opposition was made up of seven parties, only two of them - two of the smallest - being pro-communist. (The communist party itself is outlawed.) Three of the other five parties are more or less anti-communist, and are led by former premiers. They did establish a united front with the pro-communists for campaign purposes. Mr. Papendreou, leader of the Liberal Party, largest in the popular front, told C.B.S. correspondent Bill Pepper that if the opposition won, he would not set up any government with the help of pro-communists. Actually the united front coalition was a campaign device and was falling apart before election day. And even if it had won a small majority in the chamber, it is doubtful that it could have formed a government.

But the closeness of the result, and the anti-government majority of the popular vote, make an early election possible. As things now stand the reliability of Greece as a member of NATO is questionable.

What happens now depends somewhat on whether Premier Karamanlis can lure one or more of the opposition parties into his new government. If he does so with promises of important cabinet posts, he not only would muster a bigger majority in the chamber, but could claim to have the backing of a majority of the popular vote. That way he might be able to stave off an early election. If that can be put off, the popular front idea would not have so good a chance to take root. But if he fails to recruit any of the opposition parties, another election would seem inescapable, and the united front might well be used again for campaign purposes.

Needless to say the united front, with an accent on neutralism, is the pattern the Kremlin is eloquently recommending in its current propaganda. It is worth mentioning that an argument that impressed many Greeks in the election campaign, was that nowadays neutralism pays just as well as affiliation with the West. American aid to Egypt and Yugoslavia were cited as proof of it.

Word for Today

What has happened in Greece, recalls Sir Walter Scott's famous line: "Two sisters by the goal are set... cold Disappointment, and regret." But it would be a mistake, because of this setback, to despair of our aid program. Josephus Daniels said, "Defeat never comes to any man, until he admits it."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

A former United States attorney testified today that..while he was still in office..oil lobbyist John Neff tried to make his family a gift of 500 dollars. The testimony was given by Donald R. Ross, before the special Senate committee investigating the campaign contribution offered to Republican Senator Francis Case of S.D...at the time the Senate was about to vote on the natural gas bill. Case rejected the offer. Ross said that, at Neff's request, he arranged for Neff to meet Nebraska's two Republican senators to discuss the gas measure.

Ross testified..in tears..that after he arranged those meetings, Neff tried to set up a bank account in the amount of 100 dollars for each of his five children. Ross said that, at soon as he received the bankbooks, he sent them back. Ross resigned as United States attorney for Nebraska only last week. He denied any wrong doing, but said he thought it best to resign..since he had become involved in the gas controversy. In further testimony today, Ross said that Neff..a lobbyist identified as serving the Superior Oil Company of Los Angeles..also donated 25-hundred dollars to the Nebraska State Republican Committee.

Another Senate group looking into the subject of lobbying ..the elections subcommittee headed by Senator Gore..decided today to ask for 300-thousand dollars to finance a sweeping investigation.

Tonight, the Senate Democratic policy committee recommended unanimously, that a new special bipartisan committee be set up to make a broad inquiry into campaign gives and lobbying in Congress. Senator Johnson, the Democratic leader, said a resolution to create the new group will be brought before the Senate "at the earliest possible date", probably tomorrow. Senator Knowland.. the Republican Minority leader..previously had urged the establishment of such a committee. Membership of the new committee, Johsnon said, will be eq-equally divided between Republicansa and Democrats.

The House passed and sent to the Senate today a bill to make the military services do more of their buying through competitive bidding..and less through negotiated contracts. The vote was 372 to 2.

President Eisenhower did some more quail hunting today on Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey's Georgia plantation. News Secretary Hagerty said Mr. Eisenhower will return to Washington on Friday or Saturday..probably Saturday ..and Hagerty said he "assumes" the President's next regular news conference will be held on February 29th.

President Eisenhower sent a message of greeting today to the meeting of the American Association of School Administrators in Atlantic City. Mr. Eisenhower wished the educators "wisdom and courage" in their deliberation on school problems.

Federal mediators brought both sides in the Westinghouse strike together today in Washington for an "all-out effort" toward a settlement. The strike has lasted 127 days.

Twenty-two persons..identified as pickets..were arrested today..in a strike of 12-thousand production workers against the Republic Aviation Corporation at Farmingdale, of New York. All were accused of disorderly conduct. The strike began yesterday, on the issue of wages.

The Ford Motor Company today reported net earnings totaling 437-million dollars in 1955..and production, in the 12-month period, of more than two and a half million cars and trucks . Production, sales and earnings were the highest in the company's history. Ford's last production record was set in 1923.. in the day of the Model-T.

The freighter James Monroe sailed from Brooklyn today with those 18 light tanks for Saudi Arabia. President Eisenhower embargoed the shipment last Thursday, then revoked the embargo on Saturday. Chairman George, if the Senate foreign Relations Committee, says he wants to question Secretary of State Dulles about the arms deal, when Mr. Dulles returns from vacation later this week. An Israeli request for American arms, to off-set Communist arms shipments to Egypt, was made last November ..and has not been granted.

Experts from the fifteen Nato countries met in Paris today, to study the continuing problems of defense. The talks will last for two weeks. And the emphasis will be on the role of nuclear weapons.

In Moscow today, the Communist Party congress unanimously approved the new policy line laid down last week by party boss Khrushchev. In that pronouncement, Khrushchev procalimed war no longer inevitable..and said the Communist revolution, in some instances, can be won without violence through parliamentary means. Tomorrow, the party congress is expected to hear the long-delayed speech by Soviet Premier Bulganin on the new Soviet five-year plan.

Fifty - two persons died when a French airliner crashed near Cairo early today and burst into flames. The aircraft was flying to Paris from Saigon ...and had developed engine trouble.

West German Chancellor Adenauer has suffered a serious political defeat. His coalition has lost control of North Rhine-Westphalia, Germany's largest state. The German Chancellor loses his two-thirds majority in the Bundesrat, Germany's Upper House. This may mean trouble in passing the necessary legislation for West German re-armement. Dick Hottelet cables me from Bonn that Adenauer's prestige has been painfully damaged, and the result could be unsettling on German foreign and domestic policy.

Adenauer was accused of neglecting German interests in the Saar - making too many concessions to France - accused also of tying Germany too rigidly to the Western Alliance - and of failing to negotiate directly with Russia for German re-unification. his ciritics contended that German membership in NATO and the Paris Treaties stand in the way of German re-unification, and they won.

Late, almost complete returns in the general election in Greece give the pro-Western coalition of Premier Karamanlis a margin of only 13 seats in the new parliament.

No one in the West, certainly not the State Department or the British Foreinn Office, can greet the narrow victory of the pro-Western party of Premier Karamanlis in the Greek election with much satisfaction, It was better than his being beaten outright. But to have won by so slim a margin is only a little better than defeat, because the opposition got a majority of the popular vote,and failed to gain control of the Greek chamber only because the Karamanlis regime altered the electoral laws to assure extra seats in districts where it was strongest.

Greece now stands on the brink of neautralism. It hasn't gone over to it, but to be so close is a startling transformation for a nation that was made a full-fledged member of NATO, and ranks as the country that has received more American aid than any other of its size in the world. It is hard to deny that the foundations of Western power in this region are shaking, and since this is happening in the heat of the arms crisis in the Middle East, the gravity of such events is obvious.

The near-defeat of the Pro-Western Karamanlis must be written down first of all to the trouble over Cyprus. It is the latest of the colonial issues to beset Western governments.

The United States ought to be the most influential foreign government in Athens. The Truman doctrine saved Greece from Communist guerillas in the first place, and American military and economic aid lifted Greece to its exalted place in European affairs as a member of NATO. But American as well as British policy tripped on the Cyprus issue. We failed to vote for a debate of the question by the U.N. Assembly. And after the anti-Greek riots in Turkey, the State Department addressed identical notes to Greece and Turkey, which to the Greeks was unpardonable, since they were the victims and the Turks the perpetrators. It can be said that had we sided with the Greeks against Turkey, we would have lost influence in Turkey, which is even more important to Western defense. But that observation does not make the developments in Greece any happier to contemplate.

But the bad news in Greece must not be exaggerated. The popular vote against the government is not a pro-communist majority. The combined opposition was made up of seven parties, only two of them - two of the smallest - being pro-communist. (The communist party itself is outlawed.) Three of the five parties are more or less anti-communist and are led by former premiers. They did establish a united front with the pro-communists for campaign purposes. Mr. Papandreou, leader of the Liberal Party, largest in the popular front, told C.B.S. correspondent Bill Pepper that if the opposition won, he would not set up any government with the help of pro-communists. Actually the united front coalition was a campaign device and was falling apart before election day. And even if it had won a small majority in the chamber, it is doubtful that it could have formed a government.

But the closeness of the result, and the anti-government majority of the popular vote, make an early election possible. As things now stand, the reliability of Greece as a member of NATO is questionable.

What happens now depends somewhat on whether Premier Karamanlis can lure one or more of the opposition parties into his new government. If he does so with promises of important cabinet posts, he not only would muster a bigger majority in the chamber, but could claim to have the backing of a majority of the popular vote. That way, he might be able to stave off an early election. If that can be put off, the popular front idea would not have so good a chance to take root. But if he fails to recruit any of the opposition parties, another election would seem inescapable, and the united front might well be used again for campaign purposes.

Needless to say, the United front, with an accent on neautralism, is the pattern the Kremlin is eloquently recommending in its current propaganda. It is worth mentioning that an argument that impressed many Greeks in the election campaign, was that nowadays neautralism pays just as well as affiliation with the West. American aid to Egypt and Yugoslavia were sighted as proof of it.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is our announcer.

ANNOUNCER: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: What has happened in Greece recalls Sir Walter Scott's famous line: "Two sisters by the goal are set..cold disappointment and regret." But it could be a mistake, because of this setback, to despair of our aid program. Josephus Danield said, "defeat never comes to any man until he admits it."

Good Night and Good Luck!

Edward R. Murrow Tues., Feb. 21, 1956

This is the news:

Soviet Premier Bulganin asked the Communist Party Congress today to approve the new Russian five-year plan. / In a speech... lasting 3½ hours... Bulganin set forth the goals of the new plan, and expressed confidence they would be reached. / The emphasis will still be on heavy industry. / Steel output... by 1960... is to be increased by 70 percent. / But production of consumer goods, he said, must also be increased. Farm production is to be stepped up. (The plan calls for an increase of at least 85 percent in the basic crops). And in the next five years, four million technicians are to be graduated from Russia's schools and universities. / Bulganin claimed that Russia leads all other countries in the development of atomic energy for peaceful purposes, and this "major discovery of the 20th Century," he said, "must be made to serve the cause of Communism." / He noted that the plan calls for the construction of "several" new atomic power stations. And industrial progress, he said, means the application of the most up-to-date technology, including automation. (There were also political overtones to Bulganin's speech, and I should like to discuss those in a few minutes).

British Prime Minister Eden told the House of Commons today, he "welcomes" the recent proposal... by Communist Party Boss Khrushchev... for banning further tests of the hydrogen bomb. But first, Eden said, "we must work out a reasonable system of control." He said if Russia has any concrete proposals to make along that line, it will have the opportunity, when the United Nations disarmament subcommittee meets again next month. Tonight, Eden's conservative government defeated a Labour motion of no confidence, by a vote of 325 to 259. The issue was the government's anti-inflation program.

The British war minister... Antony Head... announced plans today for a new streamlined, highly mobile army... to meet the new requirements of the atomic age. Combat groups, he said, will be smaller, and equipped with the most modern weapons. He said British troops will be trained, this year, in use of the American "Corporal" missile.

Austria decided today to join the pro-Western Council of Europe. The council is an advisory group, composed of representatives of 14

European countries and the Saar. Although formed along parliamentary lines, it does not have law-making powers.

In Paris today, top-level talks ended between France and West Germany on the future of the Saar. A joint communique said French Foreign Minister Pineau and West German Foreign Minister Von Brentano had had a "frank and cordial discussion" of the problem, and would meet again on March third, in Bonn. Meantime, discussions will continue on a lower level.

Czechoslovakia charged today that an American balloon... carrying propaganda leaflets... caused the crash of a Czech airliner on January 18th. Twenty-two persons were killed in the accident. A Czech spokesman said remnants of an American propaganda balloon were found less than two miles from the scene.

Europe remains gripped in its worst cold wave in memory, and today the United States took preliminary steps to help communities stricken on both sides of the Iron Curtain. The State Department instructed its representatives in 19 European countries to survey the relief needs in their areas and report urgently to Washington. President Eisenhower offered last week-end to send surplus food.

In Malaya today, British bombers struck at a Communist camp in Central Johore. More than 100 tons of bombs were dropped in one of the heaviest raids of the eight-year-old guerrilla war.

France announced today that it has agreed to withdraw its last troops from Indochina. #

In Washington, Secretary of the Air Force Quarles told the Senate Armed Services Committee today that the United States Air Force is "the most powerful striking force ever assembled on earth." The Air Force chief of staff... General Twining... also testified, and said the Russians "are narrowing our margin of superiority."

The Senate Republican Policy Committee voted unanimously today for establishment of a new special committee to investigate improper lobbying in Congress. Like the Democratic Policy Committee yesterday, the Republicans called for a "wide open" investigation. A resolution to this effect has been introduced in the Senate, and will be voted on tomorrow. The action grew out of the 25-hundred-dollar campaign contribution offered to Republican Senator Case of South Dakota. at the time the Senate was debating the natural gas bill. Case rejected the offer.

Senator George said today that Secretary of State Dulles has tentatively agreed to appear before the Foreign Relations Committee on Friday, to explain the shipment of 18 light tanks to Saudi Arabia. ★ George is chairman of the group. A number of Democratic senators have protested the shipment of arms to an Arab country, when Israel's request for arms has not been granted.

The names of both Adlai Stevenson and Senator Kefauver were entered today in Florida's Democratic primary, scheduled for May 29th. The contest was assured with the filing of slates of delegates favorable to both candidates.

And Millard Tydings, the former United States senator from Maryland, filed today for the Democratic senatorial nomination. Tydings made his last race in 1950, when he was defeated by the Republican candidate, John Butler, in a heated campaign. Senator Butler also is seeking re-election.

Edward R. Murrow: February 21, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

Premier Bulganin, who spoke for ~~four~~ 3½ hours at the Communist Party Congress today, had to wait more than a week for the spotlight, and that fact surely tells something about his inferiority in power to Party Secretary Khrushchev. Little details like that are the only hints the outside world gets of the nature of the present Soviet leadership. Bulganin's address was the second most important of the Congress, because it dealt with the Five Year Plan. But if he were co-equal with Khrushchev he would have received his acclaim at the Congress long before today.

Like all the other speakers, he paid tribute to the principle of "collective leadership." Certainly a concerted effort has been made to convince the Soviet people and the world that the tyranny of the rigid authoritarian Soviet regime has undergone a remarkable transformation. The Congress heard this tyranny politely called "the cult of the individual". The less polite name for it is Stalin's twenty-year reign of terror.

One of the features of the Congress has been the candor with which Stalin and Stalinism have been condemned. It is noteworthy that most of this condemnation has come from men who were close to Stalin and served him gladly, like Mikoyan and Malenkov. Now it is admitted that Stalin made colossal errors that had to be corrected. One was his attack on Tito. Another was the Berlin blockade, another the support of North Korea which brought about the massive re-armament of the West. Not all of this is being spelled out at the Congress, but it may be comforting to Westerners to hear belated censure of Stalin. Yet to have it come from his closest co-workers has a false ring to it. If Stalin was so wrong, then the West was right to stand up against him. That is not what these ex-Stalinists are saying or even implying. All they are doing is paying obeisance to the current slogan of "collective leadership."

What is meant by the words is not what they suggest, a democratic sharing of power, or agreement reached through reason. Foreign Minister Molotov's speech yesterday gave the game away. Here is the head of the Foreign Office, a veteran Communist leader, who was one of the triumvirate in power right after the death of Stalin. If true collective leadership existed, he would have a big part in it. But in his speech he did no leading. Instead he had to eat crow. He began by recanting once more the heresy of saying that only the foundations of the Soviet Socialist state had been laid. He had to confess that his own foreign office had been the prisoner of habits and conventions dating from before World War Two. He had to say it had been over-ruled by the Central Committee, so that it now is going all out to unite the working classes of the world for peace - which means reconciliation with the hated social democrats. He had to say that the Central Committee had never in history paid more attention to foreign policy, and he reeled off the missions of Khrushchev and Bulganin to Yugoslavia, India, Burma and Afghanistan, and the talks with the two Germanys and with Norway and Finland. This was the speech of a cowed and submissive penitent. What is remarkable is that he keeps a job. Much the same can be said about Malenkov. But their still being about doesn't prove that this is collective leadership.

It should not need to be said that where there is true collective leadership there is an instrumentality for settling difference. Power normally does not yield to persuasion, it yields to greater power. In the United States the greater power is the people, from whom all other power is derived. In Great Britain it is the House of Commons, and then the people. If leaders fall out in a democracy they appeal to the greater power, which then decides who is to lead. But what is the greater power in the Soviet Union? In the days of Stalin there was only one greater power, it was his mortality. Finally he died. To whom will today's leaders appeal if they fall out? Nothing has been set up to fill the vacuum of power that lies below the top in the Soviet system.

Collective leadership is a phrase that may describe how Soviet leaders work together for the time being. But not so long ago, one of them had ambitions and did not co-operate. His name was Beria. The other top men stood together and erased him. Now Khrushchev has more power than anyone else. He is not a Stalin, and he likes to talk about collective leadership. But the Soviet system of government has not changed. Personalities in it have changed.

Rivalries and ambitions are sure to develop in the Kremlin. Maybe they can be dealt with, as in the case of Molotov and Malenkov, without purges and executions. If so, the world will take note of the velvet gloves and the hands of iron. But if there should be another Beria, the velvet gloves are sure to come off, and blood will flow in Moscow again. No new principle of government has been grafted onto the old Soviet tyranny to make it acceptable to those who cherish freedom. Maybe Khrushchev is sharing some of his power, maybe he isn't. We really don't know yet. But we do know he isn't sharing it with the Soviet people, or even with the rank and file of the Communist Party.

Bob White

Word for Today

The Russians would seem to be ~~cold-shouldering~~ condemning Stalin, and rewriting the doctrine of Lenin and Marx. Will Rogers once commented, "This guy Marx, why he was like one of those efficiency experts. He could explain to you, how you could save a million dollars, and he couldn't save enough himself to eat on. He never did a tap of work."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

Soviet Premier Bulganin asked the Communist Party Congress today to approve the new Russian five-year plan. In a speech..lasting 3½ hours..Bulganin set forth the goals of the new plan, and expressed confidence they would be reached. The emphasis will still be on heavy industry. Steel output..by 1960.. is to be increased by 70 percent. But the production of consumer goods, he said, must also be increased. Farm production is to be stepped up. (The plan calls for an increase of at least 85 percent in the basic crops. And in the next five years, four million technicians are to be graduated from Russia's schools and universities. Bulganin claimed that Russia leads all other countries in the development of atomic energy for peaceful purposes, and this, "major discovery of the 20th Century", he said, "must be made to serve the cause of Communism." He noted that the plan calls for the construction of "several" new atomic power stations. And industrial progress, he said, means the application of the most up-to-date technology, including automation. (There were also political overtones to Bulganin's speech, and I should like to discuss those in a few minutes.

British Prime Minister Eden told the House of Commons today he "welcomes" the recent proposal..by Communist Party Boss Khrushchev ..for banning further tests of the hydrogen bomb. But first, Eden said, "we must work out a reasonable system of control." He said if Russia has any concrete proposals to make along that line, it will have the opportunity when the United Nations disarmamane subcommittee meets again next month. Tonight, Eden's conservative government defeated a Labour motion of no confidence by a vote of 325 to 259. The issue was the government's anti-inflation program.

The British war minister..Antony Head..announced plans today for a new streamlined, highly mobile army..to meat the new requriements of the atomic age. Combat groups, he said, will be smaller and equipped with the most modern weapons. He said British troops will be trained this year in use of the American "Corporal" missile.

Austria decided today to join the pro-western Council of Europe. The council is an advisory group, composed of representatives of 14 European countries and the Saar. Although formed along parliamentary lines, it does not have law making powers.

In Paris today, top-level talks ended between France and West Germany on the future of the Saar. A joint communique said French Foreign Minister Pineau and West German Foreign Minister Von Brentano had had a "frank and cordial discussion" of the problem, and would meet again in March third, in Bonn. Meantime, discussions wil continue on a lower level.

Czechoslovakia charged today that an American balloon..carrying propaganda leaflets..caused the crash of a Czech airliner on January 18th. Twenty-two persons were killed in the accident. A Czech spokesman said remnants of an American propaganda balloon were found less than two miles from the scene.

Europe remains gripped in its worst cold wave in memory, and today the United States took preliminary steps to help communities stricken on both sides of the Iron Curtain. The State Department instructed its representatives in 19 European countries to survey the relief needs in their areas and report urgently to Washington. President Eisenhower offered last week-end to send surplus food.

In Malaya today, British bombers struck at a Communist camp in Central Johore. More than 100 tons of bombs were dropped in one of the heaviest raids of the eight-year-old guerilla war.

France announced today that it has agreed to withdraw its last troops from Indochina.

In Washington, Secretary of the Air Force Quarles told the Senate Armed Sevvices Committee today that the United States Air Force is "the most powerful striking force ever assembled on earth." The Air Force chief of staff... General Twining..also testified, that said the Russians "are narrowing our margin of superiority."

The Senate Republican Policy Committee voted unanimously today for establishment of a new special committee to investigate improper lobbying in Congress. While the Democratic Policy Committee yesterday, the Republicans called for a "wide open" investigation. A resolution to this effect has been introduced in the Senate, and will be voted on tomorrow. The action grew out of the 25-hundred - dollar campaign contribution offered to Republican Senator Case of South Dakota at the time the Senate was debating the natural gas bill Case rejected the offer.

Senator George said today that Secretary of State Dulles has tentatively agreed to appear before the Foreign Relations Committee. On Friday, to explain the shipment of 18 light tanks to Saudi Arabia. George is chairman of the group. A number of Democratic senators have protested the shipment of arms to an Arab country, when Israel's request for arms has not been granted.

Premier Bulganin, who spoke for 3½ hours at the Communist Party Congress today, had to wait more than a week for the spotlight, and that fact surely tells somethin about his inferiority in power to Party Secretary Khrushchev Little details like that are the only hints the outside world gets of the nature of the present Soviet leadership. Bulganin's address was the second most important of the Congress, because it dealt with the Five Year Plan. But if he were co-equal with Khurshchev he would have received his acclaim at the Congress long before today.

Like all the other speakers, he paid tribute to the principle of "collective leadership". Certainly a concerted effort has been made to convince the Soviet people and the world that the tyranny of the rigid authroitarian Soviet regime has undergone a remarkable transformation. The Concress heard this tyranny politely called " the cult of the individual." The less polite name for it is Stalin's twenty-year-reign of terror.

One of the features of the Congress had been the candor with which Stalin and Stalinism have been condemned. It is noteworthy that most of this condemnation has come from men who were close to Stalin and served him gladly, like Mikoya and Malenkov. Now it is admitted that Stalin made colossal errors that had to be corrected. One was his attack on Tito. Another was tha Berlin Blockade another the support of North Korea which brought about the massive re-armament of the West. Not all of this is being spelled out at the Congress, but it may be comforting to Westerners to hear belated censure of Stalin. Yet to have it come from his closest co-workers had a false ring to it. If Stalin was so wrong, then the vest was right to stand up against him. That is not what these ex-Stalinists are saying or even implying. All they are doing is paying obeiscance to the current slogan of "collective leadership."

What is meant by the words is not what they suggest, a democratic sharing of power, or agreement reached through reason. Foreign Minister Molotov's speech yesterday gave the game away. Here is the head of the Foreign Office, a veteran Communist leader, who was one of the triumvirate in power right after the death of Stalin. If true collective leadership existed, he would have had a big part in it. But in his speech he did no leading. Instead he had to eat crow. He began by recanting once more the heresy of saying that only the foundations of the Soviet Socialist state had been laid. He had to confess that his own foreign office had been the prisoner of habbits and conventions dating from before World War Two. He had to say it had been over-ruled by the Central Committee, so that it now is going all out to unite the working classes of the world for peace - which means reconciliation with the hated social democrats. He had to say that the Central Committee had never in history paid more attention to foreign policy, and he reeled off the missions of hurshchev and Bulganin to Yugoslavia, India, Burma and Afghanistan, and the talks with the two Germanys and with Norway and Finalnd. This was the speech of a cowed and submissive pentinent. What is remarkable is that he keeps a job. Much the same can be said about Malenkov. But their still being about doesn't prove that this is collective leadership.

It should not need to be said that where there is true collective leadership there is an instrumentality for settling difference. Power normally does not yield to persuasion, it yields to greater power. In the United States the greater power is the people, from whom all other power is derived. In Great Britain it is the House of Commons, and then the people. If leaders fall out in a democracy they appeal to the greater power, which then decides who is to lead. But what is the greater power in the Soviet Union? In the days of Stalin there was only one greater power, it was his mortality. Finally he died. To whom will today's leaders appeal if they fall out? othing has been set up to fill the vaccuum of power that lies below the top in the Soviet system.

Collective leadership is a phrase that may describe two Soviet leaders work together for the time being. But not so long ago, one of them had ambitions and did not co operate. His name was Beria. The other top men stood together and erased him. Now Khurshchev has more power than anyone else. He is not a Stalin, and he likes to talk about collective leadership. But the Soviet system of government has not changed. Personalities in it have changed.

Rivalries and ambitions are sure to develop in the Kremlin. Maybe they can be dealt with, as in the case of Molotov and Malenkov, without purges and executions. If so the world will take note of the velvet gloves and the hands of iron. But if there should be another Beria, the velvet floves are sure to come off, and the blood will flow in Moscow again. No new principles of government has been grafted onto the old Soviet tyrnanny to make it acceptible to those who cherish freedom. Maybe Khrushchev is sharing some of his power, maybe he isn't. We really don't know yet. But we do know he isn't sharing it with the Soviet people, or even with the rank and file of the Communist Party.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. First, here is Bob Hite....(HITE: COMMERCIAL)

MURRO : The Russians would seem to be condemning Stalin and rewriting the doctrine of Lenin and Marx. Will Rogers once commented, " This guy Marx, why he was like one of those efficiency experts. He could explain to you how you could save a million dollars, and he couldn't save enough himeslf to eat on. He never did a tap of work."

Good Night and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Wed., Feb. 22, 1956

This is the news:

President Eisenhower has ordered the release of forty-four tons of Uranium 235...(worth a billion dollars).. for use in this country, and overseas, in the development of atomic energy for peaceful purposes. Mr. Eisenhower said the action "demonstrates the confidence of the United States in the possibilities of developing nuclear power for civilian uses. It is an earnest," he said, "of our faith that the atom can be made a powerful instrument for the promotion of world peace." About half the uranium will be available for foreign distribution. But none of it will go to those countries which are presently producing Uranium 235, or to the Soviet Union and its satellites.

President Eisenhower issued the statement at Thomasville, Georgia, where he has been vacationing for the past week. He got in some more golf today... played 18 holes.

There were various reports today that Mr. Eisenhower has told close associates he wants a second term. According to a story in the Detroit News, Presidential Assistant Sherman Adams had "passed the word" Mr. Eisenhower would run. This was denied by White House Secretary Hagerty, who said that to his knowledge no one had relayed a second-term decision of any nature by the President.

Secretary of State Dulles returned from his Caribbean vacation today. He said that while he had been gone, he had heard nothing of the controversy over the shipment of those 18 light tanks to Saudi Arabia. Mr. Dulles noted that he had an appointment to appear before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Friday. In the meantime, he said, he would get "boned up" on what had happened.

George V. Allen, the assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs, testified before a House foreign affairs subcommittee today behind closed doors. Afterwards, the subcommittee chairman... Representative Morgan of Pennsylvania... predicted that there will be no more arms shipments to the Middle East "until the problem can be worked out on an equality basis."

The Senate voted today for a broad investigation of improper or illegal attempts to influence anyone in the Federal Government. The vote was 79 to 1. The resolution... sponsored by the Democratic and Republican policy committees... originally called for an investigation restricted to campaign contributions and lobbying practices. The Senate, however, accepted an amendment by Democratic Senator Fulbright, broadening the inquiry to include improper attempts to influence anyone in Government. The lone vote against the resolution was cast by Republican Senator Langer, who pointed out that the new special committee... that will do the investigating... has almost a year in which to make its report. "By that time," he said, "the next presidential election may be bought and paid for." ~~Democratic Leader~~ Johnson said ~~the regular Senate committees would still have jurisdiction~~ to ~~look into any irregularities. Republican Leader Knowland~~ ~~concurred.~~

The offer of a 25-hundred-dollar campaign contribution to Republican Senator Case of South Dakota set off today's action... and already is under investigation by another special committee, headed by Senator George. The money, which Case refused to accept, reportedly came from the personal fund of a California oil man, Howard Keck. A source close to the George committee is quoted today (by the Associated Press) as saying that Keck also made a large contribution to the National Citizens for Eisenhower Committee. The group's headquarters, here in New York, says its list of major contributions... dating back to August, 1952... fails to show any donation in Keck's name. Keck himself has not been reached for comment.

The Senate began debating the omnibus farm bill today. The measure... as it is now worded... contains both the Administration's soil bank plan, and high, rigid price supports. The purpose of the soil bank is to reduce plantings, and so cut down on production. The Administration opposes high supports... because, it says, they will stimulate production and aggravate the situation arising from existing surpluses.

As Senate debate got underway late today, Democratic Senator Ellender argued that only by re-instating high, rigid supports, can the nation "put more dollars into the farmers' pockets, without delay."

A series of wholesale arrests were made today in Montgomery, Alabama, as an outgrowth of the Negro boycott of the city buses. One hundred and fifteen Negroes were indicted last night, under an Alabama law, relating to organized boycotts. Among the Negro leaders arrested today were 16 ministers.

~~Here in New York, the noted fashion designer...hattie Carnegie... died today after a long illness. She was 70 years of age.~~

In Algeria, rebel forces ambushed a military supply convoy. Nineteen French soldiers were killed, before the attackers were driven off by fighter aircraft. French casualties are believed to be the heaviest suffered in any single action, in more than a year.

A Russian economic mission arrived in Lebanon today, as the first stop on a tour of the Arab states. The Russians reportedly have offered Lebanon incentives for stepping up its trade with the Iron Curtain countries.

Edward R. Murrow: February 22, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

Secretary Dulles, on his return to Washington from a fishing vacation, found himself facing an unfamiliar kind of crisis. He has weathered storms before, over mistakes made by the State Department, over those he has made himself. But this time a feeling seems to be growing that his whole foreign policy needs overhauling. That is, all will not be well even if the Saudi Arabian tank deal can be clarified. What has shaken Washington is not only the tank deal, and the way it was handled, but the absence of a visible and determined policy to keep the peace in the Middle East.

It now is realized that we knew about the Soviet arms offer to Egypt before the Big Four meeting at Geneva. Yet we did nothing about it there. Presumably at the time the State Department had not properly measured the danger. Presumably it didn't know how to deal with the consequences of the Soviet arms deal if it went through. Presumably it still doesn't know, or it would do it.

But it is not the Middle East alone that is creating anxiety in Washington. The Middle East has produced only some of the setbacks suffered by the West. Here is a list of them as summarized by one newspaper this week: The Greek elections. Cambodia signing a pledge in Peiping not to accept protection and aid from SEATO, at the very moment that SEATO military exercises were being carried out in Thailand to impress Asian opinion. Chancellor Adenauer's defeat in the largest of the West German states, which lost him the votes he needs in the upper house to assure passage of his re-armament legislation. Syria's success in obtaining a promise of arms from Communist sources. President Tito's letter to the Communist Congress at Moscow calling party members "comrades" and the Soviet Union a "socialist" state, the first time he has used these words since 1948.

To this list could be added the enthusiastic endorsement by the Communist congress in Moscow of the shift of Soviet policy to economic rivalry with the West.

It is the sum total of such news that is making the impact in Washington, not separate items. And what marks the state of mind of many congressmen is a confused kind of helplessness. They see things aren't going well, but don't see how they can be made to go better. That is why they insist on questioning Mr. Dulles. It is his business to make policy, not theirs.

But they are disturbed over lesser things as well as over the want of an effective major policy. They don't like the fumbling way in which foreign affairs are sometimes handled. The switch and then switch back on the Saudi-Arabian tank deal isn't the first instance of this kind, nor the first time it has happened while Mr. Dulles was on vacation. In the tank episode, it is no excuse for the State Department that it was over-ruled by the White House, which then almost at once ~~had~~ decided to over-rule itself. A properly administered foreign policy, should not be conducted in the dark, with one hand not knowing what the other is doing. The State Department is vast and cumbersome, and Mr. Dulles spends so much time travelling and negotiating, that he hasn't ever mastered it. Nor has he lived down the brink-of-war interview in Life magazine. So he is personally on the defensive.

But still it isn't the details, it is the sum total of foreign failures, that has affected Washington. And it is just possible that the irritation and bewilderment might produce something notable. James Reston writes in the New York Times today, that the atmosphere in Washington was much the same before the organization of NATO, and the adoption of the Marshall Plan. At those times, Western policies were not working, and the West was losing ground. Officials differed in their estimates of the danger, and therefore in their recommendations of what should be done. Today, he says, Washington realizes that past emphasis on military alliances, is not ~~enough~~ enough to meet the Soviet economic and political offensive, in the Near and Far East. Washington also knows, that the Soviet objective is to destroy Western connections and influence in these regions.

But it is harder to meet the dangers now than then. NATO did wonders in Europe; SEATO is not doing wonders in Asia. The Marshall plan was designed to put industrial countries on their feet. Primitive conditions prevail in the near and Far East. Good programs for them, not only are hard to devise, it is hard to get competent personnel to administer them. The knowledge of these areas is inadequate, and it is difficult to give Congressmen a sense of their dangers or needs.

Mr. Dulles does have one retort he can make to some of his congressional questioners. It is over their opposition to the Administration's proposal, to make long-term commitments in aid programs. Indeed it is Senator George, who is in a close fight for his seat with former Governor Talmadge in Georgia, who has been most outspoken against it. But this Administration recommendation was not the great major policy the West now needs. It is only a factor in it. Now the President and Secretary Dulles may feel challenged to devise a foreign policy that in this day, is as promising and constructive, as were the Marshall Plan and NATO in theirs.

Word for Today

American foreign policy would seem to be in need of extensive repair. It may even be that entirely new policy is required. George Pettie said, "No matter so hard, but policy can prevail." Still, it must be consistent. Then nations will not say of us, with Erasmus, "He says one thing standing, another sitting down."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

President Eisenhower has ordered the release of forty-four tons of Uranium 235...(worth a billion dollars)...for use in this country, and overseas, in the development of atomic energy for peaceful purposes. Mr. Eisenhower said the action "demonstrates the confidence of the United States in the possibilities of developing nuclear power for civilian uses. It is an earnest," he said, "of our faith that the atom can be made a powerful instrument for the promotion of world peace." About half the uranium will be available for foreign distribution. But none of it will go to those countries which are presently producing Uranium 235, or to the Soviet Union and its satellites.

There were various reports today that Mr. Eisenhower has told close associates he wants a second term. According to a story in the Detroit News, Presidential Assistant Sherman Adams had "passed the word" Mr. Eisenhower would run. This was denied by White House Secretary Hagerty, who said that to his knowledge no one had relayed a second-term decision of any nature by the President.

Secretary of State Dulles returned from his Caribbean vacation today. He said that while he had been gone, he had heard nothing of the controversy over the shipment of those 18 light tank to Saudi Arabia. Mr. Dulles noted that he had an appointment to appear before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Friday. In the meantime, he said, he would get "boned up " on what had happened.

George V. Allen, the assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs, testified before a House foreign affairs subcommittee today behind closed doors. Afterwards, the subcommittee chairman..Representative Morgan of Pennsylvania.. predicted that there will be no more arms shipments to the Middle East "until the problem can be worked out on an equality basis."

The Senate voted today for a broad investigation of improper or illegal attempts to influence anyone in the Federal Government. The vote was 79 to 1. The resolution..sponsored by the Democratic and Republican policy committees..originally called for an investigation restricted to campaign contributions and lobbying practices. The Senate, however, accepted an amendment by Democratic Senator Fulbright broadening the inquiry to include improper attempts to influence anyone in Government. The lone vote against the resolution was cast by Republican Senator Langer, who pointed out that the new special committee..that will do the investigating..has almost a year in which to make its report. "By that time,"" he said, "The next presidential election may be bought and paid for."

The offer of a 25-hundred-dollar campaign contribution to Republican Senator Case of South Dakota set off today's action..and already is under investigation by another special committee, headed by Senator George. The money, which Case refused to accept, reportedly came from the personal fund of a California oil man, Howard Keck. A source close to the George committee is quoted today (by the Associated Press) as saying that Keck also made a large contribution to the National Citizens for Eisenhower Committee. The groups's headquarters, here in New York, says its list of major contritutions..dating back to August, 1952.. fails to show any doration in Keck's name. Keck himself has not been reached for comment.

The Senate began debating the omnibus farm bill today. The measure..as it is now worded..contains both the Administration's soil bank plan and high, rigid price supports. The purpose of the soil bank is to reduce plantings, and so cut down on production. The Administration spposes high supports..because, it says, the will stimulate production and aggravate the situation arising from existing surpluses. As Senate debate got underway late today, Democratic Senator Ellender argued that only by re-instating high, rigid supports can the nation "put more dollars into the farmers' pockets without delay."

A series of wholesale arrests were made today in Montgomery, Alabama, as an outgrowth of the Negro boycott of the city buses. One hundred and fifteen Negroes were indicted last night, under an Alabama law relating to organized boycotts. Among the Negro leaders arrested today were 16 ministers.

In Algeria, rebel forces ambushed a military supply convoy. Nineteen French Soldiers were killed, before the attackers were driven off by fighter aircraft. French casualties are believed to be the heaviest suffered in any single action in more than a year.

A Russian economic mission arrived Lebanon today, as the first stop on a tour of the Arab states. The Russians reportedly have offered Lebanon incentives for stepping up its trade with the Iron Crrtain countries.

Secreatry Dulles, on his return to Washington from a fishing vacation, found himself facing an unfamiliar kind of crisis. He has weathered storms before, over mistakes made by the State Department, over those he has made himself. But this time a feeling seems to be growing that his whole foreign policy needs overhauling. That is, all will not be well, even if the Saudi Arabian tank deal can be clarified. What has shaken Washington is not only the tank deal, and the way it was handled, but the absence of a visible and determined policy to keep the peace on the Middle East.

It now is realized that we knew about the Soviet arms offer to Egypt before the Big Four meeting at Geneva. Yet we did nothing about it there. Presumably at the time the State Department had not properly measured the danger. Presumably it didn't know how to deal with the consequences of the Soviet arms deal if it went through. Presumably it still doesn't know, or it would do it.

But it is not the Middle East alone that is creating anxiety in Washington. The Middle East has produced only some of the setbacks suffered by the West. Here is a list of them as summarized by one newspaper this week: The Greek elections. Cambodia signing a pledge in Peiping not to accept protection and aid from SEATO, at the very moment that SEATO military exercises were being carried out in Thailand to impress Asian opinion. Chancellor Adenauer's defeat in the largest of the West German States, which lost him the votes he needs in the upper house to assure passage of his re-armament legislation. Syria's success in obtaining a promise of arms from Communist sources. President Tito's letter to the Communist Congress at Moscow calling party members "comrades" and the Soviet Union a "socialist" state, the first time he has used these words since 1948.

To this list could be added the enthusiastic endorsement by the Communist congress in Moscow of the shift of Soviet policy to economic rivalry with the West.

It is the sum total of such news that is making the impact in Washington, not separate items. And what marks the state of mind of many congressmen is a confused kind of helplessness. They see things aren't going well, but don't see how they can be made to go better. That is why they insist on questioning Mr. Dulles. It is his business to make policy, not theirs.

But they are disturbed over lesser things as well as over the want of an effective major policy. They don't like the fumbling way in which foreign affairs are sometimes handled. The switch and then switch back on the Saudi-Arabian tank deal isn't the first instance of this kind, nor the first time it has happened while Mr. Dulles was on vacation. In the tank episode, it is no excuse for the State Department that it was over-ruled by the White House, which then almost at once decided to over-rule itself. A properly administered foreign policy whould not be conducted in the dark, with one hand not knowing what the other is doing. The State Department is vast and cumbersome, and Mr. Dulles spends so much time travelling and negotiating that he hasn't ever mastered it. Nor has he lived down the brink-of-war interview in Life magazine. So he is personally on the defensive.

But still it isn't the details, it is the sum total of foreign failures that has affected Washington. And it is just possible that the irritation and bewilderment might produce something notable. James Reston writes in the New York Times today that the atmosphere in Washington was much the same before the organization of NATO, and the adoption of the Marshall Plan. At those times, Western policies were not working and the West was losing ground. Officials differed in their estimates of the danger, and therefore in their recommendations of what should be done. Today, he says, Washington realizes that past emphasis on military alliances is not enough to meet the Soviet economic and political offensive in the Near and Far East. Washington also knows that the Soviet objective is to destroy Western connections and influence in these regions.

But it is harder to meet the dangers now than then. NATO did wonders in Europe; SEATO is not doing wonders in Asia. The Marshall plan was designed to put industrial countries on their feet. Primitive conditions prevail in the near and Far East. Good programs for them not only are hard to devise, it is hard to get competent personnel to administer them. The knowledge of these areas is inadequate, and it is difficult to give Congressmen a sense of their dangers or needs.

Mr. Dulles does have one retort he can make to some of his congressional questioners. It is over their opposition to the Administration's proposal to make long-term commitments in aid programs. Indeed it is Senator George, who is in a close fight for his seat with former Governor Talmadge in Georgia, who has been most outspoken against it. But this Administration recommendation was not the great major policy the Esst now needs. It is only a factor in it. Now the President and Secretary Dulles may feel challenged to devise a foreign policy that in this day is as promising and constructive as were the Marshall Plan and NATO in theirs.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: American foreign policy would seem to be in need of extensive repair. It may even be that entirely new policy is required. George Pettie said, "No matter so hard but policy can prevail." Still, it must be consistent. Then nations will not say of us, with Erasmus, "He says one thing standing, another sitting.down."

Goodnight and Good Luck!

Edward R. Murrow Thurs., Feb. 23, 1956

This is the news:

Democratic Senator George called today for closer liaison between Congress and the State Department, in the interest of all concerned. George... who is chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee... said he found the present state of affairs "disturbing". There is too much confusion, he said, in the public mind as to what is going on. And George cited the fact that he knew nothing of the shipment of eighteen American light tanks to Saudi Arabia "until I saw it in the newspapers." Secretary of State Dulles will appear tomorrow before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to answer questions about the tank deal... in the light of our refusal to grant Israel's request for arms aid... and to explain our Middle East policy. Tomorrow's committee meeting was to have been held behind closed doors. But in view of Senator George's statement regarding "confusion in the public mind", Mr. Dulles has agreed to a public hearing.

Vice President Nixon tonight named the new special Senate committee that will investigate corrupt political practices. The bipartisan committee is made up of eight members... four Republicans and four Democrats. The Democratic members are Gore of Tennessee, McClellan of Arkansas, Anderson of New Mexico and Kennedy of Massachusetts. The Republican members are: Bridges of New Hampshire, Thye of Minnesota, Goldwater of Arizona and Purtell of Connecticut.

Israel today announced four new border incidents. An Israeli spokesman said that in the north... by the Sea of Galilee... Syrian troops have fired on Israeli fishermen every day for the past three days. The spokesman said the fishermen returned the fire, then moved out of range. There were no known casualties. To the south... in the Gaza Strip... an Israeli patrol was fired on by Egyptian forces. One Israeli was wounded. The spokesman said the patrol was inside Israeli territory.

France announced today that it has drafted a "compromise plan", aimed at solving some of the major East-West problems... such as disarmament and the reunification of Germany. French Foreign Minister Pineau declined to give out details of the plan... calling it a "blend" of previous plans set forth by the United States and the Soviet Union. The French disarmament proposals, he said, will be submitted to the United Nations disarmament subcommittee, scheduled to meet in London soon.

In London today, the Admiralty announced that Britain is building an atom-powered submarine. At the same time, it was disclosed that Britain has started work on a new class of fleet escorts. The new vessel will be somewhere between the size of a destroyer and a cruiser. And it will carry guided missiles.

Twelve of Great Britain's colonies in the Caribbean, agreed today to unite in a single, self-ruling federation within the British Commonwealth. Elections are to be held by April, 1958. The agreement was signed by the British colonial secretary, and representatives of the West Indian territories. Bermuda and the Bahamas are not members of the Federation, by their own choice.

~~In West Germany, sixteen members of Parliament bolted the~~ Free Democratic ~~Party today.. in~~ protest against the support the Free ~~Democratic Democrats recently~~ gave anti-Adenauer forces in a provincial ~~election. The sixteen said they would form a new pro-Adenauer party.~~

In Moscow, Russia's military leaders observed Red Army Day with boasts of Soviet military strength. The statement receiving the biggest play was an announcement by Marshal Sokolovsky, the Army chief of staff, that Russia now has "reliable means" for delivering hydrogen bombs anywhere in the world. And the Russian army, he said, is equipped with "long distance" rockets.

Prime Minister Nehru of India said today that the Communist Party Congress... in Moscow... promises to bring Russia "closer and closer to normalcy." Nehru said he "welcomes" this change... and suggested that Communists outside Russia stop being such a disruptive force.

In Washington, Democratic Senator McClellan attacked what he called the Administration "policy of secrecy" with regard to Western trade with Russia. McClellan charged that it was a policy designed "for hiding the errors, inefficiency and bad judgment of Government officials."

And Democratic Senator Russell... who is chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee... announced plans for an investigation of the Administration's guided missile program. Russell said he would set up a special subcommittee to conduct the inquiry.

~~Another Senate committee continued its hearings today on marketing practices in the auto industry. Milton Ratner, a former Ford dealer,~~

A Pennsylvania Railroad passenger train... bound from Washington to New York... was derailed this evening near Bern, Maryland. It was the "Embassy". Police say at least 5 persons are dead.

Edward R. Murrow: February 23, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

The Soviet five year plan was adopted with confidence and enthusiasm by the Communist Party Congress in Moscow this week. This is despite the fact that it will fall far short of giving the Soviet people a living standard comparable with ours. It is interesting to look at what it promises Ivan Petrovich, the ordinary Soviet citizen, though that hardly is its main significance.

Ivan Petrovich is assured there will be an increase in manufactured consumer goods of sixty percent, and he is to have thirty percent more wages. But his way of living will not change much. He won't be like his American counterpart and own a car. Even though 100,000 to 150,000 passenger cars will be made in 1960, that is only one for every twenty-five persons. That needn't matter much for Ivan Petrovich, for even by 1960 there will be virtually no modern roads. #

Ivan Petrovich is told there will be four times as many refrigerators and six times as many washing machines as are now being made. However, Ivan's wife will get neither, for there will be one each for every thousand families.

Today the Petroviches live in slums. In 1960 they will still be living in slums. The Five Year Plan will somewhat increase the erection of housing, but it will not begin to meet the shortage. Isaac Deutscher, who analyzes the Five Year Plan in the current issue of The Reporter, says that it would take ten years of slum clearance, and a home construction ten times the present rate, to bring Soviet housing to today's standards in the West.

But the Petroviches will eat better in 1960. They will get a pound-and-a-half of meat per person per week, where now they get a pound, and five years ago got half-a-pound. And they will find more clothing in the stores, particularly cotton clothing. In 1960 they will be able to buy as much cotton clothing as the British do today. They also will be able to buy shoes; two pairs each, per year, as against a pair-and-a-half last year. Two pairs are not much. But the parents and grandparents of the Petroviches probably went barefoot.

The Soviet Union is now the second greatest industrial nation in the world. Last year it produced more steel and electricity than Great Britain and Western Germany put together. The Soviet Union last year, about equalled the United States of 1939, in production of steel, coal and electricity. Yet its people must live in slums; it can't afford modern roads, or adequate railroads, and the best it can promise its people by 1960 is more food and clothing. That is, it is straining to supply the necessities, and can't get more than started on the semi-luxuries that now are part of our standard of life.

Then why all the enthusiasm and confidence in Moscow this week? For one thing, Ivan Petrovich is going to be quite happy to have food and clothing, which have been inadequate for as long as he can remember. And as for cars, T.V. sets, refrigerators and washing machines, he can't miss things he never had.

But a further reason for gratification is because there will be five more years to build machines and expand the basic industries. Automation can be developed and perfected, and technicians and engineers can be educated for a more mechanized civilization. Once an automated industry is built and can be serviced, consumer goods can pour from the plants. By that time some of the steel that now has to be saved for basic industries can go into household equipment and building homes. What is more, basic industry can turn out machine tools, and machine tools can turn out consumer goods, both categories destined for the mass populations of Asia and Africa.

By 1960, per capita production in the Soviet Union will still be behind ours of 1955, not to mention ours of 1960. But if the rate of growth remains as it is, the Soviet Union may equal us in ten years, depending, of course, on the plans being fulfilled, and on our not stepping up our own expansion. But we are heading for a time when the Soviet challenge for dominance in the under-developed countries will, to speak moderately, be harder to meet. It is getting harder already.

Perhaps the most meaningful figures in the Five Year Plan deal with education. The number of schools to be built by 1960 is to double the number built from 1950 to '55, and will be four times as great as in the previous five years, when schools already had a high priority. By 1960, secondary education will be compulsory and universal. Higher education is to be free. The fees introduced by Stalin are to be wiped out. He did it at a time when school houses, teachers and textbooks were short. But he was not forgiven for fostering an outright aristocracy. There will still be elite schools for the children of top-income families. But technical and scientific education will be open to all.

The focus is on technical education. Mr. Deutscher quotes Professor Frances Symon of Oxford University as saying that more technical students are entering Soviet schools than in the whole non-communist world.

In this country, at the present rate of technological progress and education, we hope to have enough technicians and engineers to service our own economy. The Soviet planners expect to have enough to service their own and the under-developed mass populations as well.

Bob White.

Word for Today

The Russians have drawn us a blueprint of what they want to do. Spinoza said, "Men's common failing is to confide their plans." So we are forewarned. How to meet Russia's challenge will be widely debated. Publilius Syrus, who lived two thousand years ago, knew something of challenges. He said, "Look for a tough wedge for a tough log."

Goodnight and good luck!"

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

Democratic Senator George called today for closer liaison between Congress and the State Department, in the interest of all concerned. George... who is chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee..said he found the present state of affairs "disturbing."

There is too much confusion, he said, in the public mind as to what is going on. And George cited the fact that he knew nothing of the shipment of eighteen American light tanks to Saudi Arabia "until I saw it in the newspapers." Secretary of State Dulles will appear tomorrow before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to answer questions about the tank deal..in the light of our refusal to grant Israel's request for arms aid..and to explain our Middle East policy. Tomorrow's committee meeting was to have been held behind closed doors. But in view of Senator George's statement regarding "confusion in the public mind," Mr. Dulles has agreed to a public hearing.

Vice President Nixon tonight named the new special Senate committee that will investigate corrupt political practices. The bipartisan committee is made up of eight members..four Republicans and four Democrats. The democratic members are Gore of Tennessee, McClellan of Arkansas, Anderson of New Mexico and Kennedy of Massachusetts. The Republican members are: Bridges of New Hampshire, Thye of Minnesota, Goldwater of Arizona, and Purtell of Connecticut.

Israel today announced four new border incidents. And Israeli spokesman said that in the north..by the Sea of Galilee..Syrian troops have fired on Israeli fishermen everyday for the past three days. The spoksman said the fishermen returned the fire, then moved out of range. There were no known casualties. To the south..in the Gaza strip..an Israeli patrol was fired on by Egyptian forces. One Israeli was wounded. The spokesman said the patrol was inside Israeli territory.

France announced today that it was drafted a "compromise plan", aimed at solving some of the major East-West problems..such as disarmament and the reunification of Germany. French Foreign Minister Pineau declined to give out details of the plan..calling it a "blend" of previous plans set forth by the United States and the Soviet Union. The French disarmament proposals he said, will be submitted to the United Nations disarmament subcommittee, scheduled to meet in London soon.

In London today, the Admiralty announced that Britain is building an atom-powered submarine. At the same time, it was disclosed that Britain has started work on a new class of fleet escorts. The new vessel will be somewhere between the size of a destroyer and a cruiser. And it will carry guided missiles. Twelve of Great Britain's colonies in the Carribbean agreed today to unite in a single, self-ruling federation within the British Commonwealth. Elections are to be held by April, 1958. The agreement was signed by the British cononial secretary and representatives of the West Indian territories. Bermuda and the Bahamas are not members of the Federation, by their own choice.

In Moscow, Russia's military leaders observed Red Army Day with boasts of Soviet military strength. The statement receiving the biggest play was an announcement by Marshal Sokolovsky, the Army chief of staff, that Russia now has "reliable means" for delivering hydrogen bombs anywhere in the world. And the Russian army, he said, is equipped with "long distance" rockets.

Prime Minister Nehru of India said today that the Communist Party Congress..in Moscow..promises to bring Russia "closer and closer to normalcy". Nehru said he "welcomes" this change..and suggested that Communists outside Russia stop being such a disruptive force.

In Washington, Democratic Senator McClellan attacked what he called the Administration "policy of secrecy" with regard to Western trade with Russia. McClellan charged that it was a policy designed "for hiding the errors, if-efficiency and bad judgement of Government officials."

Adn Democratic Senator Russell..who is chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee..announced plans for an investigation of the Administration's guided missile program. Russel said he would set up a special subcommittee to conduct the inquiry.

A Pennsylvania Railroad passenger train..bound from Washington to New York..was derailed this evening new Bern, Maryland. It was the "Embassy". Police say at least 5 persons are dead.

The Soviet five year plan was adopted with the confidence and enthusiasm by the Communist Party Congress in Moscow this week. This is despite the fact that it will fall far short of giving the Soviet people a living standard comparable with ours. It is interesting to look at what it promises Ivan Petrovich, the ordinary Soviet citizen, though that hardly is its main significance.

Ivan Petrovich is assured there will be an increase in manufactured consumer goods of sixty percent, and he is to have thirty percent more wages. But his way of living will not change much. He won't be like his American counterpart and own a car. Even though 100,000 to 150,000 passenger cars will be made in 1960, that is only one for every twenty-five persons. That needn't matter much for Ivan Petrovich, for even by 1960 there will be virtually no modern roads.

Ivan Petrovich is told there will be four times as many refrigerators ans six times as many washing machines as are now being made. However, Ivan's wife will get neither, for there will be one each for every thousand families.

Today the Petroviches live in slums. In 1960 they will still be living in slums. The Five Year Plan will somewhat increase the erection of housing but it will not begin to meet the shortage. Isaac Deutscher, who analyzes the Five Year Plan in the current issue of The Reporter, says that it would take ten years of slum clearance, and a home construction tem times the present rate, to bring Soviet housing to today's standards in the West.

But the Petroviches will eat better in 1960. They will get a pound and a half of meat per person per week, where now they get a pound, and five years ago got half-a-pound. And they will find more clothing in the stores, particularly cotton clothing. In 1960 they will be able to buy as much cotton clothing as the British do today. They also will be able to buy shoes; two pairs each per year, as against a pair-and-a-half last year. Two pairs are not much. But the parents and grandparents of the Petroviches probably went barefoot.

The Soviet Union is now the second greatest industrial nation in the world. Last year it produced more steel and electricity than Great Britain ans Western Germany put together. The Soviet Union last yeat about equalled the United States of 1939 in production of steel, coal and electricity. Yet its people must live in slums; it can't afford modern roads or adequate railroads, and the best it can promise its people by 1960 is more food and clothing That is, it is straining to supply the necessities, and can't get more than started on the semi-luxuries that now are part of our standard of life.

Then why all the enthusiasm and condifence in Moscow this week? For one thing, Ivan Petrovich is going to be quite happy to have food and clothing, which have been inadequate for as long as he can remember. And as for cars, T.V. sets, refrigerators and washing machines, he can't miss things he never had.

But a further reason for gratification is because there will be five more years to build machines and expand the basic industries. Automation can be developed and perfected, and technicians and engineers can be educated for a more mechanized civilization. Once an automated industry is built and can be serviced, consumer goods can pour from the plants. By that time some of the steel that now has to be saved for basic industries can go into household equipment and building homes. What is more, basic industry can turn out machine tools, and machine tools can turn out consumer goods, both categories destined for the mass populations of Asia and Africa.

By 1960, per capita production in the Soviet Union will still be behind our of 1955, not to mention ours of 1960. But if the rate of growth remains as it is, the Soviet Union may equal us in ten years, depending, of course, on the plans being fulfilled, and on our not stepping up our own expansion. But we are heading for a time when the Soviet challenge for dominance in the under-developed countries will, to speak moderately, be harder to meet. It is getting harder already. Perhaps the most meaningful figures in the Five Year Plan deal with education. The number of schools to be built by 1960 is to double the number built from 1950 to '55, and will be four times as great as in the previous five years, when schools already had a high priority. By 1960, secondary education will be compulsory and universal. Higher education is to be free. The fees introduced by Stalin are to be wiped out. He said it at a time when school houses, teachers and textbooks were short. But he was not forgiven for fostering an outright aristobracy. There will still be elite schools for the children of top-income families. But technical and sciertific education will be open to all.

The focus is on technical education. Mr. Deutscher quotes Professor Frances Symon of Oxford University as saying that more technical students are entering Soviet schools than in the whole non-communist world.

In this country, at the present rate of technological progress and education, we hope to have enough technicians and engineers to service our own economy. The Soviet planners expect to have enough to service their own and the under-developed mass population as well.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with hhe Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Hite.

HITE: COMMERCIAL

MURROW:The Russians have drawn us a blueprint of what they want to do. Spinoza said, "Men's common failing is to confide their plans." So we are forewarned. How to meet Russia's challenge will be widely debated. Pubilius Syrus, who lived two thousand years ago, knew something of challenges. He said, "Look for a tough wedge for a tough log."

Good Night and Good Luck!

Edward R. Murrow Fri., Feb. 24, 1956

This is the news:

Secretary of State Dulles went up to Capitol Hill today, to explain our Middle East policy. He answered a wide range of questions put to him by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Under Secretary of State Hoover also testified. My colleague, George Herman, covered the hearing. So let's go directly to Washington for his report.

(gh report to run approx 4 mins (returns on cue: "and now back to
(
(
(Ed Murrow in NY."

The controversial farm bill was debated on the floor of the Senate for the third day. Republican Senator Aiken said that high rigid price supports... as contained in the bill... "never have brought prosperity to the American farmer, and never will." Aiken argued that since 1928, every time there has been a considerable increase in farm prices, it has been due to a wartime economy. And he predicted that, when the farm bill finally goes to a vote, it will call for the flexible supports recommended by the Administration. Democratic Senator O'Mahoney urged that large quantities of farm surpluses be bartered to foreign countries for strategic materials. And Democratic Senator Stennis expressed fear that land placed in the proposed soil bank might wash away, unless conservation measures also are written into the bill. This would apply particularly, he said, to cotton acreages in the South.

Also in the Senate today, the leaders of both parties announced plans for revising the election laws. Majority Leader Johnson said one aim of the legislation will be to put political contributions in "a goldfish bowl" for everyone to see. He said "realistic" limits would be placed on campaign spending. There would also be a provision to allow the radio and television networks to split free air time between "major" party candidates.

President Eisenhower suffered his heart attack, five months ago today. /And today his personal physician... Major General Snyder... said that as far as Mr. Eisenhower's health is concerned, he "might be safer" serving a second term, than before his illness. /General Snyder did not elaborate. /Reporters took his remark to mean that normally a man who has had a heart attack will take greater care to safeguard his health. He said he has "no impression" whether Mr. Eisenhower actually will seek another term.

Tomorrow, the President plans to fly back to Washington... ending a 10-day vacation at Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey's Georgia estate.

The Labor Department announced today, that living costs declined one-tenth of one percent in January. /The cost of food was down three-tenths of one percent, as a result of lower farm prices. /Lower prices also were reported in home furnishings. /Because of the decline in the cost-of-living index, more than a million workers in the auto, farm equipment, and aircraft industries, will receive a wage cut of one cent an hour.

In Montgomery, Alabama, 90 Negro leaders were arraigned today on charges of violating a state law prohibiting boycotts, in their refusal to ride the buses. They pleaded not guilty. And the first trials were set for March 19th.

Governor Folsom of Alabama said he was appointing a bi-racial commission to help solve the segregation problem.

In Louisiana, state legislators... who are Catholics... were warned that they risk excommunication, if they persist in seeking new state laws, requiring racial segregation in parochial and private schools. The warning appeared in an editorial in the official archdiocesan newspaper. The governor-elect of Louisiana... Earl Long... said Archbishop Joseph Francis Rummel "is undoubtedly right", in declaring segregation morally wrong. But, Long added, "maybe he is a little too advanced."

The Army announced today that Major General Caffey had been "injudicious", when he publicly praised a speech favoring segregation. But the officer, it said, violated no law or regulation "for which punitive action would be appropriate." Caffey... who is judge advocate general of the Army... had praised an address made by Democratic Representative Flynt of Georgia, before the Georgia legislature. The Army found that Caffey's remarks were solely intended as "a complimentary reference to the speaking ability of a third party."

The British Navy today called off a search for the submarine Acheron, which had been feared lost off the coast of Greenland. The sub... with 65 men aboard... has been contacted by radio, and is proceeding to port. It had ~~not~~ been heard from for six hours.

In the coastal city of Oran... in Algeria... security forces used tear gas today to keep a French mob from storming police headquarters. The mob, aroused by recent rebel attacks, was demanding a stronger government policy. Meantime, rebel leaders began circulating leaflets, claiming that France will be forced into a defeat in Algeria, as bitter as the defeat at Dienbienphu.

In Jerusalem, the United Nations truce organization confirmed today that Syria has sent it a note, regarding the Jordan River irrigation project. The note concerned Israeli plans for resuming work on the project, if an American proposal for sharing the Jordan River water...

→

between Arabs and Israelis... is not accepted. According to the Cairo radio, Syria said it would "oppose by force", any unilateral action by Israel to complete the project.

Syria said today that it fired on Israeli fishermen yesterday, on the Sea of Galilee, to keep them from beaching their boats alongside the Syrian frontier. Syria claimed it withheld its fire until some of the boats touched shore. Israel announced the incident yesterday. There were no casualties.

A Syrian Airways plane exploded in midair today, near Aleppo, killing all 17 persons on board. The airplane was on a flight from Aleppo to Damascus.

India announces it has reached "broad agreement" with British interests for building a steel plant in West Bengal. A British bank syndicate is giving India nearly 31-million dollars in credits. And the British government offered a loan of 42-million.

In West Germany tonight, Chancellor Adenauer expelled 37 members of the Free Democratic Party from his coalition government. They were expelled, after they challenged his leadership. At the same time, Adenauer [redacted] won Socialist support for the constitutional amendments [redacted] legalizing rearmament.

In Moscow, the Communist Party Congress went on formal record today against one-man rule. It unanimously adopted a resolution saying: "The Congress charges the central committee not to relax its struggle against a revival of the cult of the one man." (Referring presumably to Stalin). It also unanimously approved a resolution endorsing the general report made to the Congress by party boss Khrushchev, 10 days ago.

In Geneva, United States and Chinese Communist representatives met for the 38th time... to discuss the release of Americans held in Red China and the United States demand for renunciation of force against Formosa. Today's meeting lasted four and a half hours, with no announcement as to what progress, if any, was made.

Today... on the China coast... Communist artillery shelled the island of Quemoy. Chinese Nationalist guns returned the fire.

The Chinese Communist radio accused Japan today of preparing to train its armed forces in germ warfare. Peiping claimed the Japanese are setting up what it called "a school of chemical and bacteriological weapons."

Word for Today

For the future, there is no good chart. Sir Winston Churchill said: "The only guide to a man is his conscience; the only shield to his memory is the rectitude and sincerity of his actions. It is very imprudent," he said, "to walk through life without this shield... because we are so often mocked by the failure of our hopes."

Goodnight and good luck!

CBS RADIO DIVISION

EDWARD R. MURROW

Friday, Feb. 24, 1956
7:45-8:00 P.M.

MURROW: ... My colleague George Herman covered the hearing. So let's go directly to Washington for his report.

HERMAN: The reason the Secretary of State and his top assistants showed up before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee this afternoon for nearly four hours of questioning was ostensibly the on-again-off-again shipment of those tanks to Saudi Arabia. But before the Secretary got off the stand he testified about the Adenauer Government of Germany, the nature of the French Constitution and his whole philosophy of the card world struggle with Communism.

And where newsmen and other Senators had gotten wind of a story big enough to draw them into the Senate caucus room in almost unprecedented numbers, they got two or three stories instead. First, of course, the one they were after: Who ordered the suspension of all licenses to ship arms to the Middle East? Mr. Dulles tossed that one to Under Secretary Herbert Hoover, Jr. Mr. Hoover said he made the decision, adding that the President fully concurred. Senator Fulbright pointed out that it was reported that Hoover hadn't ever talked to the President, had instead talked to Presidential News Secretary James Hagerty, who drove to the President's side after midnite and came back with the suspension order. Hoover said he wouldn't discuss his relations with the President. Hoover was pressed on this score by various Senators and always insisted that he had decided to suspend arms exports and had decided two days later to permit them again. His face grew redder and redder as succeeding questions drew from him the fact that he had known of the contract to sell the tanks for months ahead of time, ever since September, that he knew what was in the sales contracts, that he knew all along that the sale was perfectly legal and entirely correct. Then why didn't he just announce that the sale was perfectly legal and let it go as scheduled? Well, said Mr. Hoover, he'd considered that but he heard so many charges and accusations over the radio late Thursday evening that he decided that the best thing to do to reassure everybody was to suspend the shipments long enough to reassure themselves of what Mr. Hoover repeated he already knew - namely, that the sale was perfectly legal - and then to let the shipments go again.

Several Senators expressed considerable unhappiness that all of this was done without ever consulting Secretary of State Dulles. The Secretary informed them that when he took a vacation, he really took one; no midnite phone calls at sea. And Under Secretary Hoover admitted that he didn't want to disturb theSecretary while he was away. Senator Humphrey said it was all right to disturb the President, apparently, when he was on vacation but not the Secretary. Mr. Hoover admitted that the President was more accessible at that time.

As to arms for Israel to balance what the Arab world had recently gained, Mr. Dulles was sympathetic but doubtful. He said that in Israel's place he would be making the same urgent demand for arms, but he said, from a longer look, an arms race is impractical in many ways. For one thing, it cannot always achieve balance; the time approaches when more arms for Israel's few millions cannot possibly balance more arms for the Arab world's tens of millions of people.

But to the spectators at least -- and the room was filled with them -- the most interesting thing seemed to be Mr. Dulles on the subject of what is happening in Russia. The people in the seats allotted to the general public gave Mr. Dulles a hearty cheer and a big hand as he came in, and they sat silently as the Senators filed by. And they cheered again when Secretary Dulles said the speeches at the continuing congress of the Communist party in Moscow give proof that Russian policy has failed; that the Russians, far from doing well in the world, are worse off then they were a year ago. In reply to questions by several Senators, Mr. Dulles put it this way: "The Russians are reversing their whole policy of thirty years. If we did that the whole world would call it an admission of failure. They are now following something a lot closer to our line," said Mr. Dulles, "and imitation is the sincerest form of flattery." He said the Russians are now trying to win friends by playing our game in the foreign aid field, and he said that if we can't beat them at our own game we ought to be ashamed of ourselves. But later on he shrugged aside parts of the question about just exactly what we're doing, specifically, to beat them at our own game.

And then theSecretary of State went a little further than anyone had expected. He said the changes now visible in Russia are so vast and drastic, the work of changing thirty years of doctrine and teaching so major an upheaval, that he even has doubts that Russia will always continue to be a nation seeking world domination for the Communist system. He said he could see a yeast of change at work in the Soviet Union and it might take years to see what its effect would be; but he thinks the Russians have now set in motion forces of change so vast that they may not be controllable by the Communist party. And he referred not to revolution but to the growth of thinking, feeling and demanding of their rights on the part of the people of Russia - in the far future, of course. It was a remarkable statement, Ed, and one which provoked not applause from the audience in the room but thought.

Now back to Ed Murrow in New York.

-30-

Ediphone trans./E. Scheiner

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

Secretary of State Dulles went up to Capitol Hill today to explain our Middle East policy. He answered a wide range of questions put to him by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Under Secretary of State Hoover also testified. My colleague, George Herman, covered the hearing. So let's go directly to Washington for his report.

HERMAN: The reason the Secretary of State and his top assistants showed up before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee this afternoon for nearly four hours of questioning was ostensibly the on-again-off-again shipment of those tanks to Saudi Arabia. But before the Secretary got off the stand he testified about the Adenauer Government of Germany, the nature of the French Constitution and his whole philosophy of the card world struggle with Communism.

And where newsmen and other Senators had gotten wind of a story big enough to draw them into the Senate caucus room in almost unprecedented numbers, they got two or three stories instead. First, of course, the one they were after: Who ordered the suspension of all licenses to ship arms to the Middle East? Mr. Dulles tossed that one to Under Secretary Herbert Hoover, Jr..Mr. Hoover said he made the decision, adding that the President fully concurred. Senator Fulbright pointed out that it was reported that Hoover hadn't ever talked to the President, had instead talked to Presidential News Secretary Hagerty, who drove to the President's side after midnite and came back with the suspension order. Hoover said he wouldn't discuss his relations with the President. Hoover was pressed on this score by various Senators and always insisted that he had decided to suspend arms exports and had decided two days later to permit them again. His face grew redder and redder as succeeding questions drew from him the fact that he had known of the contract to sell the tanks for months ahead of time, ever since September, that he knew what was in the sales contracts, that he knew all along that the sale was perfectly legal and entirely correct. Then why didn't he just announce that the sale was perfectly legal and let it go as scheduled? Well, said Mr. Hoover, he'd considered that but he heard so many charges and accusations over the radio late Thursday evening that he decided that the best thing to do to reassure everybody was to suspend the shipments long enough to reassure themselves of what Mr. Hoover repeated he already knew - namely, that the sale was perfectly legal - and then to let the shipments go again.

Several Senators expressed considerable unhappiness that all of this was done without ever consulting Secretary of State Dulles. The Secretary informed them that when he took a vacation, he really took one; no midnite phone calls at sea. And Under Secretary Hoover admitted that he didn't want to disturb the Secretary while he was away. Senator Humphrey said it was all right to disturb the President, apparently, when he was on vacation but not the Secrrtary. Mr. Hoover admitted that the President was more accessible at that time.

As to arms for Israel to balance what the Arab world had recently gained, Mr. Dulles was sympathetic but doubtful. He said that in Israel's place he would be making the same urgent demands for arms, but he said, from a longer look, an arms race is impractical in many ways. For one thing, It cannot always achieve balance; the time approaches when more arms for Israel's few millions cannot possibly balance more arms for the Arab world's tens of millions of people.

But to the spectators at least - and the room was filled with them -- the most interesting thing seemed to be Mr. Dulles on the subject of what is happening in Russia. The people in the seats allotted to the general public gave Mr. Dulles a hearty cheer and a big hand as he came in, and they sat silently as the Senators filed by. And they cheered again when Secretray Dulles said the speeches at the continuing congress of the Communist party in Moscow give proof that the Russian policy has failed; that the Russians, far from doing well in the world, are worse off then they were a year ago. In reply to questions by several Senators, Mr. Dulles put it this way: "The Russians are reversing their whole policy of thirty years. If we did that the whole world would clll it an admission of failure. They are now following something a lot closer to our line, " said Mr. Dulles, "and imitation is the sincerest form of flattery." He said the Russians are now trying to win friends by playing our game in the foreign aid field, and he said that if we can't beat them at our own game we ought to be ashamed of ourselves. But later on he shrugged aside parts of the question about just exactly what we're doing, specifically, to beat them at our own game.

And then the Secretary of State went a little further than anyone had expected. He said the changes now visible in Russia are so vast and drastic, the work of changing thirty years of doctrine and teaching so major an upheaval, that he even has doubts that Russia will always continue to be a nation seeking world domination for the Communist system. He said he could see a yeast of change at work in the Soviet Union and it might take years to see that its effect would be; but he thinks the Russians have now set in motion forces of changes so vast that they may not be controllable by the Communist party. And he referred not to revolution but to the growth of thinking, feeling and demanding of their rights on the parts of the people of Russia - in the far future, of course. It was a remarkable statement, Ed, and one which provoked not applause from the audience in the room but thought.

Now, back to Ed Murrow in New York.

MURROW: The controversial farm bill was debated on the floor of the Senate for the third day. Republican Senator Aiken said that high rigid price supports ..as contained in the bill.."never have brought prospertiy to the American farmer, and never will." Aiken argued that since 1928, everytime there has been a considerable increase in farm prices, it has been due to a wartime economy. And he predicted that, when the farm bill finally goes to vote, it will call for the flexible supports recommended by the Administration. Democratic Senator O'Mahoney urged that large quantities of farm surpluses be bartered to foreign countries for strategic materials. And Democratic Senator Stennis expressed fear that land placed in the proposed soil bank might wash away, unless conservation measures also are written into the bil. This would apply particularly, he said, to cotton acreages in the South.

Also in the Senate today, the leaders of both parties announced plans for revising the election laws. Majority Leader Johnson said one aim of the legislation will be to put political contributions in "a goldfish bowl" for everyone to see. He said "realistic" limits would be placed on campaign spending There would also be a provision to allow the radio and television networks to split free air time between "major" party candidates.

President Eisenhower suffered his heart attack five months ago today. And today his personal physician..Major General Snyder..said that as far as Mr. Eisenhower's health is concerned, he "might be safer" serving a second term than before his illness. General Snyder did not elaborate. Reporters took this remark to mean that normally a man who has had a heart attack will take greater care to safeguard his health. He said he has "no impression" whether Mr. Eisenhower actually will seek another term.

Tomorrow, the President plans to fly back to Washington..ending a 10-day vacation at Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey's Georgia estate.

The Labor Department announced today that living costs declined one-tenth of one percent in January. The cost of food was down three-tenths of one percent, as a result of lower farm prices. Lower prices also were reported in home furnishings. Because of the decline in the cost-of-living index, more than a million workers in the auto, farm equipment and aircraft industries will receive a wage cut of one cent an hour.

In Montgomery, Alabama, 90 Negro leaders were arraigned today on charges of violating a state law prohibiting boycotts in their refusal to ride the busses. They pleaded not guilty. And the first trials were set for March 19th.

Governor Folsom of Alabama said he was appointing a bi-racial commission to help solve the segregation problem.

In Louisiana, state legislators..who are Catholics..were warned that they risk excommunication if they persist in seeking new state laws requiring racial segregation in paroc ial and private schools. The warning appeared in an editorial in the official archdiocesan newspaper. The governor-elect of Louisiana..Earl Long...said Archbishop Jospph Francis Rummel "is undoubtedly right" in declaring segregation morally wrong. But, Long added, "maybe he is a little too advanced."

The Army announced today that Major General Caffey had been "injudicious" when he publicly praised a speech favoring segregation. But the officer is said, violated no law or regulation "for which punitive action would be appropriate." Caffey..who is judge advocate general of the Army..had praised an address made by Democratic Representativ Flynt of Georgia, before the Georgai legislature. The Army found that Caffey's remarks were solely intended as "a complimentary reference to the speaking ability of a third part ."

The British Navy today called off a search for the submarine Acheron, which had been reared lost off the coast of Greenland. The sub..with 65 men aboard..has been contacted by radio, and is proceeding to port. It had not been heard from for six hours.

In the coastal city of Oran..in Algeria..security forces used tear gas today to keep a French mob from storming police headquarters. The mob, aroused be recent rebel attacke, was demanding a stronger government policy. Meantime, rebel leaders began circulating leaflets, claiming that France will be forced into a defeat in Algeria, as bitter as the defeat at Dienbienphu.

In Jerusalem, the United Nations truce organization confirmed today that Syria has sent it a note regarding the Jordan River irrigation porject. The note concerned Israeli plans for resuming work on the project, if an American proposal for sharing the Jordan River water... between Arabs and Israelis .. is not accepted. According to the Cairo radio Syria said it would "oppose by force" any unilateral action by Israel to complete the project. Syria said today that it fired on Israeli fisherman yesterday, on the Sea of Galilee, to keep them from beaching their boats alongside the Syrian frontier. Syria claimed it withheld its fire unitl some of the boats touched shore. Israel announced the incident yesterday. There were no casualties. A Syrian Airways plane exploded in midair today, near Aleppo, killing all 17 persons on board. The Airplane was on a flight from Aleppo to Damascus.

India announces it has reached "broad agreement" with British interests for building a steel plant in West Bengal. A British bank syndicate is giving India nearly 11 million dollars in credits. And the British government offered a loan of 42-million.

In West Germany tonight, Chancellor Adenauer expelled 37 members of the Free Democratic Party from his coalition government. They were expelled, after they challenged his leadership. At the same time, Adenauer won Socialist support for the constitutional ammendments legalizing rearmament.

In Moscow, the Communist Party Congress went on formal record today against one-man rule. It unanimously adopted a resolution saying: "The Congress charges the central committee not to relax its struggle against a revival of the cult of the one man." (Referring presumably to Stalin.(It also unanimously approved a resulution endorsing the general report made to the Congress by party boss Khrushchev, 10 days ago.

In Geneva, United States and Chinese Communist representatives met for the 38th time..to discuss the release of Americans held in Red China. And the United States demand for renunciation of force against Formosa. Today's meeting lasted four and a half hours, with no announcement as to what progress, if any, was made.

Today..on the China Coast..Communist artillery shelled the island of Quemoy. Chinese Nationalist guns returned the fire.

The Chinese Communist radio accused Japan today of preparing to train its armed forces in germ warfare. Peiping claimed the Japanese are setting up what it called "a school of chemical and bacteriological weapons."

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: For the future, there is no good chart. Sir Winston Churchill said: The only guide to a man is his conscience; the only shield to his memory is the rectitude and sincerity of his actions. It is very imprudent", he said, "to walk through life without this shield...because we are so often mocked by the failure of our hopes."

Goodnight and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Mon., Feb. 27, 1956

This is the news:

Moscow today announced the re-election of all eleven members of the presidium of the Central Committee. The presidium is the supreme ruling group in Russia. Its members include Premier Bulganin and Nikita Khrushchev, who retained his position as first secretary of the Communist Party. Of the other nine members, the best known are former Premier Malenkov and Foreign Minister Molotov. They stayed on, despite the fact that they have been objects of official criticism. Six non-voting, or alternate members of the presidium were also elected. One of the six was Marshal Zhukov, the only one of the 17 leaders of the Soviet Union who is a professional soldier. Another alternate member of the presidium is a woman, who had served as first secretary of the municipal organization in Moscow. This is the first time a woman has been elected to the top councils of the party. It was noted that when the election of presidium members was broadcast by the Moscow radio, the names of the voting members were listed alphabetically. When it came to the list of alternates, the name of Zhukov led all the rest.

In London, the House of Commons was the scene today of a debate on foreign policy. Foreign Secretary Selwyn Lloyd rejected a Labour suggestion that Russia join in controling the supply of arms to the Middle East. Selwyn Lloyd said that, to his mind, "no other single action has done more to bring nearer the danger of war", than the shipment of Soviet arms to the Arab countries. He called the Communist motives "pure mischievous"... but said he was "not pessimistic" about a settlement between Israel and the Arab states. Prime Minister Eden said if there is a hydrogen war, both Communist and capitalist countries would be annihilated. He said Russian leaders are entertaining "a fantastic illusion", if they think that use of the H-bomb would mean the end of capitalism... but not of Communism.

The representatives of twelve nations, including Russia, met in Washington today, to lay the groundwork for a worldwide atoms-for-peace agency. James Wadsworth... the American REPRESENTATIVE to the United Nations... urged the representatives "to look beyond their own interests". He said, "The United States believes the world is impatient to get on with the peaceful development of nuclear power, even though some risk may be involved." The representatives from Russia and Czechoslovakia also expressed hope that agreement would be reached.

The Navy announced today that it is developing a nuclear-powered submarine, capable of launching guided missiles. FUNDS FOR IT, ~~It requires~~, however, must still be approved by Congress.

Democratic Senator George said today that, by and large, he still is "opposed to a long-range program of either economic or military aid to foreign countries." Yesterday, in a speech in Philadelphia, Secretary of State Dulles called for "greater continuity, as regards support for long-range projects." George... who is chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee... said he did not rule out Congressional approval of "some specific projects". But as a general proposition, he said, "I don't believe we should consider authorization more than a year ahead."

returning permanently to England.

Mr. Kendrick says he has experienced two surprises. One is the narrow, venomous reality of the apartheid policy and the monomania of its adherents. The other is the size, variety and articulateness of the opposition. He had not been prepared for either. He feels qualified to conclude that despite Strydom's manipulated victory the story is by no means over. Apartheid has won a victory, he says, but he does not think it has won the war. And he believes that four-fifths of the population of South Africa would say the same.

President Gronchi of Italy arrived in Washington today on a state visit. Greeting him at the airport, Vice President Nixon said he was a symbol of the first ten years of democratic government in Italy. ~~President Gronchi said cooperation between his country and the United States was a natural thing. "We intend," he said, "not only to deepen and extend such cooperation to our mutual advantage... but to place it at the service of peace." He is the first Italian chief of state ever to visit this country.~~

The Supreme Court has upheld the right of workers to strike against unfair labor practices during the 60-day "cooling off" period prescribed by the Taft-Hartley Act. The ruling applies only to unfair labor practices. It does not affect the 60-day ban on strikes for economic benefits... such as higher pay.

The ban against broadcasting court trials in Colorado was lifted today by the Colorado Supreme Court. The ruling also applies to taking pictures. The court specified, however, that in each case, permission of the trial judge will be required.

~~The convicted Communist leader... Gilbert Green... surrendered to federal authorities in New York today, after being a fugitive for~~

~~five years. Green had been convicted... along with ten other Communist~~ leaders in 1949... ~~on charges of conspiracy to teach and advocate the violent overthrow of the Government.~~ He ~~had never been sentenced.~~

A B-50 bomber... with a crew of 11... crashed on a test flight today near Dayton, Ohio. (There were no survivors.)

Edward R. Murrow: February 27, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

South Africa's nationalist [redacted] government today reached the high-water mark of its apartheid or segregation program. A joint session of the two houses of parliament adopted amendments to the constitution which repealed the protection of the franchise granted under the original constitution of 1909. The action required a two-thirds vote which Prime Minister Strydom had already assured by nearly doubling the membership of the senate through adding partisans of his policy. The vote today was 174 to 68. This was eleven more than the required two-thirds. Alexander Kendrick, who is in South Africa, cables me that the government's victory was won in the face of an increasing and gradually unifying opposition. The opponents already have challenged the packing of the senate by appeal to the courts. They promise to fight today's vote as unconstitutional. But the Nationalists have anticipated this by packing the Supreme Court. Moreover, today's amendment to the constitution not only established complete apartheid in political registration, but denies the competence of the courts to pass judgment on this statute or any other passed by parliament. This makes parliament the supreme law of the land and gives it power to perpetuate itself.

The adoption of the amendments today was fore-ordained, as is the result in any court appeal. Nevertheless, observes Mr. Kendrick, several new elements have been introduced in the South African picture by the joint session. It has precipitated a real showdown between the government and its opponents. Debate has been frank and even brutal, and it has been revealing. It has disclosed that Prime Minister Strydom rejects for all time the possibility of any African ever obtaining full citizenship rights in South Africa. He declared: "There is no middle road": and he declared: "One must be either on the side of those who want to preserve the future of the white race or not." Even Strydom had not said anything so final before. Since no compromise is possible, the opposition now must submit completely or turn the Nationalists out, while it is possible to do so UNDER the near-authoritarian conditions.

In fact, says Mr. Kendrick, the opposition appears to be uniting and shifting to direct action. Over this week end, at the time the Nationalists were preparing to celebrate their victory in Capetown, a significant meeting was held in Johannesburg of delegates from political and non-political organizations. They included at least five political parties which heretofore have diffused their strength in the opposition and which now may be amalgamated into a single body. Delegates also numbered some who were active in the celebrated Torch Commando which embarrassed the late Malan government by carrying the fight against apartheid into government territory and resisting it by strong direct action. Among the delegates were women in black sashes representing the League for the Defense of the Constitution, and members of the so-called Covenanters who propose a new constitutional convention to re-confirm the rules which the government has successfully defied. In Malan's time the Torch Commando had been disbanded because it was embarrassing the Unionists, the official opposition party. Now the Unionists feel more embarrassed by what has happened in parliament. Mr. Kendrick admits it is too early to say that leadership of the opposition is passing to direct-actionists. But he says it would not be surprising.

Another new element in the picture is the National Union of South African students, which already is out against the next move awaited from the government - segregation in education. The Minister of Education plans separate universities for whites, coloreds, Indians and ethnic African tribes. The white students oppose the policy because it threatens to deprive them as well as others of proper educational facilities.

Today, says Mr. Kendrick, was sad for the opposition also because Father Trevor Huddleston, the most courageous opponent of segregation, preached his last sermon at his celebrated church in the slums of Sophiatown, before Testimony which Mr. Dulles ~~made~~ GAVE last Friday... before the Foreign Relations Committee... was attacked today on the Senate floor. Democratic Senator Fulbright challenged Dulles' contention that in the struggle with Russia, the balance in the past year had shifted in favor of the West... that Russia had failed. Fulbright accused Dulles of presenting an estimate of the world situation "more like a midsummer dream", than reality. But Dulles' long-term aid proposal, he said, "deserves very careful consideration."

At United Nations headquarters today, Secretary General Hammarskjold said he thought the Middle Eastern situation had been "overdramatized". Hammarskjold recently returned from a tour of the Middle East. He conceded he found "very great tension"... and saw no easy way to a solution. But, he said, "I did not see any reason for a panicky reaction. I do not think we are on the brink of war."

Moscow announced today that Russia has formally ratified a treaty of friendship with Yemen, a small Arab kingdom on the Red Sea. The treaty was signed last October.

Word for Today

The Union of South Africa now has a law placing parliament above the courts. This is a step backward, in a vital area. But Santayana said, "Those who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it." Some hope may be found in the words of Charles A. Madison. "Law," he said, "is merely the expression of the will of the strongest, for the time being."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

Moscow today announced the re-election of all eleven members of the presidium of the Central Committee. The presidium is the supreme ruling group in Russia. Its members include Premier Bulganin and Nikita Khrushchev, who retained his position as first secretary of the Communist Party. Of the other none members, the best knows are former Premier Malenkov and Foreign Minister Molotov. They stayed on, despite the fact that they have been objects of official criticism. Six non-voting, or alternate members of the presiduim were also elected. One of the six was Marshal Zhukov, the only one of the 17 leaders of the Soviet Union who is a profissional soldier. Another alternate member of the presidium is a woman, who had served as first secretary of the municiple organization in Moscow. This is the first time a woman has been elected to the top councils of the party. It was noted that when the election of presidium members was broadcast by the Moscow radio, the names of the voting members were listed alphabetically. When it came to the list of alternates, the name of Zhukov led all the rest.

In London, the House of Commons was the scene today of a debate on foreign policy. Foreign Secretary Selwyn Lloyd rejected a Lavour suggestion that Russia join in controling the supply of arms to the Middle East. Selwyn Lloyd said that, to his mind, "no other single action has done more to bring nearer the danger of war", than the shipment of Soviet Arms to the Arab countries. He called the Communist motives "pure mischievous"..but said he was "not pessimistic" about a settlement between Israel and the Arab states. Prime Minister Eden said if there is a hydrogen war, both Communist and capitalist countries would be annihilated. He said Russian leaders are entertaining "a fantastic illusion", if they think that use of the H-bomb would mean the end of capitalism..but not of Communism.

The representatives of twelve nations, including Russia, met in Washington today to lay the groundwork for a worldwide atoms-for-peace agency. James Wadsworth..the American Representative to the United Nations..urged the representatives "to look beyond their own interests." He said, "The United States believes the world is impatient to get on with the peaceful development of nuclear power, even though some risk may be involved." The representatives from Russia and Czechoslovakia also expressed hope that agreement would be reached.

The Navy announced today that it is developing a nuclear-powered submarine, capable of launching guided missiles. Funds for it, however, must still be approved by Congress.

Democratic Senator George said today, that, by and large, he still is "opposed to a long-range program of either economic or military aid to foreign countries." Yesterday in a speech in Philadelphia, Secretary of State Dulles called for "greater continuity, as regards support for long range projects." George..who is chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.. said he did not rule out Congressional approval of "some specific projects". But as a general proposition, he said, "I don't believe we should consider authorization more than a year ahead."

Testimony which Mr. Dulles gave last Friday..before the Foreign Relations Committee.was attacked today on the Seante floor.

Democratic Senator Fulbright challenged Dulles's contention that in the struggle with Russia, the balance in the past year had shifted in favor of the West..that Russia had failed. Fulbright accused Dulles of presenting an estimate of the world situation "more like a midsummer dream" than reality. But Dulles' long-term aid proposal, he said, "deserves very careful consideration."

At the United Nations headquarters today, Secretary General Hammarskjold said he thought the Middle Eastern situation had been "overdramatized". Hammarskjold recently returned from a tour of the Middle East. He conceded he found "very great tension"..and saw no easy way to a solution. But he said, "I did not see any reason for a panicky reaction. I do not think we are on the brink of war."

Moscow announced today that Russia has formally ratified a treaty of friendship with Yemen, a small Arab kingdom an the Red Sea. The treaty was signed last October.

President Gronchi of Italy arrived in Washington today on a state visit Greeting him at the airport, Vice President Nixon said he was a symbol of the first ten yesrs of democratic government in Italy.

The Supreme Court has upheld the right of workers to strike against unfair labor practices during the 10-day "cooling off" period prescribed by the Taft-Hartly Act. The ruling applies only to unfair labor practices. It does not affect the 60-day ban onstrikes for economic benefits..such as higher pay.

The ban against broadcasting court trials in Colorado was lifted today by the Colorado Supreme Court. The ruling also applies to taking pictures. The spurt specified, however, that in each case, permission of the trial judge would be required.

A B-50 bomber..with a crew of 11..crashed on a test flight today near Dayton, Ohio. There were no survivors.

South Africa's nationalist government today reached the high-water mark of its apartheid or segregation program. A joint session of the two houses of parliament adopted amendments to the constitution which repealed the protection of the franchise granted under the original constitution of 1909. The action required a two-thirds vote which Prime Minister Strydom had already assured by nearly doubling the membership of the senate through adding partisans of his policy. The vote today was 174 to 68. This was eleven more than the required two-thirds. Alexander Kendrick, who is in South Africa, cables me that the government's victory was on in the face of an increasing and gradually unifying opposition. The opponents already have challenged the packing of the senate by appeal to the courts. They promise to fight today's vote as unconstitutional. But the Nationalists have anticipated this by packing the Supreme Court. Moreover, today's amemdment to the constitution not only established complete apartheid in political registration, but denies the competence of the courts to pass judgement on this statute or any other passed by parliament. This makes parliament the supreme law of the land and gives it power to perpetuate itself.

The adoption of the amendments today was fore-ordained, as is the result in any court appeal. Nevertheless, observes Mr. Kendrick, several new elements have been introduced in the South African picture by the joint session. It has precipitated a real showdown between the government and its opponents. Debate ahs been frank and even brutal, and it has been revealing. It has disclosed thet Prime Minister Strydom rejects for all time the possibiliby of any African ever obatining full citizenship rights in South Africa. He declared "There is no middle road": and he declared: "One must be either on the side of those who want to preserve the future of the white race or not." Even Strydom had not said anything so final before. Since no compromise is possible, the opposition now must submit completely or turn the Nationalists out, while it is possible to so so under the near-authortarian conditions.

In fact, says Mr. Kendric, the opposition appears to be uniting and shifting to direct action. Over this week end, at the time the Nationalists were preparing to celebrate their victory in Capetown, a significant meeting was held in Johannesburg of delegates from political and non-political organizations. They included at least five political parties which heretofore have diffused their strength in the opposition and which now may be amalgamated into a single body. Delegates also numbered some who were active in the celebrated Torch Commando which embarrassed the late Malan government by carrying the fight against apartheid into government territory and resisting it by strong direct action. Among the delegates were women in black sashes representing the League for the Defense of the Constitution, and members of the so-called Coventers who propose a new constitutional convention to re-confirm the rules which the government has successfully defied. In Malan's time the Torch Commando has been disbanded because it was embarrassing the Unionists, the official opposition party. Now the Unionists feel more embarrassed by what has happened in parliament. Mr. Kendrick admits it too early to say that leadership of the opposition in passing to direct-actionists. But he says it would not be surprising.

Another new element in the picture is the National Union of South African stutnnts, which already is out against the next move awaited from the government -- segregation in education. The Minister of Education plans separate universities for whites, coloreds, Indians and ethnic African tribes. The white sutdents oppose the policy because it threatens to deprive them as well as others of proper educational facilities.

Today, says Mr. Kentrick, was sad for the opposition also, because Father Trevor Heddleston, the most courageous opponent of segregation, preached his last sermon at his celebrated church in the slums of Sophiatown, before returning permanently to England.

Mr. Kendrick says he has experienced two surprises. One is the narrow, venemous reality of the apartheid policy and the monomania of its adherents. The other is the size, variety and articulateness of the opposition. He had not been prepared for either. He feels qualified to conclude that despite Strydom's manipulated victory the story is by no means over. Apartheid has won a victory, he says, but he does not think it sas won the war. And he believes that four-fifths of the population of South Africa would say the same.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a momert with the Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: The Union of South Africa now has a law placing parliament above the courts. This is s step backward, in a vital area. But Santayana said, "Those who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it." Some hope may be found in the words of Charles A. Madison. "Law", he said, "is merely the expression of the will of the strongest, for the time being."

Good Night and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Tues., Feb. 28, 1956

This is the news:

Secretary of State Dulles said today that the free world appears to have won the first round of the cold war. He told a news conference that Russia has been compelled by Western strength to abandon the precepts of Stalin, and modify its policy of naked force. Mr. Dulles did not think that regarding this as an achievement was being too optimistic. But he said complacency would be disastrous. Russian leaders, he said, have now turned to a policy of guile in which they may be equally predatory. And he warned that the free world must continue to be fully alert. He again expressed hope that Congress... at this session... will vote some form of long-range foreign aid. Mr. Dulles described as premature London reports that the United States, Britain and France have agreed on common action, in the event war breaks out in the Middle East. And he declined to say what would be done about

→

Israel's request for permission to buy American arms... to off-set Egypt's purchase of arms from Communist Czechoslovakia.

The Israeli ambassador... Abba Eban... conferred for an hour today with Assistant Secretary of State George V. Allen. The United Press says Eban asked for a definite yes-or-no answer to Israel's request. Eban suggested to reporters that the answer might come "pretty soon".

In Paris, it was reported today that the United States has agreed... tentatively... to allow Israel to buy 12 jet fighter planes from France. American permission would be required because the jets priginally were earmarked for Nato, under the United States foreign aid program. The aircraft are identified as the Mystere IV, a plane ~~comparable in performance~~ Somewhat inferior to the Sabrejet. It was emphasized that no final decision on selling them to Israel had been reached.

Informed sources in Beirut say that a shipment of arms from Communist Czechoslovakia arrived last week at a Syrian port. According to these sources, the arms were sold to Syria in exchange for an unspecified number of dollars, cotton and wheat.

In Moscow, Communist Party boss Khrushchev became chairman today of a newly created bureau, to administer the affairs of the Russian Federated Republic. The so-called republic is the largest state in the Soviet Union, taking in most of European Russia and much of Russia's territory in Asia. Moscow Radio said the bureau was created for administrative purposes.

The coalition government of Austria collapsed today, and new general elections were scheduled for May 13th. The two parties making up the coalition government could not agree on domestic policies. Their chief disagreement was over nationalization of industries.

In Paris, Premier Mollet today appealed to the the rebel forces in Algeria to cease fire, or face all-out war. Mollet promised the Nationalist rebels that if they lay down their arms, free elections would be held within three months. At the same time, he promised Frenchmen living in Algeria that France would maintain an "indissoluble" link with the North African territory... and protect their lives and property. My colleague, Blair Clark, cables me from Paris that there is no "wild optimism" that Mollet's hopes will be realized.

He points out that... for years... France has been making promises to the Arab population, and failing to keep those promises. The best information in Paris tonight, he says, is that the cabinet so far has not considered anything like all-out mobilization.

In Washington, Secretary of Agriculture Benson announced today that the government will offer its surplus cotton for export, beginning August first. The surplus cotton will be offered on the world market at competitive prices. The action is being taken, Benson said, to regain what he called this country's share of world markets. He said the goal was an export market of five million bales.

President Eisenhower will hold a news conference at 10:30 a.m. tomorrow, Eastern Standard Time. White House News Secretary Hagerty says he "wouldn't know" whether Mr. Eisenhower will take the occasion to announce his intentions regarding a second term. At a news conference on February 8th, the President indicated he would make the announcement before such a gathering of correspondents, and that he would do so by the end of the month. Today, Mr. Eisenhower held his weekly conference with Republican congressional leaders. The meeting was devoted mostly to discussion of the farm bill, pending in the Senate. Afterwards, Senate Republican Leader Knowland said the President "made it very clear" he has not changed his position against rigid price supports. The measure before the Senate calls for high, rigid supports.

Mr. Eisenhower also conferred today with President Gronchi of Italy, who is in this country on a state visit. The White House described the leaders of the two countries as participating in "a cordial and interesting exchange of views."

The House Ways and Means Committee voted today to postpone the scheduled reductions in corporation income taxes and excise levies. The corporate taxes were to be reduced in the amount of three billion dollars on April first. The bill approved by the House committee would put off the reduction for another year, as requested by the President.

Democratic Senator Kilgore, of West Virginia, died early today of a cerebral hemorrhage... after suffering a minor stroke on Saturday. Senator Kilgore was chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. The new chairman... under the seniority rule... will be Democratic Senator Eastland of Mississippi.

The special Senate committee investigating campaign contributions... under the chairmanship of Senator George... resumed its hearings today. Joseph Wishart, treasurer of the Republican organization in Nebraska, testified regarding a 25-hundred-dollar contribution from oil lobbyist John Neff. Wishart said Neff gave him the money in a Washington hotel last October... and said it came from four of five people. Neff took the stand and denied making such a statement. Nebraska law limits individual political contributions to 1-thousand dollars.

At Swampscott, Massachusetts, thirteen persons died today when two Boston and Maine passenger trains collided. More than 50 persons were injured.

[An international trade fair has opened at Leipzig, in East Germany. And here is the recorded report by Dick Hottelet.

runs 5:15

ends on cue: "To Ed Murrow in NY."

Bob Hite

That was a [redacted] recorded report by Dick Hottelet on the Leipzig Fair, in East Germany... a very significant showcase for Communist goods.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. (pause) But, first, here is Bob Hite.

Word for Today

The Russians are seeking to infiltrate... by means of trade. And should they succeed, Benjamin Franklin's axiom that no nation ever was ruined by trade might have to be revised. In meeting the Russian challenge, half-measures will not do. In the words of Ambrose Bierce, "The hardest tumble a man can make is to fall over his own bluff."

Goodnight and good luck!

CBS RADIO DIVISION

EDWARD R. MURROW

Tuesday, Feb. 28, 1956
7:45-8:00 P.M.

MURROW: ... An international trade fair has opened at Leipzig, in East Germany, the Communist section of Germany. And here is the recorded report by Richard C. Hottelet.

HOTTELET: I'm back in West Berlin after two days at the Leipzig Fair in Communist East Germany, a big industrial fair that's held there every spring, but this year it is clearly an important move in a major Soviet economic offensive. The fair is the first presentation of the new Five-Year Plan, which is of course a contradiction in terms. Normally, a fair is a free market place, ruled by the law of supply and demand. In Communist society supply and demand are instruments of policy. This Leipzig Fair has become a great political operation.

As you go thru the main gate to the fairgrounds and walk down the broad center street, passed the elaborate Soviet, Chinese andCZech pavillion, you see a huge white flag waving high over the far end. It is all white with a small blue field, and on the field a white Picasso dove. This Communist peace flag symbolizes the main theme of the fair: peaceful coexistence, trade and cooperation on Soviet terms. Broad official smiles, friendly words, generous promises/are all designed to suggest that you can do business with the Kremlin. Hand-in-hand with goodwill goes a more specific purpose. The fair is carefully planned demonstration of Communist industrial strength. The five-year plans and the trade programs of all members of the Soviet bloc are carefully coordinated. These nations appear in Leipzig as a single great economic area, as a huge world market and a reliable supplier.

I've been to a number of fairs in Leipzig since the end of war. I've seen none as elaborate or impressive as this one. Heavy machinery, giant cranes and grabs, locomotives, pumps, bulldozers, machine tools take pride of place. Number and quality would probably not compare with the goods at a Westemn industrial fair and you can't find out what most things cost or how long the delivery time will be. These details must be negotiated with the local government's trade monopoly. But such considerations are secondary. The really important thing is that these machines are produced, probably in good quality, and that they can be had on good terms if Moscow thinks the deal is worthwhile. The fact that all these machines are based on the poverty of people, the poverty you see around you in the city of Leipzig, that they're built at the expense of the standards of living, is completely unimportant in a totalitarian state.

This year the red carpet is out for the underdeveloped countries, what the Communists now call the anti-imperialist nations. Great efforts were made to bring as many of them to Leipzig as possible. The Sudan and the Belgian Congo have come for the first time, and invitations were extended to Algeria, Morocco, Afghanistan, Pakistan and Indonesia. Egypt has sent a Cabinet minister and India has the largest pavillion of any non-Communist foreign country. The lines are out to South America as well. Argentina and Chile are on hand again; Uruguay and Paraguay are represented for the first time. For them especially there is a huge showing of primary machinery. Roumania has put up a complete oil drill and derrick and is exhibiting locomotives. The Czechs are showing heavy trucks and electric generators, automobiles and railroad rolling stock. The Russians are displaying part of their new Moscow-Peking Express, plus automatic machine tools and even atomic isotopes for research and medicine. Red China, too, has got into the act with some home-built generators and metal lathes, perhaps to show the effects of Russian help. In general, the Soviet bloc is exhibiting a wide variety of agricultural, woodworking and mining machinery, road-building, drainage and transport equipment, just the sort of thing an underdeveloped country can use.

But the Western, so-called capitalist, countries are also on hand at the Leipzig Fair. West Germany alone has 1600 exhibitors. Krupp of Essen is not beating around the bush. It has a sign in Russian inviting inspection by Soviet buyers. Demag, Ruhr Stahl, Daimler-Benz, really big names, great chemical firms like Bayer and Hoechst are all there with sharp pencils and open order books. So are the French, the Belgians and the British. Rolls Royce has publicity pamphlets in Chinese; Ferguson tractors and standard cars are on display. None of these Western companies expects to do much business at this fair. They are in Leipzig to present their visiting cards, to scramble for the Eastern market if and when it opens up.

This Leipzig Fair is only the first stop of the Soviet economic circus in this year. The next stop is the Milan Fair in April; then the Russians and most of their satellites will move on to fairs in Greece, Syria, Austria and Egypt. Mowcow obviously thinks that the effort and money involved in these exhibitions will be well repaid.

Now back to Ed Murrow in New York.

-30-

Ediphone trans./E. Scheiner

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

Secretary of State Dulles said today that the free world appears to have won the first round of the cold war. He told a news conference that Russia has been compleled by Western strength to abandon the precepts of Stalin, and modify its policy of naked force. Mr. Dulles did not think that regarding this as an achievement was being too optimistic. But he said complacency would be disastrous. Russian leaders, he said, have nor turned to a policy of guile in which they may be equally predatory. And he warned that the free world must continue to be fully alert. He again expressed hope that Congress..at this session..will vote some form of long-range foreign aid. Mr. Dulles described as premature London reports that the United States, Britain and France have agreed on common action, in the event war breaks out in the Middle East. And he declined to say what would be done about Israel's request for permission to buy American arms..to off-set Egypt's purchase of arms from Communist Czechoslovakia.

The Israeli ambassador.. Abba Eban..conferred for a hour today with Assistant Secretary of State George V. Allen. The United Press says Eban asked for a definite yes-or-no answer to Israel's request. Eban suggested to reporters that the answer might come "pretty soon".

In Paris, it was reported t day that the United States has agreed.... tentatively..to allow Israel to buy 12 jet fighter planes from France. American permission would be required because the jets originally were earmarked for Nato, under the United States foreign aid program. The aircraft are identified as the Mystery IV, a plane somewhat inferior to the Sabrejet. It was emphasized that no final decision on selling them to Israel had been reached.

Informed sources in Beirut say that a shipment of arms from Communist Czechoslovakia arrived last week at a Syrian port. According to thise sources, the arms wers sold to Syria in exchange for an unspecified number of dollars, cotton and wheat.

In Moscow, Communist Party boss Khrushchev became chairman today of a newly created bureau, to administer the affairs of the Russian Federated Republic. The so-called republic is the largest state in the Soviet Union, taking in most of European Russia and much of Russia's territory in Asia. Moscow said the bureau was created for administrative purposes.

The coalition government of Austria collapsed today, and new general elections were scheduled for May 13th. The two parties making up the coalition government could not agree on domestic policies. Their chief disagreement was over the nationalization of industries.

In Paris, Premier Mollet today appealed to the rebel forces in Algeria to cease fire, or face all-out war. Mollet promised the Nationalist rebels that if they lay down their arms, free elections will be held within three months. At the same time, he promised Frenchmen living in Algeria that France would maintain an "indissoluble" link with the North African territory.... and protect their lives and property. My colleague, Blair Clark, cables me from Paris that there is no "wild optimism" that Mollet's hopes will be realized. He points out that..for years..France has been making promises to the Arab population, and failing to keep these promises. The best information in Paris tonight, he says, is that the cabinet so far ans not considered anything like all-out mobilization.

In Washington, Secretary of Agriculture Benson announced today that the government will offer its surplus cotton for export, beginning August first. The surplus cotton will be offered on the world market at compteitive prices. The action is being taken, Benson said, to regain what he called this country's share of world markets. He said the goal was an export market of five million bales.

President Eisenhower will hold a news conference at 10:30 a.m. tomorrow, Eastern Standard Time. White House News Secretary Hagerty says he "wouldn't know" whether Mr. Eisenhower will take the occasion to announce his intentions regarding a second term. At a news conference on February 8th, the President indicated he would make the announcement before such a gathering of correspondnnts, and that he would do so by the end of the month. Today, Mr. Eisenhowe held his weekly conference with Republican gongressional leaders. The meeting was devoted mostly to discussion of the farm bill, pending in the Senate. Afterwards, Senate Republican Leader Knowland said the President "made it very clear" he has not changed his poistion against rigid price supports. The measure before the Senate calls for high, rigid supports.

The House Ways and Means Committee voted today to postpone the scheduled reductions in corportaion income taxes and excise levies. The corporate taxes were to be reduced in the amount of three billion dollars on April first. The bill approved by the House committee would put off the reduction for another year, as requested by the President.

Democratic Senator Kilgore, of West Virginia, died early today of a cerebral hemorrhage..after suffering a minor stroke on Saturday. Senator Kilgore was chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. The new chairman... under the seniority rule...will be Democratic Senator Eastland of Mississippi.

An international trade fair has opened at Leipzig, in East Germany. And here is the recorded report by Dick Hottelet.

HOTTELET: I'm back in West Berlin after two days at the Leipzig Fair in Communist East Germany, a big industrial fair that's held ther every spring, but this year it is clearly an important move in a major Soviet economic offensive. The fair is the first presentation of the new Five - Year Plan, which is the course a contradiction in terms. Normally, a fair is a free market place, ruled by the law of supply and demand. In Communist society supply and demand are instruments of policy. This Leipzig Fair has become a great political operation.

As you go through the main gate to the fairgrounds and walk down the broad center street, passed the elaborate Soviet, Chinese and Czech pavillion, you see a huge white flag waving high over the far end. It is all white with a small blue field, and on the field a white Picasso dove. This Communist peace flag symbolizes the main theme of the fair: peaceful coexistence, trade and cooperation on Soviet terms. Broad official smiles, friendly words, generous promises are all designed to suggest that you can do business with the Kremlin. Hand-in-hand with goodwill goes a more specific purpose. The fair is carefully planned demonstration of Communist industrial strength. The five-year plans and the trade programs of all members of the Soviet bloc are carefully coordinated. These nations appear in Leipzig as a single great economic area, as a huge world market and a reliable supplier.

I've been to a number of fairs in Leipzig since the war. I've seen none as elaborate or impressive as this one. Heavy machinery, giant cranes and grabs, locomotives, pumps, bulldozers, machine tools take pride of place. Number and quality would probably not compare with the goods at a Western Industrial fair and you can't find out what most things cost or how long the delivery time will be. These details must be negotiates with the local government's trade monopoly. But such considerations are secondary. The really important thing is that these machines are produced, probably in good quality, and that they can be had on good terms if Moscow thinks the deal is worthwhile. The face that all these machines are based on the poverty of the people, the poverty you see around you in the city of Leipzig, that they're build at the expense of the standards of living, is completely unimportant in a totalitarian state.

This year the red carpet is out for the underdeveloped countries, what the Communists now call the anti-imperialist nations. Great efforts were made to bring as many of them to Leipzig as possible. The Sudan and the Belgian Congo have come for the first time, and invitations were extended to Algeria, Morocco, Afghanistan, Pakistan and Indonesia. Egypt has sent a Cabinet minister and India has the largest pavillion of any non-Communist foreign country. The lines are out to South America as well. Argentina and Chile are on hand again; Uraguay and Paraguay are represented for the first time. For them especially there is a huge showing of primary machinery. Roumania has put up a complete oil drill and derrick and is exhibiting locomotives. The Czechs are showing heavy trucks and electric generators, automobiles and railroad rolling stock. The Russians are displaying part of their new Moscow-Pekin Express, plus automatic machine tools and even atomic isotopes for research and medicine. Red China, too, has got into the act with some home-built generators and metal lathes, perhaps to show the effects of Russian help. In general, the Soviet bloc is exhibiting a wide variety of agricultural, woodworking and mining machinery, road-building, drainage and transport equipment, just the sort of thing an underdeveloped country can use.

But the Western, so-called capitalist countries are also on hand at the Leipzig fair. West Germany alone has 1300 exhibitors. Krupp of Essen is not beating around the bush. It has a sign in Russian inviting inspection by Soviet buyers. Demag, Ruhr Stahl, Daimler-Benz, really big names, great chemical firms like Bayer and Hoechst are all there with sharp pencils and open order books. So are the French, the Belgians and the British. Rolls Royce has publicity pamphlets in Chinese; Ferguson tractors and standard cars are on display. None of these Western companies expects to do much business at this fair. They are in Leipzig to present their visiting cards, to scramble for the Eastern market if and when it opens up.

This Leipzig Fair is only the first stop of the Soviet economic circus in this year. The next stop is the Milan Fair in April; then the Russians and most of their satellites will move on to fairs in Greece, Syria, Austria and Egypt. Moscow obviously thinks that the effort and money involved in these exhibitions will be well repaid.

Now, back to Ed Murrow in New York.

MURROW: That was a recorded report by Dick Hottelet on the Leipzig Fair, in East Germany..a very significant showcase for Communist goods.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. But first, here is Bob Hite.

HITE:COMMERCIAL

MURROW: The Russians are seeking to infiltrate..by means of trade. And should they succeed, Benjamin Franklin's axiom that no nation ever was ruined by trade might have to be revised. In meeting the Russian challenge, half-measures will not do. In the words of Ambrose Bierce, "The hardest tumble a man can make is to fall over his own bluff."

Good Night and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Wed., Feb. 29, 1956

This is the news:

President Eisenhower says he is willing. And here by recording is how he said it at his news conference this morning.

(tape runs 7:40
(ends on cue: "That's (my campaign."

Mr. Eisenhower spoke of a talk he will make tonight on the radio and television networks. CBS Radio will carry that address at 10 p.m., Eastern Standard Time.

Republican leaders are jubilant over the President's announcement. The Republican national chairman, Leonard Hall, said: "This is the best possible news for all Americans. It means a continuation of the peace, prosperity and progress of the Eisenhower Republican Administration." Democratic National Chairman Paul Butler said Mr. Eisenhower had been "pressured" into his decision, and he... Butler ... doubted that the people would elect "a part-time president."

Adlai Stevenson said it was "fitting" Mr. Eisenhower should be the Republican candidate... since the main issue of the campaign would be the record of the Eisenhower Administration. Governor Harriman said the President "must now at last take full responsibility" for that record, which he called a record "of surrender to the domination of the Big Interests." Senator Kefauver commented, "The campaign can now be waged on its merits... without mudslinging... but with no punches pulled."

Reaction abroad is restrained, because of a reluctance to become involved in American politics.

The New York Stock Market reacted strongly. Initial gains averaged one to three dollars a share. Traders then cashed in their profits. And at the close, some high-priced shares, showed losses of two to four dollars. Trading was the heaviest in five months.

Secretary of State Dulles testified today before a Senate committee on disarmament. Mr. Dulles said the United States is determined to find a solution to the disarmament problem. It would be "reckless", he said, to assume that the atomic stalemate between this country and Russia "is a permanently reliable preventive of war."

Mr. Dulles also had a long talk today with United Nations Secretary-General Dag Hammarskjold. The State Department said they conferred on Middle East and Asian problems. It did not elaborate.

In Jerusalem, the American ambassador... Edward Lawson... had a one-hour talk with Israeli Prime Minister Ben Gurion. The Israeli foreign minister sat in on the conference. They are reported to have discussed Israel's bid for arms from the United States.

Britain today announced a five-year program for building up its scientific and technical manpower, to meet the challenge of the nuclear age. The program calls for expenditure of 280-million dollars, for the expansion of training facilities.

In France, the government of Guy Mollet has asked the National Assembly for power to act by decree, in dealing with the Algerian question. General Paul Ély was named chief of staff of the French armed forces, succeeding General Guillaume... who advocated a "hard" policy toward the Arab nationalists.

In Birmingham, Alabama, a federal judge has ordered the University of Alabama to reinstate the Negro student... Autherine Lucy... by next Monday morning. / At the same time, university officials were acquitted of contempt charges.

And in Washington, Senator George said that conflicting testimony... given his committee investigating political contributions... will be turned over to the Justice Department. Robert Goodwin, Republican national committeeman for Iowa, testified today that lobbyist John Neff offered him 25-hundred dollars, as a campaign contribution for Senator Hickenlooper. Goodwin said he refused to take the money. Neff ~~testified~~ denied, under oath, that he had made the offer.

Word for Today

President Eisenhower... [redacted]... has bowed to what he holds to be his duty, to his party, and to his country. The road ahead will not be easy. But still he must feel a sense of relief. For as Cicero observed, "There is grief in indecision." Cicero also said, "No phase of life... whether public or private... can be free from duty."

Goodnight and good luck!

CBS RADIO DIVISION

EDWARD MURROW

Wednesday, February 29, 1956
7:45-8:00 p.m.

MURROW: This is the news! President Eisenhower says he's willing and here, by recording, is how he said it at hisnews conference thismorning.

EISENHOWER: Now, my next announcement involves something more personal, but I think it will be of interest to you because you've asked me so many questions aboutit. I've promised thisbody that when I reached a decision as tomy own attitude aboutmy own personal future, I would let you know as soon as I reached such adecision. Now, I have reached a decision,but I found as I did so that there were so many factors and considerations involved that I saw the answer could not be expressed just in the simple terms of "yes" and "no." Some full explanation to the American people is nownecessary, but I would never consent to go before them unless I was sure that they did understand these things, these influences, these possibilities. Moreover, I would not allow my same to go before the Republican Convention unless they under ... all the Republicans understood,so that they would not be nominating some individual other than they thought they were nominating, so, for both reasons, because I don't know certainly for certain that the RepublicanConvention, after hearing the entire story want me ... I don't know whether the people want me,but I am ... I will say this ... I am asking as quickly as this conference is over ...I am asking for time on television and radio ... I'm going directly to the American people and tell them the full facts and my answer, within the limits I have so sketchily observed, but which I will explain in detail tonight so as to get the story out in one continuous narrative myanswer willbe positive,that is, affirmative.

Now, because I do intend to give the details of this story tonight I do not intend to have it as a subject for further conversation this morning because I believe that is the only answer I promised this particular group, a "yes" or "no" as far as I could give it.

Now, I've done with my announcements and we'll go to questions.

SPEAKER: Mr. President, since your answer is affirmative, would you again want Vice President Nixon as your running mate?

EISENHOWER: As a matter of fact, I wouldn't mention the vice presidency in spite of my tremendous admiration for Mr. Nixon for this reason. I believeit is traditional that a Vice President is not nominated until after a President is, a presidential candidate is nominated, so I think we'll have to wait to see who the RepublicanConvention nominates and then it will be proper to give an expression on that point.

VON FREMD: Mr. President, Charles Von Fremd, of CBS News. I just wonderif you could clarify that further. Should you be nominated by the Convention, would you like to have the Vice President ..... (interruption)

EISENHOWER: I will say nothing more about it. I have said that my admiration and my respect for Vice President Nixon is unbounded. He has been, for me,a loyal and dedicated associate and a successful one. I am very fond of him, but I am going to say no more about it.

SMITH: Smith, of the United Press. Can you tell us when you arrived at a positive decision?

EISENHOWER: Well, I have tried to ... I'll say this one thing and it probably willbe in my message this evening, but I will say that I was arguing aboutit yesterday morning.

STEELE: John Steele, "Time" magazine. Mr. President, are you able to tell us within your embargo with whom you discussed this problem?

EISENHOWER: Everybody I thought was my friend and some that I wasn't so sure! (laughter)

ROBERTS: Sir, I wonder if you could tell ... Roberts, of "Newsweek," I wonderif you could tell us whether you're planning an active, cross-country-type of campaign or a more inactive .....

EISENHOWER: It's one of those things you'll be perfectly assuredof this evening.

SPEAKER: Mr. President, (inaudible) ..... statement, you said "my answer will be positive," did you (inaudible) ..... affirmative .....

EISENHOWER: And affirmative. That's what I said. Now, I said ... by that I mean affirmative; I think that's what I said.

SPEAKER: (inaudible) ..... would you consent to the entry of your name in the primaries for (inaudible) if necessary. That would involve almost immediately (inaudible) in Wisconsin and California.

EISENHOWER: Well, Mr. Bailey, (?) I've been so busy with my own decisions that this is one I haven't yet made. Now, I would know of no reason for ... I did give aparticular reason in New Hampshire, but apparently is not now applicable to the case you speak of.

SPEAKER: No, that isn't the case.

EISENHOWER: I'll have to give an answer later.

SPEAKER: (inaudible) ..... your announcement will undoubtedly take many people out of the race. Do you want competitionin this ... asfar asthe nomination?

EISENHOWER: I have tried to make it just as clear as I can that (unintelligibld) Republicans would like to do thisjob I would like to see him put his case before the public just (unintelligible) knows how.

SPEAKER: Will you campaign actively for the nomination?

EISENHOWER: I will tell you those things this evening.

McCLENDON: Mr. President, Sarah McClendon, of the El Paso "Times," will you tell us if you think that ... have you heard whether your veto of the gas bill has helped or hurt your chances in some sections?

EISENHOWER: I haven't the slightest idea, but I'll say this, as I said in my veto, there was a, what I believed to be, a minor sectionof a great and vital industry I thought was guilty of arrogant and indefensible action. Now, my great friends in the oil industry, and I am ... they still have sent me telegrams if not of complete satisfaction and applause, at least they've accepted it as an honest act and they have been ... I am really proud of the way most of them, the great vast majority, have acted.

SPEAKER: (unintelligible) ..... of the "Washington Star." Would you care to say what Mrs. Eisenhower's reaction was to your decision?

EISENHOWER: Well, I wouldn't say that right now except this. Mrs. Eisenhower and other members of my family from the beginning have said "this is your decision; we'll conform."

SPEAKER: (unintelligible), American Broadcasting Company. Sir, no one has been franker than you (revealing-?) yourself in reviewing the state of your health, how would you expect this issue to be handled in the campaign?

EISENHOWER: Well, I hadn't given any thought, but for my part, I'm going to try to be just as truthful as I can be and I believe this. I think even people who classify themselves probably as my political enemies do believe I am honest. They may call me "stupid" but I think they feel I'm honest. (laughter)

KERR: Walter Kerr, of the "Herald Tribune," I wonder if you can tell us, Sir, what you regard as the most (inaudible) major issues in the campaign (inaudible)?

EISENHOWER: No, I don't think I want to sort them out and now define them as issues. What I am going to face is that I have a record established before the American people, that's my campaign.

Ed.trans.-A.A.Cardiff (30)

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 29, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

President Eisenhower says he's willing and here, by recording, is how he said at at his news conference this morning.

EISENHOWER: Now, my next announcement involves something more personal, but I think it will be of interest to you because you've asked me so many questions about it. I've promised this body that when I reached a decision as to my own attitude about my own personal future, I would let you know as soon as I reached such a decision. Now, I have reached a decision, but I found as I did so that there were so many factors and considerations invovled that I say the anwwer could not be expressed just in the simple terms of "yes" and "no". Some full explanation to the American people is now necessary, but I would never consent to go before them unless I was sure that they did understand these things, these influences, these possibilities. Moreover, I would not allow my name to o before the Republican Convention unless they understood all the Republicans understood, so that they would not be nominating some individual other then they thought they were nominating, so, for both reasons, because I don't know certainly for certain that the Republican Convention, after hearing the entire story want me..I don't know whether the people want me, but I am.. I will say this..I as asking as quickly as this con erence is over..I - asking tor time an television and radio..I'm going directly to the American people and tell them the full facts and my answer, within the limits I have so sketchily coverved, but which I will explain in detail tonight so as to get the story out in one continuous narrative,mmy answer will be positive, that is, affirmative.

Now, because I do intend to give the details of this story tonight I do not intend to have it as a subject for further conversation this morning because I believe that is the only answer I promised this particular group, a "yes" or "no" as far as I could give it. Now, I've done with my announcements and we'll go to questions.

SPEAKER: Mr. President, since your answer is affirmative, would you again want Vice President Nixon as your running mate?

EISENHOWER: As a matter of fact, I wouldn't mention the vice presidency in spite of my tremendous admiration for Mr. Nixon for this reason. I believe it is traditional that a Vice President is not nominated until after a President is, a presidential candidate is nominated, so I think we'll have to wait to see who the Republican Convention nominates and then it will be proper to give an expression on that point.

VON FREMD: Mr. President, Charles Von Fremd, of CBS News, I just wonder if you could clarify that further. Should you be nominated by the Convention, woud would you like to have the Vice President..(interruption)

EISENHOWER: I will say nothing more about it. I have said that my admiration and my respect for Vice President Nixon is unbounded. He has been, for me, a loyal and dedicated associate and a successful one. I am very fond of him, but I am going to say no more about it.

SMITH: Smith, of the United Press. Can you tell us when you arrived at a positive decision?

EISENHOWER: Well, I have tried to..I'll say this one thing and it probably will be my message this evening, but I will say that I was arguing about it yesterday morning.

STEELE: John Steele, "Time" magazine. Mr. President, are you able to tell us within your embargo with whom you discussed this problem?

EISENHOWER Everybody I thought was my friend and some that I wasn't so sure! (laughter)

ROBERTS: Sir, I wonder if you could tell..Roberts, of "Newsweek", I wonder if you could tell us whether you're planning an active, cross-country-type of campaign of a more inactive..

EISENHOWER : It's one of those things you'll be perfectly assured of this evening.

SPEAKER: Mr. President, (inaudible)..statement, you said "my answer will be postiive", did you (inaudible) ..affirmative..

EISENHOWER: And affirmative. That's what I said. Now, I said..by that I mean affirmative; I think that's what I said.

SPEAKER: (inaudible) would you consent to the entry of your name in the primaries for (inaudible) if necessary. That would involve almost immidiately (inaudible) in Wisconsin and California.

EISENHOWER: Well, Mr. Bailey, I've been so busy with my own decisions that this is one I haven't yet made. Now, I would know of no reason for...I did give a particular reason in New Hampshire, but apparently is not now applicable to the case you speak of.

SPEAKER: Now, that isn't the case.

EISENHOWER: I'll give you an answer later.

SPEAKER: (inaudible) ..your announcement will undoubtedly take many people out of the race. Do you want competition in this...as far as the nomination?

EISENHOWER: I have tried to make it just as clear as I can that (unintelligible) Republicans would like to do this job I would like to see him put his case before the public just (unintelligible) knows how.

SPEAKER: Will you campaign actively for the nomination?

EISENHOWER: I will tell you those things this evening.

MCCLENDON: Mr. President, Sarah McClendon, of the ElPaso "Times", will you tell us if you think that..have you heard whether your veto of the gas bill has helped or hurt your chances in some sections?

EISENHOWER: I haven't hee slightest idea, but I'll say this, as I said in my veto, thate was a, what I believed to be, a minor section of a great and vital industry I thought was guilty of arrogant and indefensible action. No , my great friends in the oil industry, and I am.they still have sent me telegrams if not of complete satisfaction and applause, at least they've accepted it as an honest act and they have been..I am really proud of the may most of them, the great vast majority, have acted.

SPEAKER (unintelligible) of the "Washington Star." Would you care to say what Mrs. Eisenhower's reaction was to your decision?

EISENHOWER: Well, I wouldn't say that right now except this. Mrs. Eisenhower and other members of my family from the beginning have said "this is your decision; we'll conform."

SPEAKER: (unintelligible), American Broadcasting Compnay. Sir, no one has been franker than yourself in reviewing the state of your health, how would you expect this issue to be handled in the campaign?

EISENHOWER: Well, I hadn't given any thought, but for my part, I'm going to try to be just as truthful as I can be and I believe this. I think even people who classify themselves probably as my political enemies to believe I am honest. They may call me "stupid" but I think they feel I'm honest. (laughter)

KERR: Walter Kerr, of the "Herald Tribune", I wonder if you can tell us, Sir, what you regard as the most (inaudible) major issues in the campaign(inaudible)?

EISENHOWER: Now, I don't think I want to sort them out now and define them as issues. What I am going to face is that I have a record estatlished before the American people, that's my campaign.

MURROW: Mr. Eisenhower spoke of a talk he will make tonight on the radio and television networks. CBS Radio will carry that address at 10 p.m., Eastern Standard Time.

Republican leaders are jubilant over the President's announcement. The Republican national chairman, Leonard Hall, said: "This is the best possible news for all Americans. It means a continuation of the peace, prosperity and progress of the Eisenhower Republican Administration." Democratic National Chairman Paul Butler said Mr. Eisenhowe had been "pressured" into his decision, and he.. Butler..doubted that the people would elect "a part - time president."

Adlai Stevenson said it as "fitting" Mr. Eisenhower should be the Republican candidate..since the main issue of the campaign would be the record of the Eisenohwer Administration. Governor Harriman said the President "must now at last take full responsibility" for that record, which he called a record "of surrender to the domination of Big Interests". Seantor Kefauver commented, "the campaign can now be waged on its merits..without mudslinging..but with no punches pulled."

Reaction abroad is restrained because of a reluctance to become involved in American politics.

The New York Stock Market reacted strongly. Initial gains averaged one to three dollars a share. Traders then cashed in their profits. And at the close, some high-priced shares showed losses of two to four dollars. Trading was the heaviest in five months.

In Jerusalem, the American ambassador..Edward Lawson..had a one-hour talk with Israeli Prime Minister Ben Gurion. The Israeli foreign minister sat in on the conference. They are reported to have discussed Israel's bid for arms from the United States.

Britain today announced a five-year program for building up its scientific and technical manpower, to meet the challenge of the nuclear age. The program calls for expenditure of 280-million dollars, for the expansion of training facilities.

In France, the government of Guy Mollet has asked the National Assembly for power to act by decree, in dealing with the Algerian question. General Paul Ely was named chief of staff of the French armed forces, succeeding General Guillaume..who advocated a "hard" policy toward the Arab nationalists.

In Birmingham, Alabama, a federal judge has ordered the University of Alabama to reinstate the Negro student..Autherine Lucy..by next Monday morning. At the same time, university officials were acquitted of contempt charges.

And in Washington, Senator George said that conflicting testimony..given his committee investigating political contributions..will be turned over to the Justice Department. Robert Goodwin, the Republican national committeeman for Iowa, testified today that lobbyist John Neff offered him 25- hundred dollars as a campaign contribution for Senator Hickenlooper. Goodwin said he refused to take the money. Neff denied, under oath, that he had made the offer.

This is Ed Murrow. I'llb be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: President Eisenhower..has bowed to what he holds to be his duty to his party and to his country. The road ahead will not be easy. But still he must feel a sense of relief. For as Cicero observed, "there is grief in indecision." Cicero also said, "No phase of life..whether public or private..can be free of from duty".

Good Night and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Thurs., March 1, 1956

This is the news:

President Eisenhower's name was entered today in the Republican primaries, in California and Wisconsin. Mr. Eisenhower gave his written consent, as prescribed by the laws of both states. His name already is entered in six other states where consent is not required.

The White House announced that it has received "many hundreds of telegrams"... praising President Eisenhower's decision to seek another term. There were only "a few" telegrams of disapproval.

Republican National Chairman Hall predicted today, that if the Democrats try to use the health issue, against President Eisenhower, their strategy "will backfire and cost them votes." Hall said any "whispering campaign" would fail, "because the American people know the President has insisted, that every fact about his health be made known, as quickly as it is determined by the medical authorities." He said Mr. Eisenhower may make some "quick trips" in the campaign.

→

But as the President said last night in his nationwide talk, coast-to-coast barnstorming is out. About 2-million dollars, he said, would be spent for radio and television appearances, on behalf of the President and other national candidates. Hall stuck to his prediction that Vice President Nixon will be renominated. He called Eisenhower and Nixon "the greatest team" in the country.

Republican Representative Hillings of California charged today that Nixon was being made the target for "left-wing propaganda". He said the "smear campaign" would fail.

Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey, and Secretary of Labor Mitchell, both said today that they have no interest whatever in running for vice president.

Adlai Stevenson commented on President Eisenhower's nationwide address. "I was amazed," Stevenson said, "to hear him say that he has fully performed the duties of the presidency for the past few weeks. While I pray for his good health, I also respect the great office, which cannot be conducted on a part-time basis."

Senator Kefauver announced today that he is entering the Democratic presidential primary in New Jersey. He said President Eisenhower's decision to seek another term will not affect his own campaign plans.

President Eisenhower and the visiting President of Italy... Giovanni Gronchi... issued a joint communique today, warning against any relaxation of Western defense efforts. They agreed that Italy no longer needs economic aid, but would benefit from long-term investments by American business. ~~Earlier, Gronchi told a National Press Club luncheon that today the cold war involves more than a balance of military power. He said that with Russia's new emphasis on economic assistance, the democracies must realize they are in a struggle for men's minds.~~

Democratic Senator Russell today urged Congress to divert one and a half billion dollars from the Administration's foreign aid program, to the Air Force. Russell... who is chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee... said that unless more money is forthcoming, we will wind up with the second-best air force.

The House today approved a bill for construction of the Upper Colorado River project. The vote was 256 to 136. The bill calls for a 756-million-dollar program of water and power development in Colorado, Utah, Arizona and New Mexico. The measure now goes back to the Senate, which had voted an additional 240-million dollars. ~~The House version also discards plans for the controversial Echo Park Dam, which California contended would deprive it of water.~~

The University of Alabama expelled Autherine Lucy today, on grounds that she had made false charges against officials of the university. The Negro student had accused school officials of conspiring with outsiders, in the riot that drove her from the campus on February 8th, but the charge was dropped yesterday in Federal Court. The court then ordered Miss Lucy readmitted to classes no later than Monday. Today, she expressed shock at the new turn of events. She said, "I have done all I can."

The United States delivered a note to Russia today, charging that Russian weather balloons had been floated over Alaska... as well as over other countries, including Germany and Japan. The note was in answer to the Soviet protest against American weather balloons over Russia. "It is illogical," the note said, "that the Soviet government should desire one rule for itself, and another for the rest of the world."

Secretary of State Dulles today asked Congress to approve United States membership in the Organization for Trade Cooperation. (That is an agency... supported by 35 countries... for policing international trade and tariff agreements). Dulles said the economic relationships of the United States lie at the heart of present foreign policy. Membership in the trade organization, he said, would strengthen the unity of free nations.

Foreign policy was debated today in the Israeli parliament. Israel's foreign minister... Moshe Sharett... said that Secretary Dulles' attitude toward Israel has been "disappointing and alarming". Sharett said, "There is no doubting Mr. Dulles' sincerity in proclaiming that the preservation of Israel is an integral part of United States policy. But," he added, "the practical outcome of his approach defeat that purpose."

Regarding Israel's request for permission to purchase arms from the United States, Sharett said, "We have made it clear that we feel entitled to have a clear answer within the shortest time possible... and that the absence of a decision is also a decision."

T

15
8815

NY MAR 1 1956

EDWARD R MURROW

CARE CBS WASHINGTON

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER YESTERDAY ANSWERED THE BIGGEST QUESTION IN AMERICAN POLITICS... BUT HIS BIG "YES" OPENED UP FORMIDABLE QUESTIONS THAT HE DID NOT OR COULD NOT ANSWER. ONE HE COULD HAVE ANDSWERED AND DECLINED TO, WAS ABOUT THE VICE-PRESIDENCY. MR EISENHOWER IS CERTAIN OF THE NOMINATION AND HE IS JUST AS CERTAIN OF HAVING THE FINAL SAY-SO ON WHO WILL BE ON THE TICKET WITH HIM. INDEED HE ALREADY HAS SERVED NOTICE THAT THE NOMINEE FOR PRESIDENT MUST BE GIVEN THIS RIGHT. BUT YESTERDAY MR EISENHOWER PUT OFF EXERCISING IT UNTIL AFTER HIS OWN NOMINATION. [redacted] THAT COULD MEAN THAT MR EISENHOWER IS NOT GOING TO INSIST ON MR NIXON,S NOMINATION, AND THE FIELD IS OPEN FOR SENTIMENT TO DEVELOP FOR SOMEONE ELSE. BUT IT ALSO COULD MEAN THAT MR EISENHOWER IS TAKING MR NIXON OUT OF THE LINE OF DEMOCRATIC FIRE FOR THE TIME BEING BUT WILL PLUMP FOR HIM AT SANFRANCISCO. [redacted] HE

MIGHT HAVE PLUMPED FOR HIM YESTERDAY, BUT HAD HE DONE SO THE NATIONAL CONVENTION WOULD HAVE BECOME ALMOST MEANINGLESS. ITS ONLY REMAINING JOB WOULD BE TO DRAFT A PLATFORM. MR EISENHOWER SAVED THE CONVENTION FROM THIS PATHETIC FATE. IT WAS GOOD POLITICS TO DO SO, EVEN IF NOTHING ELSE WAS INVOLVED. [redacted] AT SANFRANCISCO, MR EISENHOWER MAY REPEAT WHAT HE DID FOUR YEARS AGO IN CHICAGO, WRITE DOWN FOUR OR FIVE NAMES OF MEN WHO WOULD BE ACCEPTABLE TO HIM AS A RUNNING MATE. THAT WOULD SEEM TO GIVE THE CONVENTION A FREE CHOICE, AND IF NIXON LOST THAT WAY, THE PRESIDENT WOULD BE OFF THE HOOK, FOR HE DOES SEEM TO HAVE A HALF-WAY COMMITMENT TO HIM. THE PRESIDENT HAS ADVISERS WHO DO NOT WANT NIXON ON THE TICKET. ALREADY THE CAPITAL IS HUMMING WITH

RUMORS ABOUT MR NIXON GETTING A BIG CABINET POST TO MAKE ROOM FOR SOMEONE LESS CONTROVERSIAL AS VICE-PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE./ GOVERNOR HERTER OF MASSACHUSETTS, SECRETARY HUMPHREY AND THOMAS E. DEWEY ARE MENTIONED AS POSSIBILITIES./ AND THE CABINET POSTS ARE SAID TO BE DEFENSE OR ATTORNEY GENERAL, ON THE ASSUMPTION THAT SECRETARY WILSON PLANS TO RETIRE, OR MR BROWNELL IS SLATED TO FILL THE NEXT VACANCY ON THE SUPREME COURT. BUT THIS MAYBE WILD SPECULATION./ WHAT IS SAFE TO SAY IS THAT MR EISENHOWER DID NOT ALLOW THE NIXON ISSUE TO LESSEN IN ANY WAY THE IMPACT OF YESTERDAYS ANNOUNCEMENT OF HIS OWN CANDIDACY. ANOTHER UNANSWERED QUESTION, IS HOW MUCH OF AN ISSUE THE PRESIDENTS HEALTH WILL BE IN THE CAMPAIGN. IT HAS BEEN MADE A PROPER SUBJECT, BY THE PRESIDENT DISCUSSING IT HIMSELF. BUT THE DEMOCRATS MAY DECIDE THAT AS A WEAPON IT COULD BACK-FIRE. THE COUNTRY CAN BE DESCRIBED AS HAVING TWO BASIC FEELINGS ABOUT THE PRESIDENT, SYMPATHY AND DOUBT./ IT HAS ENORMOUS SYMPATHY FOR THE MAN WHO SURMOUNTED A CRITICAL ILLNESS, AND HAS RESPONDED TO THE CALL OF DUTY WITH OBVIOUS SINCERITY./ BUT MANY WILL CONTINUE TO FEEL DOUBTS ABOUT THE PRESIDENTS HEALTH./ AND EVERY VACATION HE TAKES, EVERY TIME THERE IS DELAY IN MAKING A TOUGH DECISION, OR A DECISION DOES NOT SEEM TO BE WISE, PEOPLE ARE GOING TO WONDER WHAT PART THE PRESIDENTS HEALTH HAS PLAYED. THIS FEELING OF DOUBT WILL REGISTER ABROAD TOO./ THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN TODAY WRITES THAT THE PRESIDENTS DECISION MUST HAVE BEEN HEARD BY NONPARTISANS AT HOME AND STRONG FRIENDS OF AMERICA ABROAD, WITH DISMAY. IT WONDERS IF THE PRESIDENTS HEALTH CAN STAND UP FOR NEARLY FIVE YEARS MORE, AND ASKS "MAY WE NOT BE FACED WITH ANOTHER LONG PERIOD OF ILLNESS, OR INCAPACITY, DURING WHICH THE LEADERSHIP OF DEMOCRACYS LAST HOPE GOES BY DEFAULT. THIS REPORTER BELIEVES THAT ANOTHER QUESTION CANNOT BE ANSWERED YET, AND THAT IS THE OUTCOME OF THE ELECTION. IT IS TRUE THAT PUBLIC OPINION POLLS SHOW MR EISENHOWER NEAR THE PEAK OF HIS POPULARITY. THEY ALSO SHOW HIM HANDILY BEATING HIS STRONGEST OPPONENT, ADLAI STEVENSON. IF THE ELECTION WERE HELD NOW, THAT PRESUMABLY WOULD BE TRUE. BUT IT WOULD BE BY A NARROWER MARGIN THAN IN 1952. FOR ONE THING, HE IS NOT GOING TO CARRY ANY SOUTHERN STATES, SO FAR AS CAN BE FORESEEN. HE MAY LOSE BORDDER STATES, AND SOME OR ALL OF THE FARM STATES. IF HE LOST ALL OF ALL THREE GROUPS, HE WOULD LOSE THE ELECTION. SO THE ELECTION COULD BE CLOSE. THE ART OF CAMPAIGNING IS TO FIND THE MOST PLAUSIBLE SIMPLIFICATIONS POSSIBLE. THE EISENHOWER STRATEGY BOARD HAS CHOSEN TWO, PEACE AND PROSPERITY. BUT SUPPOSE THAT BY NOVEMBER A SMALL WAR HAS BROKEN OUT, OR SUPPOSE THAT A BUSINESS RECESSION BECOMES A CLOUD ON THE HORIZON, THESE SIMPLIFICATIONS WOULD LOSE SOME OF THEIR MAGIC. IT IS NOTEWORTHY THAT THE STOCKMARKET YESTERDAY ENDED AT A LOWER LEVEL, THAN BEFORE THE EISENHOWER ANNOUNCEMENT. OF COURSE, THAT WAS BECAUSE SPECULATORS QUICKLY SNATCHED THEIR PROFITS. BUT IT SHOWED THAT A GREAT GROUND SWELL OF PUBLIC CONFIDENCE OVER THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK WAS NOT THERE.

AS THIS REPORTER SEES IT, NEITHER REPUBLICANS NOR DEMOCRATS ARE ENTITLED TO TOO MUCH CONFIDENCE. THE DEMOCRATS PLAN TO FIGHT ON THE PRESIDENTS RECORD, AND TO ACCUSE HIM OF FAVORITISM TO BIG BUSINESS. BUT AS FOR THE RECORD, THEY HAVE TO BE SURE JUST WHAT RECORD THEY ARE ATTACKING. MANY OF THE BEST THINGS IN THAT RECORD THEY HELPED PUT THERE. THE DEMOCRATS DO HAVE THE COMFORT THAT SINCE 1952 THEY HAVE GAINED STEADILY IN VIRTUALLY EVERY ELECTION. UNTIL YESTERDAY, THE TIDE WAS RUNNING THEIR WAY. BUT THERE IS NO PROOF YET THAT MR EISENHOWER, DESPITE HIS HEART ATTACK, OR EVEN BECAUSE OF IT, CANNOT TURN BACK THE TIDE.

Bob White

Word for Today

For the next eight months, candidates will be ~~declaring~~ proclaiming their qualifications for public office. General Marshall was once asked what he regarded as the 'indispensables' for public service. His answer was: "Courage, wisdom, an understanding of the democratic procedures. Tolerance. You can't operate the democratic system without tolerance."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

THURSDAY, MARCH 1, 1956
7:45; 8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

President Eisenhower's name was entered today in the Republican primaries in California and Wisconsin. Mr. Eisenhower gave his written consent, as prescribed by the laws of both states. His name already is entered in six other states where consent is not required.

The White House announced that it has received "many hundreds of telegrams" praising President Eisenhower's decision to seek another term. There were only "a few" telegrams of disapproval.

Republican National Chairman Hall predicted today that if the Democrats try to use the health issue against President Eisenhower, their strategy "will backfire and cost them votes." Hall said any "whispering campaign" would fail, "because the American people know the President has insisted that every fact about his health be made known as quickly as it is determined by the medical authorities." He said Mr. Eisenhower may make some "quick trips" in the campaign. But as the President said last night in his nationwide talk, coast-to-coast barnstorming is out. About 2-million dollars, he said, would be spent for radio and television appearances, on behalf of the President and other national candidates. Hall stuck to his prediction that Vice President Nixon will be renominated. He called Eisenhower and Nixon "the great team" in the country.

Republican Representative Hillings of California charged today that Nixon was being made the target for "left-wing propaganda". He said the "smear campaign" would fail.

Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey, and Secretary of Labor Mitchell, both said today that they have no interest whatever in running for vice president.

Adlai Stevenson commented on President Eisenhower's nationwide address. "I was amazed", Stevenson said, "to hear him say that he has fully performed the duties of the presidency for the past few weeks. While I pray for his good health, I also respect the great office, which cannot be conducted on a part-time basis."

Senator Kefauver announced today that is is entering the Democratic presidential primary in New Jersey. He said President Eisenhower's decision to seek another term will not affect his own campaign plans.

President Eisenhower and the visiting President of Italy..Giovanni ... Gronchi..issued a joint communique today, warning against any relaxation of Western defense efforts. They agreed that Italy no longer needs economic aid, but would benefit from long term investments by American business.

Democratic Senator Russell today urged Congress to divert one and a half billion dollars from the Administration's foreign aid program, to the Air Force. Russell..who is chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee..said that unless more money is forthcoming, we will wind up widh the second-best air force.

The House today approved a bill for construction of the Upper Colorado River project. The vote was 256 to 136. The bill calls for a 756-million-dollar program of water and power development in Cororado, Utah, Arizona and New Mexico. The measure now goes back to the Senate, which had voted and additional 240-million dollars.

The University of Alabama expelled Autherine Lucy today, on grounds that she mad made false charges against officials of the university. The Negro student had accused school officials of conspiring with outsiders in the riot that drove her from the campus on February 8th, but the charge was dropped yesterday in Federal Court. The court then ordered Miss Lucy readmitted to classes no later than Monday. Today, she expressed shock at the new turn of events. She said, "I have done all I can."

The United States delivered a note to Russia today, charging that Russian weather ballons had been floated over Alaska..as well as over other countries, including Germany and Japan. The note was in answer to the Soviet protest against American weather balloons over Russia. "It is illogical", the note said, "that the Soviet government should desire one rule for itself and another for the rest of the world."

Foreign policy was debated today in the Israeli parliament. Israel's foreign minister..Moshe Sharett..said that Secretary Dulles' attitude toward Israel has been "disappointing and alraming". Sharett said, "There is no doubting Mr. Dulles' sincerity in proclaiming that the preservation of Israel is an integral part of United States policy."But," he added," the practical outcome of his approach defeat that purpose".

Regarding Israel's request for permission to purchase arms from the United States, Sharett said, "We have made it clear that we feel entitled to have a clear answer within the shortest time possible..and that the absence of a decision is also a decision."

President Eisenhower yesterday answered the biggest question in American politics..but his big "yes" opened up formidable questions that he did not or could not answer. One he could have answered and declined to, was about the vice-presidency. Mr. Eisenhower is certain of the nomination and he is just as certain of the final say-so on who will be on the ticket with him. Indeed he already has served notice that the nominee for president must be given this right. But yesterday, Mr. Eisenhower put off exercising it until after his own nomination. That could mean that Mr. Eisenhower is not going to insist on Mr. Nixon's nomination, and the field is open for sentiment to develop for someone else. But it also could mean that Mr. Eisenhower is taking Mr. Nixon out of the line of Democratic fire for the time being but will plump for him at San Francisco. He might have plumped for him yesterday, but had he doee so, the national convention would have become ammost meaningless. Its only remaining job would be to draft a platform. Mr. Fisenhower saved the convention from this pathetic fate. It was good politics to do so, even if nothing else was involved. At San Francisco, Mr. Eisenhower may repeat what he did four years ago in Chicago, write down four or five names of men who would be acceptable to him as a running mate. That would seem to give the convention a free choice, and if Nixon lost that way, the President would be off the hook, for he does seem to have a half-way commitment to him. The President has advisers who do not want Nixon on the ticket. Already the captial is humming with rumors about Mr. Nixon getting a big cabinet post to make room for someone less controversial as vice-presidential candidate. Governor Herter of Massachusetts , Secretary Humphrey and Thomas E. Dewey are mentioned as possibilities. And the cabinet posts are said to be defense or Attorney General, on the assumption that Secretary Wilson plans to retire or Mr. Brownell is slated to fill the next vacancy on the Supreme Courty. But this may be wild speculation. What is safe to say is that Mr. Eisenhower did not allow the Nixon issue to lessen in any way the impact of yesterday's announcement of his own candidacy.

Another unanswered question is how much of an issue the President's health will be in the campaign. It has beem made a proper subject by the President discussing it himself. But the Democrats may decide that as a weapon it could back-fire. The country can be described as having two basic feelings about the President, sympathy and doubt. I has enormous sympathy for the man who surmounted a critical illness and has responded to the call of duty with obvious sincerity. But many will continue to feel doubts about the President's health. And every vacation he takes, every time there is delay in making a tough decision, or a decision does not seem to be wise, people are going to wonder what part the President's health has played. This feeling of doubt will register abroad too. The Manchester Guardian today writes that the President's decision must have been heard by non-partisans at home and strong friends of American abroad with dismay. It wonders of the President's health can stand up for nearly five years more , and asks "May we not be faced with another long period of illness or incapacity, during which the leadership of Democracy's last hope goes by default.

This reporter believes that another question cannot be answered yet, and that is the outcome of the election. It is true that public opinion polls show Mr. Eisenhower near the peak of his popularity. They also show him handily beating his strongest opponent Adlai Stevenson. If the election were held now, that presumably would be true. But it would be by a narrower margin that in 1952. For one thing, he is not going to carry any Southern states aso far as can be foreseen. He may lose border states, and some or all of the farm states. If he last all of all three groups, he would lose the election. So the election could be close. The art of campaigning is to find the most plausible simplifications possible. The Eisenhower strategy board has chosen two, peace and prosperity. But suppose that by November a small war has broken out, or suppose that a business recession becomes a cloud on the horizon; these simplifications would lose some of their magic. It is noteworthy that the stockmarket yesterday ended at a lower level than before the Eisenhower announcement. Of course that was because speculators quickly snatched their profits. But it showed that a great ground swell of public confidence over the business outlook was not there.

As this reporter sees it, neither Republicans nor Democrats are entitled to too much confidence. The Democrats plan to fight on the President's record and to accuse him of favoritism to big business. But as for the record, they have to be sure just what record they are attacking. Many of the things in that record they helped put there. The Democrats do have the comfort that since 1952 they have gained staadily in virtually every election. Until yesterday, the tide was running their way. But there is no proof yet that Mr. Eisenhower , despite his heart attack, or even because of it, cannot turn back the tide.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll ba back in a minute with the Word for Today. First, here is Bob Hite.

HITE: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: For the next eight months, candidates will be proclaiming qualifications for public office. General Marhhall was once asked what he regarded as "indespensables" for public service. His answer was: "Courage, wisdom, an understanding of the democratic prodecures. Tolerance. You can't operate the democratic system without tolerance."

Good Night and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Fri., March 2, 1956

This is the news:

The king of Jordan has dismissed Glubb Pasha, the British officer who had commanded the Jordan army since 1939. In his sudden action, King Hussein bowed to nationalist pressure. And British influence in the Middle East has suffered another severe ~~pow~~ blow. (I should like to discuss this important matter further, in a few minutes).

In Washington, Secretary of State Dulles met today with the Israeli ambassador. Mr. Dulles suggested the meeting, because he wanted to bring the ambassador "up to date" on the American attitude on Middle East problems. No reply was given to Israel's request for permission to buy arms in the United States.

After his conference with the Israeli ambassador, Mr. Dulles took off on his scheduled trip to the Far East... and the meeting of the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization in Karachi, on Monday.

→

He said he hoped to get additional, first-hand information on "the seeming shift" in Soviet tactics in the area.

The British foreign secretary... Selwyn Lloyd... also is on his way to the Seato meeting. / Lloyd left Cairo today, after what he termed "full and frank talks" with Egyptian Premier Nasser. / The talks dealt largely with the Baghdad Pact, and the possibility of a peace settlement between Israel and the Arab states. Lloyd said the United States and Britain would act jointly against any aggressor that renews the Palestine war.

Reports from Washington say that Saudi Arabia... and other Arab countries... have expressed interest in buying "a small number" of jet planes from the United States. / Saudi Arabia reportedly also wants to buy eighteen M-47 tanks. These are medium tanks. / Eighteen light tanks were shipped to Saudi Arabia last month. / A State Department spokesman would neither confirm nor deny these reports.

Pakistan became an Islamic republic today, and decided to stay inside the British Commonwealth. The first president of the republic (who must be a moslem) will be elected on Monday.

In Morocco today, Arab nationalists ambushed a French Foreign Legion convoy, passing through mountainous terrain. Eight legionnaires were killed in the action.

This happened while, in Paris, France was formally recognizing the independence of Morocco. Conditions of Moroccan "interdependence" with France, are still to be worked out.

French Premier Mollet announced today that he will go to Moscow on May 14th, at the invitation of the Soviet government. He will be accompanied by the French foreign minister, Christian Pineau.

Pineau addressed a luncheon of American and British correspondents in Paris today... and said it seems to him, the West is talking too much of military security, and not enough about peace. As an example of "mistaken propaganda", he cited the recent Seato maneuvers in Thailand. He said he thought it was a question of emphasis. "We have alliances," he said, "but we have no real common policy."

In West Germany, Chancellor Adenauer's government today rejected another Soviet proposal, for direct negotiations between East and West Germany, to bring about reunification of the country. A government spokesman said simply, "The Soviet suggestion does not correspond with the view of the Federal Government."

→

President Eisenhower cabled his congratulations to Pope Pius today, on the occasion of the pontiff's 80th birthday. In his message, the President said: "I join men and women of all faiths in best wishes to you for many more years of devotion to the cause of freedom and peace among men."

It was announced that the special Senate committee the activities John Neff had ended its public hearings. said it would resume hearings into

The Senate today elected Senator Eastland of Mississippi to the chairmanship of the Senate Judiciary Committee. The action was taken by a voice vote. Eastland succeeds Senator Kilgore of West Virginia, who died. The choice was strongly opposed by Democratic Senators Lehman and Morse, who cited Eastland's attacks on the Supreme Court decision outlawing segregation in the public schools.

Here in New York today, Autherine Lucy said she will challenge her expulsion from the University of Alabama "by whatever legal steps are necessary." The university expelled the Negro student yesterday, for her charges (later withdrawn) that officials of the school had condoned the riot, which drove her from the campus on February 8th.

Autherine Lucy and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People were sued for 4-million dollars today in suits filed in the state circuit court in Birmingham. The suits were filed by four men who charged Miss Lucy with accusing them falsely of participation in mob action.

Here in New York today, Autherine Lucy said she will challenge her expulsion from the University of Alabama "by whatever legal steps are necessary." The university expelled the Negro student yesterday for her charges (later withdrawn) that officials of the school had condoned the riot, which drove her from the campus on February 6th.

Representative Powell of New York called on Attorney General Brownell today to list as subversive the White Citizens Councils, which have been opposing desegration in the South. Powell renewed his proposal that President Eisenhower summon representatives of both races to a meeting, to work toward peaceful settlement of the problem.

Adlai Stevenson today said that civil rights are "a matter of grave national concern." But it is not a problem, he said, restricted to the South. He said, "Before we cast a stone at Alabama, it might be well for those of us who live in some of the great northern cities, to ask ourselves in candor how the Negro minority is faring in our own communities." On the subject of politics, Stemenson said that "the Democrats are on their way back to Washington."

Senator Kefauver said today that he will not make President Eisenhower's physical condition an issue, if he should win the Democratic presidential nomination. But Kefauver said that although he will not inject the health issue into the campaign, he feels sure the voters will think about it.

The Interstate Commerce Commission granted a six percent increase in freight rates today to most of the nation's railroads. The increase is effective next Wednesday, and was granted to meet higher operating costs.

Edward R. Murrow: March 2, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

British power and prestige in the Middle East, and that of the Western world in general, has suffered a serious shock. The British General, John Glubb, generally known as Glubb Pasha, had commanded Jordan's armed forces since 1939. Twenty-year-old King Hussein fired him; together with two other ranking British officers of the Arab Legion, he went to the airport of Amman today under guard of sixteen tanks - flew to Cyprus. Britain created Jordan, a wholly artificial state, after World War I. Glubb created the Arab Legion, and trained it. It consists of about twenty thousand men, the best equipped and disciplined Arab force in the Middle East, although not as good as advertised. It has fought well on occasion at company strength, but is not regarded as very effective in larger units.

Jordan is four-fifths desert, the remaining fifth poor, flinty soil. The country has been kept alive by subsidies from Britain - about thirty million dollars a year. Since the war with Israel in 1948, half of Jordan's population has consisted of refugees from Palestine. They are bitter, they are nationalistic, and they wanted to get rid of the British whom they regarded as a restraining influence.

In Jordan there has been much admiration for Colonel Nasser's revolution in Egypt. Last winter the British tried to pressure Jordan into joining the Bagdad Defense Alliance, inlcuding Turkey, Iraq, Britain, Pakistan and Iran. There were riots, and Glubb Pasha's Legion was used to restore order. This further diminished Glubb's stature as the man who had been the "uncrowned king of Jordan." There was also the feeling in Jordan that the Legion would operate more effectively and freely against Israel if it were not under the command of a Briton. There are still some sixty British officers serving with the Legion. No one knows what will happen to them, but if they too are dismissed the Legion's capability will be drastically reduced.

The Saudi-Arabians have also been stoking the fires of nationalism in Jordan. My colleague Howard K. Smith who was recently in Jordan, cables me that he was told on good authority that the Saudi-Arabians had directly bought twenty-one members of Jordan's forty-man parliament.

Britain still has a treaty with Jordan, under which she guarantees the frontiers of the Arab kingdom. It's supposed to last until 1969. No one knows what will happen to this. The British Cabinet had a long session today, and the Foreign Office said the abrupt dismissal of Glubb shocked opinion in Britain and caused official concern for the consequences, both internal and external. The British have important air bases in Jordan, and these must now be considered in jeopardy.

Glubb's dismissal was no whim of the young King, resulted from no clash of personalities. It reflects the fires of Arab nationalism. It means that the symbol and substance of British power and influence is gone. Britain no longer is sure of Jordan, no longer controls the Arab Legion, and holds still more precariously its lessening power in the Middle East. If this had happened at an hour when the possibility of war involving Israel and its Arab neighbors did not hang like a cloud over the Middle East deserts, it would still be important news. But in this deepening crisis it must be called ominous. For now the Arab Legion - the best Arab force in existence - may line up with Egypt and Syria against Israel. This change in the military balance might cause Israel not to wait for these opposing forces to be knit together. This development will weaken the arguments of those who have counselled restraint, both in Israel and in Arab states.

There are unofficial reports in Cairo that there is shortly to be a "little Summit" meeting of four Arab chiefs of state, Syria, Egypt, Saudi-Arabia and Jordan. Presumably such a meeting would unite in opposing the Bagdad pact, could agree on joint action against Israel. and would certainly discuss methods of replacing the subsidy which Britain has previously granted to Jordan. Egypt and Saudi-Arabia have already agreed to do this.

The tension in the Middle East has been mounting for months. Western policy, British and American, appears to be paralyzed. Today the tension mounts a little more, just how much more it is too early to tell.

Word for Today

The dismissal of Glubb Pasha, is the product of nationalism. Albert Einstein once called nationalism "an infantile disease, the measles of mankind." And Veblen said, "Born in iniquity and conceived in sin, the spirit of nationalism has never ceased to bend human institutions to the service of dissension and distress."

Goodnight and good luck!

MR. EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

FRIDAY, MARCH 29 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the mews:

The king of Jordan has dismissed Blubb Pasha, the British officer who had commanded the Jordan army since 1939. In his sudden action, King Hussein bowed to nationalist pressure. And British influence in the Middle East has suffered another severe blow. (I should like to discuss this important matter further, in a few minutes.)

In Washington, Secretary of State Dulles met today with the Israeli ambassador. Mr. Dulles suggested the meeting, because he wanted to bring the ambassador "up to date" on the American attitude on Middle East problems. No reply was given to Israel's request for permission to buy arms in the United States.

After his conference wtih the Israeli ambassador, Mr. Dulles took off on his scheduled trip to the Far East..and the meeting of the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization on Karachi, on Monday. He said he hoped to get additional, first-hand information on "the seeming shift" in Soviet tactics in the area.

The British foreign secretary..Selwyn Lloyd..also is on his way to the Seato meeting. Lloyd left Cairo today, after what he termed "full and frank talks" with Egyptian Premier Nasser. The talks dealt largely with the Baghdad Pact, and the possivility of a peace settlement between Israel and the Arab states. Lloyd said the United States and Britain would act jointly against any aggressor that renews the Palestine war.

Reports from Washington say that Saudi Arabia..and other Arab countries ..have expressed interest in buying " a small number" of jet planes from the United States. Saudi Arabia reportedly also wants to buy eighteen M-47tanks. These are medium tanks. Eighteen light2 tanks were shipped to Saudi Arabia last month. A State Department spokesman would neither confirm nor deny these reports.

Pakistan became an Islamic republic today, and decided to stay inside the British Commonwealth. The first president of the republic (who must be a moslem) will be elected on Monday.

In Morocco today, Arab nationalists ambushed a French Foreign Legion convoy, passing through the mountainous terrain. Eight legionnaires were killed in the action.

This happened while, in Paris, France was formally recognizing the independence of Morocco. Conditions on Moroccan "interdependence" with France are still to be worked out.

French Premier Mollet announced today that he will go to Moscow on May 14th, at the invitation of the Soviet government. He will be accompanied by the French foreign minister, Christian Pineau.

Pineau addressed a luncheon of American and British correspondents in Paris today..and said it seems to him the West is talking too much of the military security, and not enough about peace. As an example of "mistaken propaganda", he cited the recent Seato maneuvers in Thailand. He said he thought is was a question of emphasis. "We have alliances", he said, "but we have no real common policy."

In West Germany, Chancellor Adenauer's government today rejected another Soviet proposal for direct negotiations between East and West. Germany, to bring about reunification of the country. A government spokesman said simply, "The Soviet suggestion does not coresspond with the view of the Federal Government."

President Eisenhower cabled his congratulations to Pope Pius today, on the ocaasion of the pontiff's 80th birthday. In his message, the President said: "I join men and women of all faiths in best wishes to you for many more years of devotion to the cause of freedom and peace among men."

The Senate today elected Senator Eastaland of Mississippi to the chairmanship of the Senate Judiciary Committee. The action was taken by a voice vote. Eastalan succeeds Senator Kilgore of West Virginia, who died. The choice was strongly opposed by Democratic Senators Lehman and Morse, who cited Eastland's attacks on the Supreme Court decision outlawing segragation in the public schools.

Here in New York today, Autherine Lucy said she will challenge her expulsion from the University of Alabama "by whatever legal steps are necessary." The University expelled the Negro student yesterday for her charges (later withdrawn) that officials of the school had condoned the riot, which drove her from the campus on February 8th.

Autherine Lucy and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People were sued for 4-million dollars today in suits filed in the state circuit court in Birmingham. The suits were filed by four men who charged Miss Lucy with accusing them falsely of participation in mob action.

Representative Powell of New York called on Attorney General Brownell today to list as subversive the White Citizens Councils which have been opposing desegregation in the South. Powell renewed his proposal that President Eisenhower summon representatives of both races to a meeting, to work toward peaceful settlement of the problem.

Adlai Stevenson today said that civil rights are "a matter of grave national concern." But it is not a problem, he said, restricted to the South. He said "Before we cast a stone at Alabama, it might be well for those of us who live in some of the great nothern cities , to ask ourselves in candor how the Negro minority is faring in our own communities." On the subject of politics, Stevenson said that "the Democrats are on their way back to Washington."

The Interstate Commerce Committion granted a six percent increase in freight rates today to most of the nation's railroads. The increase is effective next Wednesday and was granted to meet higher operating costs.

British power and prestige in the Middle East, and that of the Western world in general, has suffered a serious shock. The British General, John Glubb, generally known as Glubb Pasha, had commanded Jordan's armed forces since 1939. Twenty-year-old King Hussein fired him; together with two other ranking British officers of the Arab Legion. He went to the airport of Amman today under guard of sixteen tanks - flew to Cyrrus. Britain created Jordan, a wholly artificial state, after World War I. Glubb created the Arab Legion, and trained it. It consists of about twenty thousand men, the best equipped and disciplined Arab force in the Middle East, although not as good as advertised. It has fought well on occasion at company strength, but it not regarded as very effective in larger units.

Jordan is four-fifths desert, the ramaining fifth poor, flinty soil. The country has been kept alive by subsidies from Britain - about thirty million dollars a year. Since the war with Israel in 1948, half of Jordan's populaionn has consisted of refugees from Palestine. They are bitter, they are nationalistic, and they wanted to get rid of the British whom they regarded as a restraining influence.

In Jordan there has been much admiration for Colonel Nasser's revolution in Egypt. Last winter the British tried to pressure Jordan into joining the Baghdad Defense Alliance, including Turkey, Iraq, Britain, Pakistan and Iran. There were riots, and Glubb Pasha's Legion was used to restore order. This further diminished Glubb's stature as the ham who had been the "uncrowned king of Jordan." There was also the feeling in Jordan that the Legion would operate more effectively and freely against Israel if it were not under the command of a Briton. There are still some sixty British officers serving with the Legion. No one knows what will happen to them, but if they too are dismissed the Legion's capability will be drastically reduced.

The Saudi- Arabians have also been stoking the fires of nationalism in Jordan. My colleague Howard K Smith who was recently in Jordan, cables me that he was told on good authority that the Saudi-Arabians had directly bought twenty-one members of Jordan's forty-man parliament.

Britain still has a treaty with Jordan, under which she guarantees the frontiers of the Arab kingdom. It's supposed to last until 1969. No one knows what will happen to this. The British Cabinet had a long session today, and the foreign Office said the abrupt dismissal of Glubb shocked opinion in Britain and caused concern for the consequences, both internal and external. The British have important bases in Jordan, and these must now be considered in jeopardy.

Glubb's dismissal was no whim of the young King. resulted from no clash of personalities. It reflects the fires of Arab nationalism. It means that the symbol and substances of British power and influence is gone. Britain is no longer sure of Jordan, no longer controls the Arab Legion, and holds still more precariously its lessening power in the Middle East. If this had happened at an hour when the possibility of war involving Israel and its Arab neighbors did not hang loke a cloud over the Middle East deserts, it would still be important news. But in this deepening crisis it must be called ominous. For now the Arab Legion-- the best Arab force in existence - may line up with Egypt ans Syria against Israel. This change in the military balance might cause Israel not to wait for these opposing forces to be knit together. This development will weaken the arguments of those who have counseled restraint, both in Israel and in Arab states.

There are unofficial reports in Cairo that there is shortly to be a "little Summit" meeting of four Arab chiefs of state, Syria, Egypt, Saudi-Arabia and Jordan. Presumably such a meeting would unite in opposing the Baghdad pact, could agree on joint action against Israel, and would certainly discuss methods of replacing the subsidy which Britain has previously granted to Jordan. Egypt and Saudi-Arabia have already agreed to do this.

The tesnion in the Middle East has been mounting for months. Western policy British and American, appears to be paralyzed. Today the tension mounts a little more, just how much more it is too early to tell.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON : COMMERCIAL

MURROW: The dismissal of Glubb Pasha is the product of nationalism. Albert Einstein once called nationalism "an infantile disease, the measles of mankind." And Veblen said, "Born in iniquity and conceived in sin, the spirit of nationalism has never ceased to bend human institutions to the service of dissension and distress."

Good Night and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Tues., March 6, 1956

This is the news:

The text of President Eisenhower's latest note to Soviet Premier Bulganin was released today in Washington. Mr. Eisenhower again rejected Bulganin's proposal for a Soviet-American friendship treaty. ~~But~~ The note was polite, and the President urged Bulganin to join him in making a start on a world disarmament program. Mr. Eisenhower ~~reiterated~~ Repeated his proposal for tying in aerial inspection with the ground inspection plan suggested by the Soviet Union. Under proper safeguards, he said, it should be possible to limit all "major" types of armaments. And he envisioned the day when "all production of fissionable materials, anywhere in the world, will be devoted exclusively to peaceful purposes." Meantime, in the transitional period, the United States would maintain "very extensive" military strength.

My colleague, Dan Schorr, cables from Moscow that he saw Premier Bulganin tonight at a Kremlin reception. Schorr says Bulganin described the President's message as "very interesting... a good letter." Bulganin said he planned to reply soon, and that he hoped the correspondence between him and President Eisenhower "would continue for a long time." He also said he would welcome any opportunity to come to Washington for a talk with the President.

It was announced today that former Premier Malenkov will go to London next month, as head of a delegation of electric power experts. He will also make arrangements for the visit to Britain of Premier Bulganin and Communist Party boss Khrushchev.

Britain imposed new security measures today on the island of Cyprus. Rebel forces retaliated with stepped-up bombing and machine-gun attacks. And the Greek government halted the relaying of British broadcasts by the Athens radio. Last night, the British "jammed" the Athens radio, for broadcasting what they considered to be inflammatory reports.

In Jerusalem, Premier Ben Gurion told the Israeli parliament that Israel will not start a war. "But," he said, "if a war should break out, we will meet it with confidence and strength." Ben Gurion warned that moral responsibility for war, should it come, would rest with Russia and the United States---with Russia, he said, for supplying arms to Egypt, and with the United States for denying arms to Israel. He expressed hope that war could still be prevented. But he felt the chances for prevention are now "somewhat smaller".

→

A motion of "no confidence" in Ben Gurion was defeated by a vote of 66 to 13. The motion was presented by an extremist group, favoring an immediate preventive war.

In Damascus today, Syria accused Israel of maintaining an "unusual" concentration of troops around the Sea of Galilee, and of violating the demilitarized zone between Israel and Syria. And the Israeli foreign office accused Egypt of massing troops inside the Gaza Strip, and the Sinai Peninsula. The foreign office noted "the increasing belligerency" of recent statements by Egyptian Premier Nasser, and what it termed "the growing volume of Egyptian acts of aggression."

In Cairo, the leaders of three Arab countries... Egypt, Syria and Saudi Arabia... began a series of secret talks. And there was speculation they might try to integrate Jordan's Arab Legion into their mutual military program. (Last week, the king of Jordan dismissed the British commander of the legion).

In Washington today, representatives of the United States, Britain and France resumed their talks on how to prevent an Arab-Israeli war. And Canada announced, it was delaying approval of any further arms shipments to the Middle East, until there has been an easing of tension in the area.

The meeting of the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization opened today in Karachi, with speeches by the foreign ministers of the eight member countries. Secretary of State Dulles reaffirmed American support for the independence of Asian and African countries. ~~In contrast,~~ he ~~said, stands the policy of the Reds... "who, whenever they could, have swallowed up their neighbors or subjugated them."~~ Later in a closed session, Dulles warned that the danger of war in Asia has receded, but still exists. The Russians ~~he said,~~ are now employing tactics of economic penetration, and stirring up historic grievances. HE SAID, But there is no evidence that Moscow is actually abandoning force. ~~Dulles said there is still "a need for forces in being, in countries which are subject to the possibility of attack."~~

The rearmament of West Germany was approved today by the lower house of the West German parliament. Fourteen constitutional amendments were passed, enabling the creation of an ~~powerful~~ army, navy and air force, and sent to the Bundesrat... or upper house... for final parliamentary approval. Dick Hottelet cables ~~me that the~~ legislation represents a major departure from German tradition, ~~with~~ the military placed ~~under firm civilian control.~~

Secretary of Defense Wilson told reporters today that the importance of the guided missile has been overemphasized, as a result of the controversy over the missiles program. It is only one weapon, he said, in the over-all defense picture. Wilson revealed that he is thinking of stepping up production of the B-52 intercontinental bomber... and that he has abandoned the idea of cutting the service period of some draftees down to 18 months. Tomorrow, Wilson will fly to Puerto Rico, to join the planning session of the joint chiefs of staff. He plans to return to Washington on Friday.

Edward R. Murrow: March 6, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

Cyprus, whose negotiations with Britain have broken down, might be called the hardest international knot to untie in the world today. It is not remarkable that the negotiations failed; it would have been more remarkable if they had succeeded. They failed for reasons that are not apparent in the account of what the Cypriots wanted, and Britain would not give.

The British are left in a bad light because now they have to proclaim a determination to stamp out terrorism on the island, which means stern police rule. And they have made matters far worse by jamming the Athens radio, so as to stop its propaganda to Cyprus inciting to further struggles to attain union with Greece. But jamming radio stations because of their propaganda is something done by communist dictatorships, and supposedly scorned by democracies. In this country we think it a confession of weakness that the Kremlin jams the Voice of America.

The British have every right to dislike the Athens radio, and they must feel grim over having to substitute police rule in Cyprus for co-operation. But they cannot win sympathy by suppressing ideas while they proceed with the suppression of lawlessness.

~~Actually~~ the British went a long way to meet the immediate desire for self-government in Cyprus. They did it much too late, and they did it after saying that they wouldn't. But the differences over which the negotiations finally failed were minor. Probably the biggest of the three points, was the range of the proposed amnesty. The British refused to pardon anyone who had possessed arms or explosives or committed violence against any person. Archbishop Makarios insisted on the amnesty being general.

Another difference was over reserving the direction of public security to the British governor, "for as long as was thought necessary." And the third was over a pledge the Archbishop wanted ~~XXXXXXXX~~ for defining what would constitute a Greek majority in the proposed assembly, even before a constitution was drafted.

If only a few inches separate negotiators, why doesn't one side or the other move over? The British were promising ultimate self-determination, then why boggle at these three points? The Archbishop had won so much, why couldn't he be content for the time being?

The big reason is that ~~XXX~~ much more was at stake than self-government for Cyprus. The British could not give in on public security, nor could they condone terrorism, so long as Cyprus is the chief base of British power in the Middle East. The Archbishop could not stop now, without endangering his real objective, which is union with Greece. The British cannot relinquish their base on Cyprus or endanger it. And they cannot keep the base there if the island becomes a part of Greece.

But they also cannot give in because of the effect of such a union with Greece on Turkey. Not unless the West is ready to pull out of the Middle East altogether, can it afford to lose both the base in Cyprus, and the friendship of Turkey.

As to the base, it should be recalled that Britain recently gave up its base at Suez and moved it to Cyprus. It did so to mollify Egypt and the Arab world. We did our best to encourage the removal. The Egyptian revolutionaries under Prime Minister Nasser had ordered Britain out. After long negotiations, Foreign Secretary Eden complied. The base was moved to territory that belonged to Britain. Formerly Cyprus had belonged to Turkey, and after taking over its administration in 1878, Britain annexed it in 1914. It hadn't belonged to Greece for centuries. If the British had to get out of Cyprus, they would have no other base available short of Kenya in Africa.

The factor of Turkey is even more important than the British base. A look at the map shows that Cyprus lies a long way from Greece and only sixty miles from Turkey's southern coast. As part of Greece the island would become a Greek dagger held at the heart of Turkey, and Turkey would fight before it would let that come to pass. And if Britain and the United States yielded on giving Cyprus to Greece for ethnic reasons, Turkey would pull out of NATO. Its twenty-two well-trained and well-equipped divisions are the largest single force in the North Atlantic Organization. They outnumber all the divisions of all the other European members. If Turkey were lost to NATO, the Middle East could hardly be kept from falling to Soviet domination.

It is true that the ethnic Greeks on Cyprus number 400,000 as against 100,000 ethnic Turks. But in a power world the ethnic rights of populations cannot always be paramount. In an armed world, political freedom may have to be protected. Archbishop Makarios knows this too, but he is more interested in union with Greece, than in safe self-government. It is hard to believe that he is happy over the risks he now invites. Certainly the British are not happy over the situation. And this country cannot be. The only happiness conceivable over the Cyprus crisis is in the Kremlin. It stands to lose nothing from it, and can imagine more gains in that part of the world than it has dreamed of for centuries.

OLIN JICE

Word for Today

What is happening on the island of Cyprus, is tragedy. No one imagines the solution is force. And representing, as it does, the failure of reason and persuasion, it CONCERNS us. For as John Dewey said, "The measure of civilization is the degree in which the method of cooperative intelligence replaces the method of brute conflict."

Goodnight and good luck!

Wednesday, March 7, 1956

This is the News—

The Defense Department announced today that a reinforced Marine battalion... about 18-hundred men... will be sent to the Mediterranean "in a few days". The announcement said the Marines were being transferred as part of a training program, and would replace a similar battalion withdrawn from the area last May.

In the United Nations, an American spokesman said the United States has consulted its allies on the Middle East crisis... but has no plan for any immediate move in the Security Council.

Israel formally accused Syria today of "wanton acts of aggression." In a letter to the Security Council, Israel charged Syria with committing aggression in firing on Israeli police boats on the Sea of Galilee, and in shooting down an Israeli aircraft flying over its own territory. No request was made for action on the complaint. The Israeli ambassador... Abba Eban... also conferred today with the United Nations secretary general, Dag Hammarskjold.

In Jerusalem, an Israeli spokesman said Egyptian troops opened fire today on an Israeli outpost near the Gaza strip. And Israeli forces returned the fire.

The leaders of Syria, Egypt and Saudi Arabia met for more than four hours today in Cairo, and in the course of their talks, called in their defense ministers and chiefs of staff. The United Press says they decided that diversion of the Jordan River, by Israel, would constitute an act of aggression and bring retaliation by the Arab countries.

The foreign minister of Jordan said today, that his government hopes to maintain friendly relations with Britain. "And the Jordan government," he said, "wishes to retain the services of British officers in the Arab army of Jordan."

King Paul of Greece predicted today, that Cyprus ultimately will win freedom from British rule. The Greek prime minister said Britain failed "to grasp the significance" of the Cyprus question. The free world cannot deal effectively with Communist totalitarianism, he said, if it tries to suppress the ideals of democracy by force."

Vice President Nixon said today: "I have no political comments to make, as far as my own personal situation is concerned." Nixon made the statement to reporters, at the fourth annual Republican Woman's Conference. He told the conference that "things look even better for the Republicans in 1956, than in 1952. In 1956," he said, "we have a record of performance to talk about."

Democratic Senator Sparkman will reply tonight to the nationwide talk President Eisenhower made a week ago, explaining his decision to seek another term. Sparkman will say that the President cannot, for reasons of health, perform all of his duties. The people, he will predict, will not vote for "a part-time President to deal with full-time problems."

In Paris today, the French cabinet authorized Premier Mollet to stake the life of his government on his Algerian policy. The National Assembly will start debating that policy tomorrow. The specific issue will be Mollet's bid for special powers to cope with the worsening situation in Algeria.

Russia has sent a note to Iran, protesting the expulsion of the deputy military attache in Tehran. Iran ordered the Soviet attache expelled on grounds of espionage.

Sweden asked the United States and Norway today, to take steps to prevent unmanned balloons from passing over Swedish territory. Sweden said American balloons... released in Norway... had violated its air space, and that the equipment carried by the balloons had been confiscated.

Today... in Karachi... Pakistan asked the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization for support, in its dispute with India over the future of Kashmir. The Seato meeting was held behind closed doors, and there are conflicting reports whether Pakistan received unqualified backing for its demand for a plebiscite in Kashmir. (India favors direct negotiations). However, it is definite that Pakistan won strong support today in its border dispute with Afghanistan. In that controversy, Afghanistan has Soviet backing. And Secretary of State Dulles denounced what he termed Russia's "evil tactics" in Southeast Asia.

Edward R. Murrow: March 7, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

World and domestic problems of major rank made Washington and London the main news centers today. In Washington, President Eisenhower, in his news conference, discussed the future of Vice President Nixon; promised to get out of the White House if he ~~XX~~ no longer felt able to carry his burdens, called on the United Nations for intensified efforts to assure peace in the Middle East, voiced pleasure in Premier Bulganin's commendation of his disarmament letter, but had no plans to invite him here; expressed the belief that the world now knows that another global war (is unthinkable but that the cold war) would go on a long time and take several different directions, and admitted that at the Summit meeting, Premier Bulganin had said something about approaching moves in the Middle East, giving the impression they were only commercial.

Absent from Mr. Eisenhower's remarks was any promise that would meet the main desire in today's debate in the House of Commons on the Middle East. The British want more effective co-operation with the United States. Mr. Eisenhower was not critical of the British, but he also was of no immediate help to Prime Minister Eden. And the State Department said today that this country would not at present join the Bagdad Pact. Had it said the opposite, it would have been like a lifeline to the Eden government.

Attempts to extract from Mr. Eisenhower an unqualified endorsement of Vice President Nixon for re-nomination failed. The President showed that he was stirred up by a suggestion that he was being urged to dump Nixon. "If anyone" he said after a pause, "ever had the effrontery to come in and urge me to dump somebody, that I respect as I do Vice President Nixon, there will be more commotion around my office than you have noticed yet." He said he had not presumed to tell Mr. Nixon what he should do with his future. "I have told him this" he said, "he should be one of the "comers" in the Republican Party. He is young, vigorous, healthy and certainly deeply informed on the processes of government. And so far as I know he is deeply dedicated to the same principles of government that I am." He said that he had asked Mr. Nixon to chart his own course, and then tell him what he wanted to do. Asked if he would say now that he would favor Mr. Nixon as running mate if the Vice President decided he would like the nomination, Mr. Eisenhower said he "was not going to be pushed into corners, and answer right now at this moment. I do say this," he went on, "I have no criticism of Vice President Nixon to make, either as a man, an associate, or as my running mate on the ticket."

On the health question, Mr. Eisenhower made a promise, after declining to defend himself from the Democratic charge that if elected he would be a "part-time President." He carefully differentiated, he said, between the proper, necessary and constitutional duties of the President, and many other less important aspects of the job. He said there would be no neglect of his duties, but he probably would be less of a host than he had been in the past. But if he felt that he could not carry on his proper, necessary and constitutional duties, he would be out of the White House and not be available. And this, he declared, was a promise. The public has a right to know all about his health. If at any time he feels that he does not have the general organic fitness to perform his duties he will "instantly go to the people with it."

Usually it is Washington that thunders loudly against Soviet maneuvers, and London that prefers to say little. Today thunder came from the Eden government, which was defending itself from Labor demands for a new policy in the Middle East. Anthony Nutting, Minister of State for Foreign Affairs, did not hesitate to hold Soviet policy to blame for the "difficult and troublesome phase" through which he admitted Britain is passing. "A Third Party" he said, "is pouring poison into the wound and doing its best to increase hostility against all we stand for."

He rejected the demand for a new policy. "I hope it will not go out from this House" he said, "that the British Government has neither policy nor position in the Middle East. That would be a completely false picture. Our policy is based on the Bagdad Pact and the tri-partite declaration. We stand by our obligations." As for the Bagdad pact, he said: "We have no intention whatever of abandoning our friends, who have joined in it with us. I want to make it perfectly clear" he repeated, "that we stand firm and four-square by the Bagdad pact." He also wanted to make it clear that the British will stand firm in the Persian Gulf, where it is in an oil dispute with Saudi-Arabia over the Buraimi Oasis. "Let there be no doubt" he said, "that we shall take any steps that are necessary to sustain our position and our friends, the rulers of the Persian Gulf states."

Hugh Gaitskell, for the Labor opposition, ~~urged as a new policy that limited arms sales to Israel while the Arab states - those in the Bagdad Pact included - get no more the[illegible]omic aid.~~ It was the Baghdad pact, ~~he said~~, that had led to the major British set-back. "It is disastrous" he declared, "to try to bring in other Arab states while the United States stays out." He argued that the subsidy to Jordan should stop now that Glubb Pasha has been dismissed. "Otherwise," he said, "it is a very real danger that we find ourselves subsidizing the maintenance of a force - the Arab Legion - which may well go into action against Israel in circumstances in which we have to go to the defense and assistance of Israel. That" he said, "is a wholly contradictory situation."

Mr. Nutting denied that the sales of arms to Egypt had so far upset the balance of arms with Israel. And he rejected the Labor demand for a treaty guaranteeing Israel's frontiers. Such a treaty, he said, would commit Britain to permanent recognition of a frontier which is not an agreed one which has resulted from an armistice and not a peace treaty, and which is bitterly opposed by all the Arab nations. "It would in effect" he said, "be the biggest step we could take away from a peace settlement. We stand ready to guarantee an agreed settlement" he said, "and the United States has taken the same line."

Eden won his vote of confidence with a majority of 60. The vote was along straight Party lines.

Word for Today

We are beset by grave problems. Theodore Roosevelt said, "Though the problems are new, though the tasks set before us are different from the tasks set before our fathers who founded and preserved this Republic, the spirit in which these tasks must be undertaken, if our duty is to be well done, remains essentially unchanged."

Goodnight and good luck!

Edward R. Murrow Thurs., March 8, 1956

This is the news:

The Senate is still in session... driving for a final vote on the farm bill. This afternoon, a Democratic attempt to restore high, rigid price supports on peanuts, corn, cotton and rice, was defeated. The vote was 54 to 41. The Administration favors lower, flexible supports. And the White House says, President Eisenhower is "delighted", that the provision for high supports has been knocked out of the bill. Shortly before the voting started, the Administration offered to support cotton prices "at about 86 or 87 percent of parity." The amendment... to knock out rigid supports... was introduced by Democratic Senator Anderson. Anderson said they would "wreck" the soil-bank program. Whatever legislation the Senate MAY pass tonight, it will have to go back to the House... which voted last year for a return to 90 percent of parity.

Senate action on the farm bill was delayed by a debate over organization of the special committee to investigate improper lobbying practices. Democratic Senator Gore... who would be chairman of the committee... charged that the Republicans were insisting on unworkable rules of procedure. He said the prospective vice chairman... Republican Senator Bridges... wanted a rule that would bar hearings, except by unanimity of both the chairman and vice chairman. And Gore said if it would help to get on with the investigation, he was willing to resign the chairmanship. Bridges replied that his unanimity rule was entirely reasonable.

The Navy insisted today that its decision to send a reinforced battalion of Marines to the Mediterranean had nothing to do with the tense Middle East situation. It repeated it was a routine training operation. B ritain, however, was gratified by the action. And London newspapers gave the story banner headlines.

~~The B ritish Foreign Office confirmed today that Jordan has asked Britain to reconsider its action, recalling 15 British officers now serving in the Jordan army. B ritain ordered the recall when Jordan~~

→

~~fired Glubb Pasha, the British commander of the Arab Legion.~~

The leaders of Syria, Saudi Arabia and Egypt continued their secret talks today in Cairo. An official spokesman said they considered "all aspects" of Arab defense strategy.

Syria charged tonight that Israel touched off the incident last Sunday on the Sea of Galilee... in which four Israeli policemen were killed. Syria made its charge in a letter to the United Nations Security Council. It said an Israeli detachment [redacted] landed on the northeast coast, and [redacted] opened fire on "armed Syrian villagers". Israel already has accused Syria of aggression in the incident. Neither country requested formal United Nations action on their complaints.

The Seato foreign ministers ended their talks today in Karachi. They issued a communique deploring Soviet moves "calculated to increase tension and division in the Asian communities." The communique noted a shift in Soviet tactics, but no "convincing evidence" that Russia has abandoned its efforts to subvert and overthrow other social systems. It ~~supported Pakistan in its border disputes with India~~ and Afghanistan... ~~and proposed setting up a permanent secretariat~~ in Bangkok. ~~An officer will be appointed to "facilitate important work in the economic field."~~ The foreign ministers ~~also~~ recognized the necessity of "creating and maintaining powerful deterrents against aggression." (I should like to discuss this subject further in a few minutes).

~~In Geneva, representatives of the United States and Red China met again today... in a continuation of their talks on the Formosa question. It was their 40th meeting. The United States wants Communist China to renounce the use of force in dealing with the Formosa problem. It also demands the repatriation of Americans still held by the Chinese Reds.~~

Washington announced the appointment today of Lieutenant General Henry Hodes as commander of the United States Army in Europe. The appointment is effective May 31st. Hodes succeeds General McAuliffe, who will retire.

A three-day debate on Algeria opened today in the French National Assembly. And one of the first speakers demanded that the United States and Britain show more support for France in her Algerian policy.

Moscow announced today that the Russian work-week is being cut to 46 hours, effective this week-end. Russian workers have been on a 48-hour week.

The White House said today that President Eisenhower has not delegated any of his constitutional duties to subordinates. The assistant news secretary... Murray Snyder... said the President had made it clear at his last two news conferences that he would be less of a host... but that he certainly would not neglect the constitutional duties of his office. Murray's statement was in answer to charges... made last night by Democratic Senator Sparkman... that Mr. Eisenhower was contemplating "a contraction of the presidency", in order to conserve his strength.

The international union of electrical workers said today that the Government plan for settling the Westinghouse strike is "unacceptable". James Carey... the union president... contended that a clause in the contract proposal would enable the company to cut the wages of 30-thousand employes, as a result of time studies and the shifting of so-called "incentive workers" to set hourly rates. He called for a resumption of negotiations. Westinghouse issued a statement, saying that union leaders would now have to "accept full responsibility for continuation of this disastrous strike." The walkout is in its 20th week.

Edward R. Murrow: March 8, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

The big immediate question of foreign policy - how best to shift emphasis in the cold war from military preparedness to economic and political action - has been stressed but not answered in the past two days. President Eisenhower faced up to it frankly in his news conference yesterday, saying that we had to have as good a campaign as our rivals, and must improve the one we have. And the SEATO ministers, in Karachi, closed their meeting by issuing a long communique that pointed to the need of Southeast Asia for economic aid and a higher standard of living. But they did not outline a new program.

Mr. Eisenhower said yesterday that everyone realizes pretty well that a global war is well-nigh unthinkable, but he was sure the cold war will go on in a different direction and as a broadening contest. May I say that last night I reported Mr. Eisenhower as saying that the global war would go on, instead of the cold war. Sorry -

It is not easy to change SEATO over into an agency with an economic priority. Most of the states in Asia that need economic support don't belong to it, like Japan, India, Burma, South Korea and the new states of former Indochina. But all of these, and the three Asian states in SEATO - Thailand, Pakistan and the Philippines - belong to the Colombo plan, which would be the natural agency to develop, if a new answer is to be given the new Soviet offensive in Asia.

The SEATO ministers were not for playing down the organization's military functions. French Foreign Minister Pineau did say flatly, that the era of Communist aggression was over, and the job now was to devise a policy of co-existence, with the West confronting the Communists through trade and cultural exchanges. But even he, agreed to the communique which recognized, in these words, "the necessity of creating and maintaining powerful deterrents against aggression, lest potential aggressors come to believe that aggression would not be effectively and immediately resisted."

This was in line with President Eisenhower's statement, that no American would want this country to be weaker on the military side. "There always is a threat of a new breakout" he said, "which can be very dangerous, and can be the powder-keg variety.

When SEATO was founded, less than two years ago, Communist China was the potential aggressor most feared. But at Karachi attention turned to the Soviet Union. In their only newsworthy action, the ministers served notice on the Kremlin, that SEATO stands behind Pakistan in defense of its present frontier with Afghanistan. The Kremlin is backing the Afghan campaign for setting up a new state incorporating the Pushtoon tribesmen on both sides of the Pakistan border.

It may strike many that times indeed have changed that we should now be committed to the defense of a frontier from tribesmen in the heart of Asia, whom not one American out of a thousand could even name. However, American action against a Pushtooni aggression, would not have to be military. We have a reservation in the SEATO treaty that limits our own military action to resist aggression by communists. If communists are not the aggressors, all we are bound to do is to consult immediately on measures of common defense.

Secretary Dulles is authoritatively reported to have resisted at first giving the guarantee to the Pakistan-Afghan frontier. That is, he was not the leader in pressing to have public notice served on the Soviet Union. A high American source explained that his reluctance was due to a promise he had made to the Senate, not to increase the area of the 1954 treaty without prior Senate approval. He finally acceded, it is explained, because the Pakistan-Afghan border was the Durand line, which the United States had long ago officially recognized.

But he did this in exchange for another act of moderation, according to this same high source, which was to water down the support SEATO gave Pakistan on the Kashmir issue. It had been confidently reported yesterday, that the ministers would back up Pakistan's insistence on an early plebiscite. This was to be the answer to the Soviet Union's open endorsement of India's right to Kashmir. But when the communique was issued, it was found that the recommendation on the Kashmir question was simply for action through the United Nations, or direct negotiations between Pakistan and India. This mildness is sure to make Mr. Dulles's visit with Prime Minister Nehru more pleasant when it takes place tomorrow.

Mr. Dulles is also reported - by the same high source - to have been moderate in a third matter, the creation of a permanent striking force for SEATO. What he wanted, he is said to have explained, is not a standing army like NATO's, but that the three Asian members, Thailand, Pakistan and the Philippines, build up their own native forces and have them in readiness.

The upshot of the SEATO meeting is that account was taken of the new situation about which President Eisenhower spoke. SEATO's military meaning was not increased, and Mr. Dulles, who has been the drum-beater for military growth, appeared in a quieter role. This does clear the way for a new policy. But neither Mr. Eisenhower nor Mr. Dulles has yet given a hint of what the new program would be. Bob Hite

Word for Today

President Eisenhower and the Seato ministers agree that Russia has changed tactics but not intent. In urging military preparedness, they would agree with William Penn, who said, "Realities govern wise men." But the realities are also economic. As John Steinbeck once wrote, "The line between hunger and anger is thin."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

THURSDAY, MARCH 8, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

The Senate is still in session..driving for a final vote on the farm bill. This afternoon, a Democratic attempt to restore high, rigid price supports on peanuts, corn, cotton and rice was defeated. The vote was 54 to 41. The Administration favors lower, flexible supports. And the White House says President Eisenhower is "delighted" that the provision for high supports has been knocked out of the bill. Shortly before the voting started, the Administration offered to support cotton prices "at about 86 or 87 percent of parity." The amendment..to knock out rigid supports..was introduced by Democratic Senator Anderson. Anderson said they would "wreck" the soil-bank program. Whatever legislation the Senate may pass tonight, it will have to go back to the House..which voted last year for a return to 90 percent of parity.

Senate action on the farm bill was delayed by a debate over organization of the special committee to investigate improper lobbying practices. Democratic Senator Gore..who would be chairman of the committee..charged that the Republicans were insisting on unworkable rules of procedure. He said the prospective vice chairman..Republican Senator Brigess...wanted a rule that would bar hearings, except by unanimity of both the chairman and vice chairman. And Gore said if it would help to get on with the investigation, he was willing to resign the chaimmanship. Bridges replied that his unanimity rule was entirely reasonable.

The Navy insisted today that its decision to send a reinforced battalion of Marines to the Mediterranean had nothing to do with the tense Middle East situation. It reported it was a routine training operation. Britain, however, was gratified b the action. And London newspapers gave the story banner headlines.

The leaders of Syria, Saudi Arabia and Egypt continued their secret talks today in Cairo. An official spokesman said they considered "all aspects" of Arab defense strategy.

Syria charged tonight that Israel touched off the incident last Sunday on the Sea of Galilee..in which four Israeli policemen were killed. Syria made its charge in a letter to the United Nations Security Council. It said an Israeli detachment landed on the northeast coast, and opened fire on "armed Syrian villagers." Israel already has accused Syria of aggression in the incident. Neither country requested formal United Nations action on their complaints.

The Seato foreign ministers ended their talks today in Karachi. They issued a communique deploring Soviet moves "calculated to increase tension and division in the Asian communities." The communique noted a shift in Soviet tactics, but no "convincing evidence" that Russia has abondoned its efforts to subvert and overthrow other social systems. The foreign ministers recognized the necessity of "creating and maintaining powerful deterrents against aggression." (I should like to discuss this subject further in a few minutes.)

Washington announced the appointment today of Lietuenant General Henry Hodes as commander of the United States Army in Europe. The appointment is effective May 31st. Hodes succeeds General McAuliffe, who will retire.

A three-day debate on Algeria opened today in the French National Assembly. And one of the first speakers demanded that the United States and Britain show more support for France in her Algerian policy.

Moscow announced today that the Russian work-week is being cut to 46 hours, effective this week-end. Russian workers have been on a 48-hour week.

The White House said today that President Eisenhower has not selegated any of his constitutional duties to subordinates. The assistant news secretary ..Murray Snyder..said the President had made it clear at his last two news conferences that he would be less of a host..but that he certainly would not neglect the constitutional duties of his office. Murray's statement was in answer to charges..made last night by Democratic Senator Sparkman..that Mr. Eisenhower was contemplating "a contraction of the presidency", in order to conserve his strength.

The international union of electrical workers said today that the Government plan for settling the Westinghouse strike is "unacceptable." James Carey.. the union president..contended that a clause in the contract proposal would enable the company to cut the wages of 30-thousand employes, as a result of time studies and the shifting of so-called "incentive workers" to set hourly rates. He called for a resumption of negotiations. Westinghouse issued a statement, saying that union leaders would now have to "accept full responsibility for continuation of this disastrous strike". The walkout is in its 20th week.

The big immediate question of foreign policy -- how best to shift emphasis in the cold war from military preparedness to economic and political action - has been stressed but not answered in the past two days. President Eisenhower faced up to if frankly in his news conference yesterday, saying that he had to have as good a campaign as our rivals, and must improve the one we have. And the SEATO ministers, in Karachi, closed their meeting by issuing a long communique that pointed to the need of Southeast Asia for economic aid and a higher standard of living. But they did not outline a new program.

Mr. Eisenhower said yesterday that everyone realizes pretty well that a global war is well-nigh unthinkable, but he was sure that a cold war will go on in a different direction and as a broadening contest. May I say that last eight I reported Mr. Eisenhower as saying that the global war would go on, instead of the cold war. Sorry-

It is not easy to change SEATO over into an agency with an economic priority. Most of the states in Asia that need economic support don't belong to it, like Japan, India, Burma, South Korea and the new states of former Indochina. But all of these, and the three Aisan states in SEATO - Thailand, Pakistan and the Philippines - belong to the Colombo plan, which would be the natural agency to develop, if a new answer is to be given the new Soviet offensive in Asia.

The SEATO ministers were not for playing down the organization's military functions. French Foreign Minister Pineau did say flatly that the era of Communist aggression was over, and the job now was to devise a policy of coexistence, whih the West confronting the Communists through trade and cultural exchanges. But even he agreed to the communique which recognized, in these words, "the necessity of creating and maintaining powerful deterrents against aggression, lest potential aggrosors come to believ that aggression would not be effectively and immediately resisted. "

This was in line with President Eisenhower's statement that no American would want this country to be weaker on the military side. "There always is a threat of a new breakout" he said, which can be very dangerous, and can be the powder-keg variety.

When SEATO was founded less than two years ago, Communist China was the potential aggressor most feared. But at Karachi attention turned to the Soviet Union. In their only newsworthy action the ministers served notice on the Kremlin that SEATO stands behind Pakistan in defense of its present frontier with Afghanistan. The Kremlin is backing the Afghan compaign for setting up a new state incorporating the Pushtoon tribesmen on both sides of the Pakistan border.

It may strike many that times indeed have changed that we should now be committed to the defense of a frontier from tribesmen in the heart of Asia, whom not one American out of a thousand could even name. However, American action against a Pushtooni aggression, would not have to be military. We have a reservation in the SEATO treaty that limits our own military action to resist aggression by communists. If the communists are not the aggressors, all we are bound to do is to consult immediately on measures of common defense.

Secretary Dulles is authoritatively reported to have resisted at first giving the guarnantee to the Pakistan- Afghan . . That is, he was not the leader in pressing to have public notice served on the Soviet Union. A high American source explained that his reluctance was due to a promise he had made to the Senate, not to increase the area of the 1954 treaty without prior Senate approval. He finally acceded, it is explained, because the Pakistan-Afghan border was the Durand line, which the United States had long ago officially recognized.

But he did this in exchange for another act of moderation according to this same high source, which was to water down the support SFATO gave Pakistan on the Kashmir issue. It had been confidently reported yesterday, that the ministers would back up Pakistan's insistence on th early plebiscite. This was to be the answer to the Soviet Union's open endorsement of India's right to Kashmir. But when the communique was issued, it was found that the recommendation on the Kashmir question was simply for action through the United Nations, or direct negotiations between Pakistan and India. This mildness is sure to make Mr. Dulles's visit with Prime Minister Nehru more pleasant when it takes place tomorrow.

Mr. Dulles is also reported - by the same high source - to have been moderate in a third matter, the creation of a permanent striking force for SEATO. What he wanted, he said to have explained, is not a standing army like NATO's, but that the three Asian members, Thailand, Pakistan and the Philippines, build up their own native forces and have them in readiness.

The upshot of the SEATO meeting is that account was taken of the new situation about which President Eisenhower spoke. SEATO's military meaning was not increased, and Mr. Dulles, who has been the drum-beater for military growth, appeared in a quieter role. This does clear the way for a new policy. But neither Mr. Eisenhower nor Mr. Dulles has yet given a hint of what the new program would be.

This is Ed. Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Hite.

HITE: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: Preisent Eisenhower and the Seato ministers agree that Russia has changed tactics butnot intent. In urging military preparedness, they would agree with William Penn, who said, "Realities govern wise men." But the realities are also economic. As John Steinbeck once wrote, "The line between hunger and anger is thin."

Good Night ant Good Luck!

Edward R. Murrow Fri., March 9, 1956

This is the news:

The British have banished Archbishop Makários from the island of Cyprus. /Makários is leader of the "union-with-Greece" movement./ The British governor.. . Sir John Harding... said the action had been taken under emergency conditions, "in the interest of promoting peace, order and good government." /The governor said Makários was "so far committed to the use of violence, that he either cannot, or will not, abandon it." /The archbishop was taken into custody as he was preparing to board an airplane for Athens, and transferred to an R.A.F. Hastings bomber, which immediately took off for an undisclosed destination. /A bishop and two priests also were deported.

In Athens, thousands of students paraded through the streets, shouting anti-British slogans... and the government sent riot squads to guard the British embassy. Other demonstrations were staged in front of the American and British consulates in Salonika./ Windows of the American consulate were smashed. But a delegation of students later called at the consulate, and apologized. In London, Labour members of Parliament, said they would demand an explanation of the deportation order, when the House of Commons meets ~~again~~ on Monday. And at the United Nations, the Greek ambassador said the British action showed "how right Greece was" last year, in asking the U.N. to take up the Cyprus question. He called the banishing of Makários "a blow to the free world."

In Paris today, a mob of Algerian workers marched on the National Assembly, as it was debating French policy toward Algeria. / As the mob advanced, it smashed store windows and shouted, "On to the Assembly!" One Algerian woman carried the red and green rebel flag, ~~attached to the handle of a broom.~~ Most of the demonstrators were stopped by riot police, short of the Assembly. / At least 700 were arrested. Two hundred knives were confiscated.

From Algeria, word came of a new series of farm massacres. / A hundred persons were reported killed in the guerrilla war, in the last 48 hours. Seventy-five Algerian riflemen deserted. In Tunis, a mob of French settlers broke into the American consulate... and into the office of the United States Information Service... but no one in the buildings was harmed. (Many Frenchmen in North Africa feel that the United States favors the Arab nationalist cause).

The Syrian prime minister flew to Jordan today, for a quick consultation with Jordan leaders. He reportedly asked Jordan to accept Arab subsidies to replace the 30-million dollars a year Britain has been giving Jordan.

In Washington, the Israeli ambassador called at the State Department... and asked for clarification of a recent remark by President Eisenhower. The remark (made by Mr. Eisenhower at his Wednesday news conference) was that peace in the Middle East cannot be assured "merely by rushing some arms to Israel." The ambassador said he renewed the request by Israel for American arms, to off-set Communist arms shipments to Egypt.

Secretary of State Dulles arrived in New Delhi today for talks with India's Prime Minister Nehru. Reports from New Delhi say that economic aid to India will be discussed.

It was announced today that Soviet Premier Bulganin... and Communist Party Boss Khrushchev... will arrive in England on April 18th, for a visit of 10 days. That's two days longer than originally planned.

In Washington, Secretary of Defense Wilson said today that the joint chiefs of staff have made a "realistic appraisal" of national defense. Wilson made the statement on his return from Puerto Rico, where the joint chiefs have been making a general review of America's long-range defense problems.

The Senate has gone into another night session, in its series of votes on amendments to the farm bill. Hope of final passage this week has been abandoned. Today, the Senate approved a Republican plan, increasing the corn acreage this year to 51-million acres. Last year, it was 43-million acres.

Harold Stassen told a Senate committee today that the 1954 agreement... relaxing controls on trade with Communist countries... was "to the net advantage of the United States." Senator McClellan challenged the accuracy of this statement. And Secretary of Commerce Weeks explained that it was a question of relaxing the controls, or having no controls at all. Both cabinet members again refused to give the committee a list of items on which export controls were relaxed.

The special Senate committee... named to look into lobbying practices... remained deadlocked today over rules of procedure. Because of this, Democratic Senator Neuberger suggested that the Senate stop trying to investigate itself and turn the job over to a special commission, made up of people who are not members of Congress.

Secretary of the Interior McKay said today... in Portland, Oregon... that he will seek the Republican nomination for the United States Senate. If he wins the nomination, McKay will try for the seat held by Democratic Senator Wayne Morse. The White House released a statement by President Eisemhower... praising McKay's decision. At the same time, the President said he had been "a tremendous asset in the cabinet", and would be missed.

Edward R. Murrow: March 9, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

Washington these days is in the thrall of the Nixon mystery. It is feverishly debating what President Eisenhower really meant by his statements about Mr. Nixon as candidate for a second term. In his news conference a week ago Wednesday, the President ~~omitted any reference whatever to~~ volunteered no comment about Mr. Nixon. But the Vice President was promptly put into a good and clear light, by a "high source" telling Bill Lawrence of the New York Times that Nixon could count on the President's support, if he wanted the nomination. That still seems to be the case.

But the situation has radically changed. The light for Nixon is no longer good and clear. There is a confusing, and perhaps fateful, play of shadows. On Wednesday Mr. Eisenhower declined to commit himself to support Mr. Nixon, even if he decided he wanted re-nomination. That threw one shadow. Another fell when the President disclosed that he had told Mr. Nixon to "chart his own course." Once more a high source spoke ~~originally~~ Like an oracle to Bill Lawrence. He said: "Dick probably would be ~~[illegible]~~ re-nominated if he insists on it." But Mr. Nixon's friends, at any rate were not reassured. Mr. Lawrence reports that they are complaining that the Vice President has been put in the position where he, rather than the President, must take the initiative about seeking re-nomination. Mr. Nixon has been advised - though not by the President himself - that it would promote his chances to become President, if he accepted a cabinet post, instead of another term as Vice President. He has been told that no man ever had two terms as Vice President and then had been elected President. That really doesn't mean much. For no man since Buchanan has been elected President after serving only one term as Vice President.

But now if Mr. Nixon wants to be President, he must choose whether to insist on the Vice Presidency as his best road to the White House, or wait till 1960 or later. If he insists - which he is in a position to do - he probably would find himself in an awkward position. Many would think that he was gambling on the President's health, even though he quite honestly disclaimed any such motive. So he has to decide if it would help him, and the ticket, if he could be represented as having doubts about the President's ability to survive a second term.

Roscoe Drummond, after analyzing what the President said Wednesday, writes in the New York Herald Tribune today that right now Mr. Nixon is farther from re-nomination than he has been since 1952. And he bases this on two reasons he ascribes to the President for not accepting Mr. Nixon right away. The President, he says, wants the question left open "so that he and the convention can have more knowledge of Mr. Nixon's popularity with voters - or lack of it - before a final decision is made." The other reason is that the President recognizes that he would have to retire from the race if his health failed, and does not want to be committed to Mr. Nixon for president, simply because he was committed to him for vice president.

If Nixon is not on the ticket, the consequences will be serious for Mr. Eisenhower, warns David Lawrence, also in today's Herald Tribune. "As of today" he writes, "the chances of re-election for Mr. Eisenhower are probably only fifty-fifty, which is not too comfortable an outlook, especially with the many adverse breaks in politics that can come in the field of economic and international affairs between now and November." He rates this week's news conference as even more important than last week's because, he says, it raised the distinct possibility that the President might be beaten by a split in the Republican Party. He believes the abandonment of Mr. Nixon would be interpreted as a move hostile to the Taft wing of the Republican Party. He is sure the President's friends have over-estimated his strength. In 1952, he says, Eisenhower carried some states by close margins, due to the efforts of the Taft wing led by Taft himself. "There will be no such force of harmony to pull the party together, if it splits over the Nixon issue" he predicts.

When President Eisenhower, in his news conference, said that he had told Mr. Nixon he was "a comer" and emphasized his youth, he seemed to imply that Mr. Nixon, though a comer, had not yet arrived. / And when he told him he was to "chart his own course," he served notice on him not to expect to be pressed by the President to run again. / The two statements may add up to the quite simple conclusion that Mr. Eisenhower, being aware that he himself is an older man in this election year, judges that the Vice Presidential candidate should have more maturity than Mr. Nixon.

It still is true that Mr. Nixon is in a position to insist on a place on the ticket, and if he does, his strength with the party organization and the Taft wing presumably would deter President Eisenhower from making an open issue of it. But if Mr. Nixon succeeded, he would be very much less of an asset to the ticket than if this week's discussion had never taken place. And if it doesn't happen, and the Republicans nominate someone else, they will be saying that they know, and know the public knows, that Mr. Eisenhower is more of a risk now than in 1952. Mr. Nixon has a problem and so does his Party.

Word for Today

A few days before President Eisenhower made his decision, Mr. Nixon quoted Benjamin Franklin as saying: "I shall never ask, never refuse, or never resign an office." But in politics, phrases are deceptive. Ovid recognized this. "There is nothing in words," he said. "Believe what is before your eyes."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

FRIDAY, MARCH 9, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

The British have banished Archbishop Makarios from the island of Cyprus. Makarios is leader of the "union-with-Greece" movement. The British governor.. Sir John Harding..said the action had been taken under emergency conditions "in the interest of promoting peace, order and good government." The governor said Makarios was "so far committed to the use of violence that he either cannot, or will not, abandon it." The archbishop was taken into custody as he was preparing to board an airplane for Athens and transferred to the R.A.F. Hastings bomber, which immediately took off for an undisclosed destination. A bishop and two priests also were deported.

In Athens, thousands of students paraded through the streets, shouting anti-British slogans..and the government sent riot squads to guard the British embassy Other demonstrations were staged in front of the American and British consulates in Salonika. Windows of the American consulate were smashed. But a delegation of students later called at the consulate and apologized. In London, Labour members of Parliament said they would demand an explanation of the deportation order, when the House of Commons meets on Monday. And at the United Nations, the Greek ambassador waid the British action showed "how right Greece was" last year in asking the United Nations to take up the Cyprus question. He called the banhshing of Makarios "a blow to the free world."

In Paris today, a mob of Algerian workers marched on the National Assembly as it was debating French policy toward Algeria. As the mob advanced, it smashed store windows and shouted "On the the Assembly!" One Algerian woman carried the red and green rebel flag. Most of the demonstrators were stopped by riot police, short of the Assebmly. At least 700 were arrested. Two hundred knives were confiscated.

From Algeria, word came of a new series of farm massacres. A hundred persons were reported killed in the guerilla war in the last 48 hours. Seventy-five Algerian riflemen deserted. In Tunis, a mob of French settlers broke into the American consulate..and into the office of the United States information Service..but no one in the buildings was harmed. (Many Frenchmen in North Africa feel that the United States favors the Arab nationalist cause.)

The Syrian prime minister flew to Jordan today, for a quick consultation with Jordan leaders. He reportedly asked Jordan to accept Arab subsidies to replace the 30-million dollars a year Britain has been giving Jordan.

In Washington, the Israeli ambassador called at the State Department...and asked for clarification of a recent remark by President Eisenhower. The Remark (made by Mr. Eisenhower at his Wednesday news conference) was that peace in the Middle East cannot be assured "merely by rushing some arms to Israel." The ambassador said he renewed the request by Israel for Americans arms, to offset Communist arms shipments to Egypt.

Secretary of State Dulles arrived in New Delhi today for talks with India's Prime Minister Nehru. Reports from New Delhi say that economic aid to India will be discussed.

It was announced today that Soviet Premier Bulganin..and Communist Party Boss Khrushchev ..will arrive in England on April 18th for a visit of 10 days. That's two days longer than originally planned.

In Washington, Secretary of Defense Wilson said today that the joint Chiefs of staff have made a "realistic appraisal" of national defense. Wilson made the statement on his return from Puerto Rico, where the joint chifs have been making a general review of America's long-range defense problem..

The Senate has gone into another night session, in its series of votes on amendments to the farm bill. Hope of final passage this week has been abandoned. Today, the Senate approved a Republican plan incraasing the corn acreage this year to 51-million acres. Last year, it was 43-million acres.

The special Senate committee..named to look into lobbying practices.. remained deadlocked today over rules of procedure. Because of this, Democratic Senator Neuberber suggested that the Senate stop trying to investigate itself and turn the job over to a special commission, made up of people who are not members of Congress.

Secretary of the Interior McKay said today..in Portland, Oregon... that he will seek the Republican nomination for the United States Senate. If he wins the nomination, McKay will try for the seat held by Democratic Senator Wayne Morse. The White House released a statement by President Eisenhower... praising McKay's decision. At the same time, the President said he had been a "tremendous asset in the cabinet", and would be missed.

Washington these days in in the thrall of the Nixon mystery. It is feverishly debating what President Eisenhower really meant by his statements about Mr. Nixon. as candidate for a second term. In his news conference a week ago, Wednesday, the President volunteered no comment about Mr. Nixnn. But the Vice President was promptly put into a good and clear light, by a "high source" telling Bill Lawrence of the New York Times, that Nixon could count on the President's support, if he wanted the nomination. That still seems to be the case.

But the situation has radically changed. The light for Nixon is no longer good and clear. There is a confusing, and perhaps fateful, play of shadows. On Wednesday Mr. Eisenhower declined to commit himself to support Mr. Nixon even if he decided he wanted re-nomination. That threw one shadow. Another fell when the President disclosed that he had told Mr. Nixon to "chart his own course". Once more a high source spoke like an oracle to Bill Lawrence. He said: "Dick probably would be re-nominated if he insists on it." But Mr. Nixon's friends, at any rate were not reassured. Mr. Lawrence reports that they are complaining that the Vice President has been put in the position where he, rather than the President, must take the initiative about seeking re-nomination. Mr. Nixon has been advised - though not by the President himself - that it would promote his chances to become President, if he accepted a cabinet post, instead of another term as Vice President. He has been told that no man ever had two terms as Vice Presedent and then had been elected President. That really doesn't mean much. For no man since Buchanan has been elected President after serving only one term as Vice President.

But now if Mr. Nixon wants to be President, he must choose whether to insist on the Vice Presidency as his best road to the White House, or wait till 1960 or later. If he insists - which he is in a position to do - he probably would find himself in an awkward position. Many would think that he was gambling of the President's health, even though he quite honestly disclaimed any such motive. So he has to decide if it would help him, and the ticket, if he could be represented as having doubts about the President's ability to survive a second term.

Roscoe Drummond, after analyzing what the President said Wednesday, writes in the New York Herald Tribune today that right now Mr. Nixon is farther from re-nomination that he has been since 1952. And he bases this on two reasons he ascribes to the President, for not accepting Mr. Nixonright away. The President, he says, wants the question left open "so that he and the convention can have more knowledge of Mr. Nixon's popularity with voters - or lack of it - before a final decision is made." The other reason is that the President recognizes that he would have to retire from the race is his health failed, and does not want to be committed to Mr. Nixon for president, simply because he was committed to him for vice president.

If Nixon is not on the ticket, the consequesces will be serious for Mr. Eisenhower, warns David Lawrence, also in today's Herald Tribune. As of today", he writes, "the chances of re-election for Mr. Eisenhower are probably only fifty-fifty, which is not too comfortable an outlook, especially with the many adverse breaks in politics that can come in the field of economic and international affairs between now and November." He rates this week's news conference as even more important than last week's because, he says, it raised the distinct possibility that the President might be beaten by a split in the Republican Party. He believes the abandonment of Mr. Nixon would be interpreted as a move hostile to the Taft wing of the Republican Party. He is sure the President's friends have over-estimated his strength. In 1952, he says, Eisenhower carried some states by close margins, due to the efforts of the Taft wing led by Taft himself. "There will be no such force of harmony to pull the party together, if it splits over the Nixon issue" he predicts.

When President Eisenhower, in his news conference, said that he had told Mr. Nixon he was "a comer" and emphasized his youth, he seemed to imply that Mr..Nixon, though a comer, had not yet arrived. And when he told him he was to "chart his own course", he served notice on him not to expect to be pressed by the President to run again. The two statements may add up to the quite simple conclusion that Mr. Eisenhower, being aware that he himself is an older man in this election year, judges that the Vice Presidential candidate should have more maturity than Mr. Nixon.

It still is sure that Mr. Nixon is in a position to insist on a placeo on the ticket, and if he does, his strength with the party organization and the Taft wing presumably would deter President Eisenhower from making an open issue of it. But if Mr. Nixon succeeded, he would be very much less of an asset to the ticket than if this week's discussion had never taken place. And if it doesn't happen, and the Republicans nominate someone else, they will be saying that they know, and know the public knows, that Mr. Eisenhower is more of a risk now than in 1952. Mr. Nixon has a problem and so does his Party.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: A few days before President Eisenhower made his decision, Mr. Nixon quoted Benjamin Franklin as saying: "I shall never ask, never refuse, or never resign an office." But in politics, phrases are deceptive. Ovid recognized this. "There is nothing in words," he said. "Believe ihat is before your eyes."

Goodnight and Goodluck."

Edward R. Murrow Mon., March 12, 1956

This is the news:

Greece will ask the United States... formally... to intervene in the Cyprus dispute. The Greek government announced tonight that it has instructed its ambassador in Washington, to draw the attention of the State Department "to the serious dangers that have been created."

Earlier, a State Department spokesman said the United States expects to make "certain recommendations" in the dispute between Britain and Greece, after studying all aspects of the question. The Greek charge d'affairs called at the State Department and said any further negotiation between the Cypriots and Britain is unthinkable, as long as Archbishop Makarios remains in exile.

In London, the colonial secretary... Alan Lennox-Boyd... underwent questioning today in the British House of Commons. He said the decision of the governor of Cyprus... to remove Makarios... had the entire approval of the government. Full debate on [redacted]

Wed[redacted]

Life on Cyprus was paralyzed today by a general strike. And there were more bombings.

The leaders of Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Syria, ended their secret talks today in Cairo. They issued a communique, proclaiming agreement on joint strategy for meeting any possible [redacted] Israeli aggression. They also attacked the Baghdad Pact, and declared themselves strictly neutral in the Cold War. The three Arab leaders also denounced French policy in North Africa, calling it a menace to peace.

In Paris, the National Assembly today gave four votes of confidence to the government of Guy Mollet. [redacted] The four parts of Mollet's program for Algeria were approved [redacted] separately... by wide margins... and then approved as a whole. The final vote was 455 to 76. The program calls for military, [redacted] economic [redacted] and administrative reforms. But Algeria would remain a part of France.

Premier Mollet says that Britain and France will present a new joint plan for world disarmament, "within a few days". He expressed hope it would have "the complete support of the United States Government."

The Supreme Court ruled today that state universities may not delay admitting qualified graduate students who are negroes. The court ruled in the case of Virgil Hawkins, a Negro who... for seven years... has been seeking admission to the University of Florida law school. The state offered to send him to a Negro law school in Florida, or pay his tuition at a school outside the state. The Supreme Court said Hawkins was "entitled to prompt admission under the rules and regulations applicable to other qualified candidates." It said its 1954 decision, banning segregation in the public schools, did not mean to imply there could be delay in admitting students to graduate schools.

A manifesto against the Supreme Court decision of 1954 was presented to Congress today... and set off a heated debate. The statement is signed by 19 senators and 77 representatives from eleven Southern states, and calls for reversal of the decision "by all lawful means." It accuses the court of abusing its judicial power. Senator Morse of Oregon attacked the manifesto, saying those who favor the doctrine of interposition want to put themselves "above the Constitution". A historic debate will have to take place, he said, "because this Congress is going to have to determine whether it will back up the Supreme Court." Senator George of Georgia said the manifesto represented a carefully considered action, taken because of the "increasing gravity of the situation." Senator Thurmond of South Carolina said: "We are free morally and legally to oppose the decision; we must fight it to the end."

→

The University of Alabama took disciplinary action today against students it said were involved in the rioting against Autherine Lucy, its first Negro student. The university expelled Leonard Wilson, a sophomore who was leader of a White Citizens Council, suspended four students, and meted out lesser punishment against 20 others. ~~The university said it not only considered Wilson's in connection with the campus disturbances, but also his "public attacks" on the integrity of university officials. Wilson had charged the faculty investigation of the riot "a witch hunt".~~

actions

Henry Ford the Second today said he personally approved the solicitation of Ford dealers for the Eisenhower campaign in 1952. Ford testified before a Senate committee. He said no pressure had been applied and that, as far as he knew, there had been no "reprisals or recriminations" against dealers who refused to contribute.

Democratic Senator Kefauver campaigned ~~in New Hampshire today~~, in preparation for tomorrow's presidential primary. Kefauver will be opposed by Adlai Stevenson, ~~making it the first test of strength~~ between the two candidates. On the Republican side, President Eisenhower is virtually unopposed. ~~Seven delegate candidates are running as~~ favorable to Senator Knowland. ~~But they entered before Mr. Eisenhower~~ announced his decision ~~to seek another term~~.

Former President and Mrs. Truman today announced that Margaret Truman will be married in April to Clifton Daniel of the New York Times. Miss Truman said the wedding will take place in the Episcopal church in Independence, where she once sang in the choir.

The Senate continued voting on amendments to the farm bill. Tonight, it approved an amendment that would place an annual ceiling of 100-thousand dollars on the payments [redacted] any one person could receive under the price support program. The amendment would also limit to 25-thousand dollars, the payments a farmer could receive for [redacted] setting aside land in reserve, under the soil bank program.

Murrow: I have in the studio with me tonight a notable figure in the conflict over race segregation. His being here, [redacted], is a reminder that segregation is a world question. He is the Rev. Trevor Huddleston, now on his way to England after having been the most prominent churchman and educator in South Africa opposed to the segregation policies of the Nationalist government under Prime Minister Strydom. He closed his mission school for negroes in the overcrowded slum city of Sophiatown rather than carry through the limiting rules set by the government.

Tell me, Father Huddleston, ~~have they bulldozed evacuated the negroes from Sophiatown, to build the white men's city there, and what has happened to the negroes?~~ and started to what is the Status of Education for Natives in S.A.

Huddleston answers

Murrow: What is happening to the other schools for negroes in South Africa?

Father Huddleston

Murrow: Alex Kendrick, who was in South Africa for CBS-- I think he attended your final church service in Sophiatown--~~xxxxxxxxx~~ reported on the legislature approving the Strydom program depriving the Supreme Court of equal power. And he thought it quite possible that the opposition now will go into revival of the Torch-commandos that organized ~~the~~ violent resistance to the nationalists a few years ago. Do you think this is ~~possible~~ coming?

~~direct action in the fight against the government. He even foresaw the~~ Possibility

Father Huddleston.

Murrow: Do the Strydom people follow the resistance to ~~segregation~~ integration in this country and take comfort or inspiration from it?

Father H.

Murrow: Would you care to comment on your recall to England? We know that ~~after~~ when the Archbishop of Canterbury visited South Africa a year ago he warned against too great haste in pressing de-segregation. You then criticized this statement, I believe, as lulling Christians to apathy. Do you think this public criticism is linked up with your recall?

Father H.

~~How important~~

Murrow: How important is it, in your opinion, for the British Commonwealth to keep South Africa as member? How important do you think it is to the present British government? How much of a price for it would ~~be~~ you be ready to see paid in silence on, or indifference to, the Nationalist's Apartheid policy?

How much resistance is there among the whites to the policies of the present government....

What of the future...is collision and violence inevitable....

Role -
Rest of the world -

Word for Today

In talking with Father Huddleston, I was reminded of Bernard Shaw's line, "We are fighting our sins, as practiced by the enemy." And none of us lives in isolation. What we do, and say, affects democracy everywhere. Socrates said, "I am a citizen, not of Athens or Greece, but of the world."

Goodnight and good luck!

CBS RADIO DIVISION

EDWARD R. MURROW

Monday, March 12, 1956
7:45-8:00 p.m.

MURROW: ..... I have in the studio with me tonight a notable figure in the conflict over race segregation. His being here is a reminder that segregation is a world question. He is the Reverend Trevor Huddleston, now on his way to England after having been the most prominent churchman and educator in South Africa, opposed to the segregation policies of the nationalist government. He closed his mission school for Negroes in the over-crowded slum city of Sofiatown (?) rather than carry through the limiting rules set by the government.

Tell me, Father Huddleston, what is the status of education for natives in South Africa now?

HUDDLESTON Well, since the passing of an act, known as the Bantu Education Act, a few months ago the Bureau of Mission Schools, that is, church schools, in South Africa has come to an end, a very historic period, really, because the whole burden of native education, Negro education you call it here, fell on the shoulders of the church until the passing of this Act. Now, there are, virtually speaking, no mission schools or church schools left. The Roman Catholic Church, to its great honor, has raised a million pounds to try and retain its some seven hundred schools as private schools, but a million pounds doesn't go very far, of course. The effect of the Act, is, I think, the most far-reaching thing that has happened in South Africa because it means that in future there are two kinds of education in that country, that is, education as we understand it, western, Christian education for the white population, and there is what we know as Bantu, or native education, for the Africans, something which will gear them into an existing society which has as its aim, as I'm sure you realize, the preservation of racial superiority on the part of the white group and that's why we, the Church in the diocese of Jphannesburg, from which I came, opposed it so strongly that we felt the only way to show our active-(?) opposition to this thing was to close our schools sooner than to accept a form of education which we believed, and I personally believe with all my heart, to be basically unchristian and a denial of the fundamental rights of man.

MURROW: This means that the Bantu receives some education, but strictly limited, is that it?

HUDDLESTON: That is the point. The Bantu, the native, will receive education in these schools, but the limitation is the limitation which is imposed upon the Bantu Race for being Bantu.

MURROW: Well, Father Huddleston, what about the possibility of a revival of the "torch commando," the people who organized active resistance to the nationalist government?

HUDDLESTON: I'm afraid I'm not awfully optimistic about that. I was in on the begining of the "torch commando," in fact I was asked to bless the first "torch commando" that left Johannesburg and I saw it from the beginning to the end. My own honest feeling is that opposition to government policies in South Africa today is at a low ebb and I saw no indication of any sort of major revival of that kind. As you may know, it's the women, the Black Sashes, they are called, who've done most to voice disapproval, but, of course, things may conceivably change. I wouldn't like to prophesy, but I'm not awfully hopeful.

MURROW: Is there much interest in South Africa in our discussions over segregation?

HUDDLESTON: Certainly! They began to hit the headlines just before I left the country and, naturally, what is happening in the south here is something of intense interest both to the Government and to the African people. It was a little ... a little depressing, of course, in some ways to me to hear some of the comments of my own school children, although they weren't awfully well informed.

MURROW: Well, Father Huddleston, how much opposition is there amongst the whites in South Africa to the present policy?

HUDDLESTON: Well, there is a great deal of opposition on the part of the whites to this constitutional crisis, which has arisen in South Africa. It's a very complicated business which I don't want to go into.

MURROW: Yes.

HUDDLESTON: But I'm afraid, quite frankly, that the whites in South Africa are basically united with regard to the racial issues confronting the country and that as soon as those come to a head there is ... there is union, and that's why the opposition is so ineffective on other matters.

MURROW: Well, Sir, what of the future? Is violence and collision inevitable?

HUDDLESTON: Well, I wouldn't like to say it's inevitable. As a Christian one has to hope rather above the human level but the way things are going violence could most easily happen and the gulf between the white and the Black Races is widening so rapidly, it is so incredibly difficult today in South Africa to keep contact with African leadership, that one must fear, I'm afraid that that is the logical consequence of events.

MURROW: Well, South Africa is a large but far-away country of which most of us know little. How do you see the role of the rest of the world in relation to this conflict that is going on in South Africa?

HUDDLESTON: Well, I think that I've seen increasingly that the Christian conscience of the world simply must wake up to the situation in South Africa, that it isn't a local issue and the churches in South Africa are not capable, in my view, and I've been criticized for this in dealing with the thing on the whole; we need the Christian conscience of the world behind us to awake to the seriousness and to the implications of what's going on in that country and that's my greatest hope. Whether, of course, even the Christian conscience of the world can bring to bear in time upon the authorities in South Africa sufficient pressure to create an alteration in their ... in their attitudes is another matter, but my ... my feeling as a Christian Priest is that it is my duty to try and bring home to the rest of the Christian world what is going on there and to hope anyhow that something may ... may happen under God.

MURROW: Thank you very much, Father Trevor Huddleston.

Ed.trans.-A.A.Cardiff (30)

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

MONDAY, MARCH 12, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

Greece will ask the United States..formally... to intervene in the Cyprus dispute. The Greek government announced tonight that it has instructed its ambassador in Washington, to draw the attention of the State Department "to the serious dangers that have been created."

Earlier, a State Department spokesman said the United States expects to make "certain recommendations" in the dispute between Britain and Greece, after studying all aspects of the question. The Greek charge d'affairs called at the State Department and said any further negotiation between the Cypriots and Britain is unthinkable, as long as Archbishop Makarios reamins in exile. In London, the colonial secretary...Alan Lennox-Boyd..underwent questioning today in the British House of Commons. He said the decision of the governor of Cyprus..to remove Makarios..had the entire approval of the government.

Life on Cyprus was paralyzed today by a general strike. And there were more bombings.

The leaders of Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Syria ended their secret talks today in Cairo. They issued a communique, proclaiming agreement on joint strategy for meeting any possible Israeli aggression. They also attacked the Baghdad Pact, and declared themselves strictly neautral in the Cold War. The three Arab leaders also denounced French policy in North Africa, calling it a menace to peace.

In Paris, the National Assembly today gave four votes of confidence to the government of Guy Mollet. The four parts of Mollet's program for Algeria were approved separately..by wide margins..and then approved as a whole . The final vote was 455 to 76. The program calls for military, economic a d administrative reforms. But Algeria would remain a part of France.

Premier Mollet says that Britain and France will present a new joint plan for world disarmament "within a few days." He expressed hope it would have "the complete support of the United States Government."

The Supreme Court ruled today that state universities may not delay admitting qualified graduate students who are negroes. The court ruled in the case of Virgil Hawkins, a Negro who...for seven years..has been seeking admission to the University of Florida law achool. The state offered to send him to a Negro law school in Florida, or pay his tuition at a school outside the state. The Supreme Court said Hawkins was "entitled to prompt admission under the rules and regulations applicable to other qualified candidates." It said its 1954 decision, banning segregation in the public schools, did not mean to imply there could be delay in admitting students to graduate schools.

A manifesto against the Supreme Court decision of 1954 was presented to Congress today..and set off a heated debate. The statement is signed by 19 senators and 67 representatives from eleven Southern states, and calls for reversal of the decision "by all lawful means." It accuses the court of abusing its judicial power. Senator Morse of Oregon attacked the manifesto, saying those who favor the doctrine of interposition want to put themselves "above the Constitution". A historic debate will have to take place, he said, "because this Congress is going to have to determine whether it will back up the Supreme Court." Senator George of Georgia said the manifesto represented a carefully considered action, taken because of the "increasing gravity of the situation." Senator Thurmond of South Carolina said: "We are free, morally and legally to oppose the decision; we must fight it to the end."

The University of Alabama took disciplinary action today against studnets it said were involved in the rioting against Autherine Lucy, its first Negro student. The university expelled Leonard Wilson, a sophomore who was leader of a White Citizens Coundil, suspended four students, and meted out lesser punishment against 20 others.

Henry Ford the Second today said he personally approved the solicitation of Ford dealers for the Eisenhower campaign in 1952. Ford testified before a Senate committee. He said no pressure had been applied and that, as far as he knew, there had been no "reprisals or recriminations" against dealers who refused to contribute.

Former President and Mrs. Truman today announced that Margaret Truman will be married in April to Clifton Daniel of the New York Times. Miss Truman said the wedding will take place in the Episcopal church in Independence, where she once sang in the choir.

The Senate continued voting on amendments to the farm bill. Tonight, it approved an amendment that would place an annual ceiling of 100-thousand dollars on the payments any one person could receive under the price support program. The amendment would also limit to 25-thousand dollars, the payments a farmer could receive for settlin aside land in reserve under the soil bank program.

I have in the studio with me tonight a notable figure in the conflict over race regregation. His being here, is a reminder that segregation is a world question. He is the Reverend Trevor Huddleston, now on his way to England after having been the most prominent churchman and educator in South Africa opposed to the segregation policies of the Nationalist government under Prime Minister Strydom. He closed his mission school for negroes in the over crowded slum city of Sophiatown rather then carry through the limiting rules set by the government. Tell me, Father Huddleston, what is the status of education for natives in South Africa?

HUDDLESTON: Well, since the passing of an act, known as the Bantu Education Act, a few months ago the Bureau of Mission Schools, that is, church schools, in South Africa has come to an end, a very historic period, really, because the whole burden of native education, Negro education you call it here, fell on the shoulders of the church until the passing of this act. Now, there are, virtually speaking, no mission schools or church schools left. The Roman Catholic Church, to its great honor, has raised a million pounds to try and retain its some seven hundred schools as private schools, but a million pounds doesn't go very far, of course. The effect of the act is, I think, the most far-reaching thing that has happened in South Africa because it means that in future there are two kinds of education in that country, that is, education as we understand it, western Christain education for the white population, and there is what we know as Bantu, or native education. for the Africans, something which will gear them into an existing society which has as its aim, as I'm sure you realize, the preservation of racial superiority on the part of the white group and that's why we, the Church in the diocese of Johannesburg, from which I came, opposed it so strongly that we felt the only way to show our active opposition to this thing was to colse our schools sooner than to accept a form of education which we believed, and I personally believe with all my heart, to be basically unchristian and a denial of the fundamental rights of man.

MURROW: This means that the Bantu receives some education, but strictly limited, is that it?

HUSDLESTON: That is the point. The Bantu, the native, will receive education in these schools, but the limitation is the limitation which is imposed upon the Bantu Race for being Bantu.

MURROW: Well, Father Suddleston, what about the possibilivy of a revival of the "torch commando", the people who organized active resistance to the nationalist government?

HUDDLESTON: I'm afraid I'm not awfully optimistic about that. I was in on the beginning of the "torch commando", in fact I was asked to bless the first "torch commando" that left Johannesburg and I saw it from the beginning to the end. My own honest feeling is that oppostionn to government policies is South Africa today is at a low ebb and I saw no indication of any sort of major revival of that kind. As you may know, it's the women, the Black Sashes, they are called, who've done most to voice disapproval, but, of course, things may conceivably change. I wouldn't like to prophesy, but I'm not awfully hopeful.

MURROW: Is there much interest in South Africa in our discussions over segregation?

HUDDLESTON: Certainly! They began to hit the headlines just before I left the country and, naturally, what is happening in the south here is something of intense interest both to the Government and to African people. It was a little.. a little depressing, of course, in some ways to me to hear some of the comments of my own school children, although they weren't awfully well informed.

MURROW: Well, Father Huddleston, how much opposition is there amongst the whites in South Africa to the present policy?

HUDDLESTON: Well, there is a great deal of opposition on the part of the whites to this constitutional crisis, which has arisen in South Africa. It's a very complicated business which I don't want to go into.

MURROW: Yes.

HUDDLESTON: But I'm afraid, qhite frankly, that the whites in South Africa are basically united with regard to the racial issues confronting the country and that as soon as those come to a head there is..there is union, and that's why the oppostioon is so ineffective on other matters.

MURROW: Well, Sir, what of the future is violence and collision inevitable?

HUDDLESTON: Well, I don't like to say it's inevitable. As a Christian one has to hope rather above the human level but the way things are going violence could most easily happen and the gulf between the White and the Balck Races is widening so rapidly, it is so incredibly difficult today in South Africa to keep contact with African leadership, that one must fear, I'm afraid that that is the logical consequence of events.

MURROW: Well, South Africa is a large but far-away country of which most of us know little. How do you see the role of the rest of the world in relation to this conflict that is going on in South Africa?

HUDDLESTON: Well, I thinkthat I've seen increasingly that the Christian conscience in the world simply must wake up to the situation in South Africa, that it isn't a local issue and the churches in South Africa are not capable, in my view, and I've seen criticized for this in dealing with the thing on the whole; we need the Christian conscience of the world behind us to awake to the seriousness and th the implications of what's going on in that country and that's my greatest hope. Whether, of course, even the Christain conscience of the world can bring to bear in time upon the authroities in South Africa sufficient pressure to create an alteration in their...in their attitudes is another matter, but my...my feeling as a Christian Priest is that it is my duty to try and bring home to the rest of the Christian world what is going on there and to hope anyhow that something man...may happen under God.

MURROW: Thank you very much, Father Trevor Huddleston.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today.

Now, here is Bob Dixon

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: In talking with Father Huddlesoon, I was reminded of Bernard Shaw's line, "We are fighting our sins, as practiced by the enemy." And none of us lives in isolation. What we do, and say, affects democracy everywhere. Socrates said, "I am a citizen, not of Athens or Greece, but of the world." Good Night and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Tues., March 13, 1956

This is the news:

The first presidential primary of the election year was held today in New Hampshire. The main contest is between Senator Kefauver and supporters of Adlai Stevenson... the first test of strength between the two Democratic candidates. ~~On the Republican side, President Eisenhower is virtually unopposed. Seven delegate-candidates are running as favorable to Senator Knowland. But they entered before Mr. Eisenhower announced his decision to seek another term.~~ Most of the polling places will close in about 15 minutes, ~~and~~ No significant trend is to be found in the early, scattered returns. CBS Radio will broadcast a special report on the primary at 10:05 tonight, Eastern time.

Mr. Eisenhower had a private talk today with Vice President Nixon. The nature of their talk was not divulged. There has been a lot of speculation over whether Nixon will run again for vice president. Last week, the President said he had told Nixon "to chart his own course."

Mr. Eisenhower had his regular weekly meeting today with Republican congressional leaders. Afterwards, Senator Knowland said he believed the President's mind was "open" on the question of the Bricker Amendment, relating to the chief executive's treaty-making powers. The wording of the amendment has been revised, and Knowland said Mr. Eisenhower had agreed to talk it over with his top advisers. The President was also quoted as being pleased with the progress the farm bill is making in the Senate... where, so far, efforts to junk flexible price supports have failed.

It now appears that the Senate will not complete action on the farm bill until Friday, and possibly not until sometime next week. Today, the Senate set up a two-price plan for wheat. It tacked on an amendment whereby farmers would be guaranteed full 100 percent parity for wheat used for domestic human consumption. For wheat that would be exported, or fed to livestock, farmers would have to be satisfied with the going market price. This amendment was sponsored by Republican Senator Carlson of Kansas. It was passed by a vote of 54 to 39.

The House passed measures today... canceling the scheduled cuts in excise taxes, and taxes on corporation profits. Under existing law, the taxes would be reduced automatically on April first, and cost the government 3-billion dollars in revenue. The legislation, continuing the higher rates, now goes to the Senate.

Florida will challenge yesterday's Supreme Court ruling, that Virgil Hawkins... a Negro... must be admitted to the University of Florida law school. The Florida cabinet, composed of Governor Collins and six other state officials, decided to ask the court to reconsider its ruling. The cabinet also proposed a conference of school and state officials next week, to discuss means for circumventing the court order.

Secretary of Defense Wilson said today that congressional investigations into military matters should be "carefully handled", so the Pentagon will not be forced to make public information of value to an enemy. Wilson told the National Press Club that the United States now... and for the foreseeable future... has the capability to inflict "vast destruction" on any aggressor. And this capability, he said, "cannot be thwarted." Wilson said that, if properly spent, the money prescribed in President Eisenhower's budget will be sufficient to carry out the military program.

The Army issued a call today for 12-thousand draftees in May. That's double the quota for recent months... and will permit the early release from service of about 8-thousand draftees in June.

Greece took the Cyprus question to the United Nations today, in a formal request that the matter be taken up by the General Assembly. The assembly does not meet until next fall. But the Greek delegate said the case might be taken before then to the Security Council. Greece charged that Britain... in its negotiations..."never had the intention of restoring freedom to Cyprus." Britain said the Greek action "was calculated to inflame the situation", and that Cyprus is not a matter for U.N. debate.

In Washington, eighteen senators prepared a resolution, saying that the legitimate security interests of Britain should not be used "for the frustration of the legitimate aspirations of the people of Cyprus." The resolution asks the State Department to express this view to the British government.

In Athens, American Ambassador Cannon called on the Greek foreign minister today, to express the "sympathetic concern" of the United States over recent developments in Cyprus. This action surprised British officials in London. And the British ambassador in Washington has been instructed to seek an explanation from the State Department.

The British foreign secretary... Selwyn Lloyd... arrived in Tel Aviv today, to confer with Israeli leaders and the chief United Nations truce supervisor, General Burns. And the British ambassador to Jordan conferred with the Jordinian prime minister in Amman.

Jordan said today that an Israeli fighter plane burst into flames over Jordinian territory, and crashed into the demilitarized zone. It did not say whether the airplane had been fired upon.

In Algeria... in the last 24 hours... clashes with Arab nationalist forces have cost the French at least 15 dead.

Secretary of State Dulles arrived in Thailand today, and signed an agreement ~~whereby the United States will help Thailand in the~~ to help Thailand in the peaceful uses of atomic energy... including the cpnstruction of a small nuclear reactor. Dulles also conferred with the Thai prime minister, who said afterward that it was impossible for Thailand to follow a neutralist policy.

~~Moscow today announced the death of Boleslaw Bierut, leader of the Polish Communist Party. The announcement said Bierut... who once headed the Communist government of Poland... had died of heart disease in Moscow on Monday.~~

Edward R. Murrow: March 13, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

The "manifesto of the 96" against school integration, which was laid before Congress yesterday, has now become the manifesto of 100, and presumably more names will be added. This is an impressive number to join in denouncing the Supreme Court, for what is called "an unwarranted exercise of power, contrary to the constitution", and accusing it of creating chaos and confusion.

But this number of 100 is fewer than one-fifth of the total membership of the two houses of Congress. That is, it is a minority view. In the segregation crisis, the nation is facing two minorities. The negroes are a minority fighting for equal rights under the law. And the Southern opposition to the Supreme Court's ruling is a minority. It is inherent in a true democracy that minorities are free to state their case. The manifesto took full advantage of that right.

Some satisfaction has been expressed because the manifesto did not, as in its original draft, call the court's action "illegal and unconstitutional", though it went nearly that far. The final draft also omitted endorsement of the interposition policy, by which some states would interpose their sovereign rights between the Supreme Court and their citizens.

But the manifesto also did not ask for congressional action. The floor of Congress was being used to generate political power, rather than to exercise it. The only action Congress could take, would be to amend the constitution, or to impeach the court, and a demand for either step would get nowhere now. What the Southern members were doing, was to marshall their forces. For one thing, they were giving citizens in the South who dislike integration, but like to be lawful, a respectable formula for denouncing the Supreme Court. The manifesto showed how a southerner can oppose the highest expression of law under the constitution, and yet feel that he is the one supporting the highest expression of law, while the Supreme Court is against it. This must be designed to help organize the full weight of latent opposition in the South.

What seems to be shaping up is not congressional action - amendment of the constitution or impeachment - but an appeal to voters. The possibility now looms up of a third party movement. It would be much more formidable than the states' right revolt against President Truman in his last election. It is too early to say this is going to happen, or is even likely to happen. In the end, the decision about it, should depend on what result the Southern opposition expects to get out of it. As things look now, the only sure result would be to make a Democratic defeat in November absolutely sure. Mr.

Truman managed to be elected despite the loss of votes to two splinter parties, the States Righters and the Progressives. The Democratic candidate this year could not hope to do so well.

A third party could have a sensational effect on the election. It might well prevent either major candidate from receiving an absolute majority of the electoral votes. Then, by our obsolescent system, the election would be thrown into the House of Representatives. The House would have to meet at once - that is, concurrently with the electoral college in December. It would be the present House, not the one chosen in November. And it would have to vote for the President by states, each state casting a single vote.

An overwhelming Republican victory at the polls, or in the House, would not further the South's fight on integration. It would not open the door to legislation to nullify the Court's ruling. The Court's personnel would not be changed, nor would its judgment be affected so far as can be foreseen. The only result would be to break up the long and not always happy marriage between Northern and Southern democrats, and that would assure the Republicans easy victories until the marriage was mended.

This being the outlook, a third party seems improbable unless the South consults its passions rather than the dictates of political prudence.

Perhaps that is the way things are going. But two distinguished Southern names were absent from the manifesto - Sam Rayburn and Lyndon Johnson. They have worked zealously to prevent a party split over civil liberties. Senator Johnson now is being mentioned as possible leader of a third party, even though he didn't sign the manifesto, and States' Rights spokesmen say they much prefer him to ~~XXXXX~~ Adlai Stevenson.

If it should develop that the only way to save the Democratic Party from a suicidal split would be to nominate Senator Johnson, the country would be in the odd position in November, of having to choose between two men, both of whom have recovered from coronary thrombosis.

Bob Hite

Word for Today

A major issue... segregation... is being decided by the democratic process. Plato said, "Democracy is a charming form of government, full of variety and disorder." Some conflict is inherent in democracy. For as Justice Robert Jackson observed, "Thoughtful, bold and independent minds are essential to wise and considered self-government."

Goodnight and good luck!

Edward R. Murrow Wed., March 14, 1956

This is the news:

President Eisenhower held a news conference today, and again the question of the political future of Vice President Nixon was raised. A reporter asked President Eisenhower if he would comment on the big write-in vote Nixon received yesterday in the New Hampshire primary. Mr. Eisenhower said it indicated many people in New Hampshire agreed with him about Nixon. Then the President made a strong personal endorsement of Nixon. Here, by recording, is what he said:

(tape runs 1:15
(ends on cue: "Exactly, sir. I said
(that last week."

There has been much speculation whether Mr. Nixon will be President Eisenhower's running mate in November. The President's statement today was his strongest endorsement of Mr. Nixon so far. ~~It was apparent, however, that in his own mind, Mr. Eisenhower felt he was saying only what he had said before.~~

Much of the President's news conference today had to do with foreign affairs. Mr. Eisenhower revealed he had an exchange of letters with Soviet Premier Bulganin last fall, on the subject of Russian economic penetration of the Middle East. / He did not report the contents of the letters. / The Associated Press says it has learned that President Eisenhower's message to Bulganin was brief, and expressed concern over the prospective shipment of Communist arms to Egypt. ☆ Mr. Eisenhower said (at his news conference) that he has never ruled out the possibility of furnishing arms to Israel. / He said it was just that he hoped for a better solution. There is no question, he said, that American interests in the area are "very gravely jeopardized." / He spoke of the possibility of war in the Middle East. "Therefore," he said, "we have got to explore every possible means. We have foreclosed on nothing."

The President said the United States is prepared to do anything "reasonable and practical", to help solve the dispute between Great Britain and Greece, over the island of Cyprus. He called it "a very tough and complicated problem", and referred to Britain and Greece as "two of our very best friends".

In London, the Eden government received a vote of confidence tonight. The issue was its handling of the Cyprus question. The vote was 317 to 251, and followed straight party lines. In a few minutes, we will have a first-hand report from London on this development, together with an analysis of the situation... as seen through British eyes.

There was more violence today on Cyprus. In the capital city of Nicosia, a British police officer was ambushed and killed by Cypriot machine-gunners. In another town, a group of children shouted for union with Greece, then began stoning a military vehicle. One shot was fired, and a 7-year-old boy dropped dead.

In Palestine, the kings of Jordan and Iraq met at a desert oil station, near their mutual frontier. A communique... issued after their meeting... said merely that they discussed questions of mutual interest, and that "complete understanding prevailed over the discussions." Reports from Baghdad say that, presumably, the two kings set their policy for the forthcoming meeting of Arab chiefs of state... which Jordan wants to be held in its capital city of Amman.

Secretary of State Dulles arrived in Saigon today, in a continuation of his Asian tour. He conferred with President Diem, of South Vietnam, and praised him for the "striking progress" his government had made in the past year "toward consolidation of a strong and free country." Dulles said there was no "early probability" that [redacted] South Vietnam would be invited to join the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization. Reportedly, he said Seato would come to the defense of South Vietnam, if attacked.

In Washington, the Army today announced that it is forming the first battalion to fire the new 300-mile "Redstone" missile. The outfit was identified as [redacted] the 217th Field Artillery Missile Battalion. The Redstone missile is now being test fired in Florida. The Army hopes to expand its range to 15-hundred miles.

At his news conference today, President Eisenhower appealed for moderation on the school segregation issue. He noted that the "manifesto" signed by [redacted] more than a hundred members of Congress from Southern states, calls for [redacted] reversing the Supreme Court desegration decision by "legal means". The President said that if ever there was a time for patience and understanding, this is it.

The situation, he said, will not be helped by extremists on either side. And he called again for creation of a commission, with subpoena powers, to study the situation.

Mr. Eisenhower urged Congress to hurry up action on a farm bill. "The planting season is rushing up on us," he said, "and we need the farm bill now." Today the Senate... in its continuing series of votes on amendments to the farm measure... rejected a proposal for raising price supports for dairy products to 90 percent of parity. It approved a parity formula for cotton, which would cause a reduction of about two cents a pound in the support price of that commodity.

Now, for a report on the crisis which faces Britain over Cyprus, we switch by recording to London and Howard K. Smith.

(tape runs 4:18
(ends on cue: "Back now to Ed Murrow
(in New York."

That was a first-hand report from London on the Cyprus question by my colleague, Howard K. Smith. This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment for the Word for Today. (pause) But first, here's Bob Dixon.

A bulletin has come in from Washington, reporting the vote on another amendment to the farm bill. The Senate just approved an additional 60-million dollars for the school milk program. Republican charged that the Democrats, in writing this into the omnibus farm measure, had been guilty of "low-grade politics."

Word for Today

The misunderstanding between the United States and Britain has been a misunderstanding among friends. And though a mistake was made, nothing is to be gained by laying blame. Henry Ward Beecher said, "Every man should keep a fair-sized cemetery in which to bury the faults of his friends."

Goodnight and good luck!

CBS RADIO DIVISION

EDWARD R. MURROW

Wed., March 14, 1956
7:45-8:00 P.M.

MURROW: THIS IS THE NEWS:

President Eisenhower held a news conference today - and again the question of the political future of Vice President Nixon was raised. A reporter asked President Eisenhower if he would comment on the big write-in vote Nixon received yesterday in the New Hampshire primary. Mr. Eisenhower said it indicated many people in New Hampshire agreed with him about Nixon. Then the President made a strong personal endorsement of Mr. Nixon. Here, by recording is what he said:

PRES. EISENHOWER: Anyone who attempts to drive a wedge of any kind between Dick Nixon and me is ... has just as much chance if he tried to drive it between my brother and me. We are very close, as I told you before. I want to say again what I repeated or what I said last week or the week before -- I'll say it in exactly the terms I mean: I'm very happy that Dick Nixon is my friend; I'm very happy to have him as an associate in Government; I would be happy to be on any political ticket in which I was a candidate with him. Now, if those words aren't plain, then it's merely because people can't understand the plain, unvarnished truth. I have nothing further to add.

ARROWSMITH: Marvin Arrowsmith of the AP. Strictly in the interests of clarification and not to trespass on grounds you've barred, but did we understand you correctly to say that you would be happy to have Mr. Nixon "on any political ticket on which I am a candidate"?

PRES. EISENHOWER: Exactly so! I said that last week.

MURROW: There has been much speculation whether Mr. Nixon will be President Eisenhower's running-mate in November ...

(MORE)

EDWARD R. MURROW - 3/14/56

MURROW: ... Now, for a report on the crisis which faces Britain over Cyprus, we switch by recording to London and Howard K. Smith

SMITH: One unforgettable evening six years ago, a mistaken report reached London from Washington. It was that President Truman was prepared to use the atomic bomb in the Korean war, which was then racing towards its climax. That report caused a storm in press and Parliament in Britain, as a result of which the then Prime Minister, Mr. Attlee, had to fly over to Washington to readjust relations between Britain and the United States. Not since that day, over half a decade ago, have Anglo-American relations been so rudely shaken as they were last nite and this morning. I hasten to report that the situation is nearly back to normal tonite. But still, this evening in a debate in the House of Lords a noble peer was moved to say that misunderstandings like that between the State Department and the British Government in the past twenty-four hours, in regard to Cyprus, give grounds for the Russian belief that the Western Alliance may collapse from within.

The incident that prompted so dramatic an assertion as that was a statement attributed to an American diplomat last nite. Mr. CavendishCannon, the United States Ambassador to Greece, was quoted here as having expressed America's "sympathetic concern" to the Greeks for recent events in Cyprus and having praised (I quote) "the dignity and the restraint shown by the Greeks in the present situation." As no Greeks have been killed, but a large number of Britons have, in the crisis over Cyprus, as Greek radio broadcasts to Cyprus have been considered here to be direct incitement to murder, as the British Consulate was burned down the other day on the island of Crete by Greeks described as "dignified and restrained", The British got hopping mad at this statement. Britain's most popular newspaper, the tabloid Daily Mirror, said: "America has struck a deadly blow at Britain's handling of the Cyprus crisis." The Conservative newspaper

The Daily Mail called the remark "a kick in the seat". The Labor Daily Herald spoke of (Quote) "the worst Anglo-American clash in years." The Foreign Office announced it was asking the State Department for explanations of Mr. Cannon's remarks. The phrase "to ask for explanations" is, we were informed, very sharp language for one ally to direct to another.

Following today's statement by the State Department and by President Eisenhower, establishing the United States in what appears to be a neutral position, one spokesman here in London pronounced himself today reasonably satisfied. Mr. Cannon's remarks, it was assumed, was an excess of zeal on his own part - not specifically authorized by the State Department. This aceeptance of U.S. .....? was, however, begrudging and conditional - and British sensitivities, following blows to prestige in Jordan and Cyprus, are and probably will remain very tender indeed. Among other things, the official view here is that Cyprus is the last important Western base from which to prevent war or control Communist infiltration in the Middle East and that it is at least as much of a Western interest as, for example, Formosa in the Pacific.

The whole topic of Cyprus was the subject of a full-dress debate in Parliament today, particularly the question of the deportation ofArchbishop Makarios. Labor's attack on the Eden Government was led by Left-winger Aneurin Bevan, who said that deportations of local patriots never produce anything but poisoned relations with other allies. Prime Minister Eden answered, repeating charges that Makarios had fomented violence and saying that the British either had to arrest him or abdicate all authority. At the end of the debate the Labor Opposition's motion of censure on Eden for Cyprus was defeated by 65 votes. There was no indication in the debate of what the British Government plans to do now that it has eliminated its challenger on Cyprus, or with whom it intends to negotiate, or if it intends to negotiate at all. The impression was left that Cyprus is a continued story, the shape of whose next instalment no one here has any conception.

Back now to Ed Murrow in New York.

MURROW: That was a first-hand report from London on the Cyprus question by my colleague Howard K. Smith.

-30-

Ediphone trans./E. Scheiner

Edward R. Murrow Thurs., March 15, 1956

This is the news:

The Senate is still in session, voting on amendments to the farm bill. Administration forces suffered a setback, during the day, when the Senate voted... 45 to 44... to continue the "dual parity" formula for figuring price supports. Under this formula, farmers may use either of two methods... whichever is higher... in computing the level of supports for the basic crops---corn, cotton, peanuts and wheat. It's estimated that, under the dual system, farmers this year would receive about 400-million dollars more in benefits.

The White House said today that President Eisenhower plans to send Congress a special message on foreign aid, early next week. It's expected to call for nearly 5-billion dollars in new appropriations.

~~Secretary of Defense Wilson said today that he "has" plans for atomic disarmament in the near prospect. Wilson testified before a Senate subcommittee on disarmament.~~

Representative Powell of New York... who is a Negro... .. said today that a new political party is a "distinct possibility", as a result of the fight over segregation. Powell said unless Democrats return to the civil rights policies of former President Truman, "many Negroes will desert the party." He said if both parties "stand still" on the issue, a third party may be the answer.

Prime Minister Costello of Eire spoke before the National Press Club today, in Washington, and said Eire cannot join the North Atlantic Treaty Organization as long as it is "partitioned". Costello referred to the fact that part of Northern Ireland belongs to Britain. He called it a situation which "contradicts the facts of history and geography, and spuriously denies the democratic principle." But the paramount issue today, he said, is world peace.

A State Department spokesman said today he had no confirmation for the report that the United States is drawing up a proposal for a U.N. watchdog commission to operate in Israel and the Arab states. The spokesman said he could find no one in the department who had ever heard of the proposal, reported today by the New York Times. The Times said a function of the commission would be to alert the Security Council to any threat of war, and recommend action for preserving peace. The State Department spokesman said American policy provides for "utmost support" for the United Nations truce supervisor, General Burns. "We and a lot of other people," he added, "are thinking seriously of what, as a practical matter, can be done by the United Nations in this situation." Other reports say the country's whole Middle East policy is under intensive review, as a result of the worsening situation.

The British foreign secretary... Selwyn Lloyd... said today he thought "certain actions" will have to be taken to keep peace in the Middle East. Lloyd made the statement on returning to London, after a series of talks with Arab and Israeli leaders. He called the Arab-Israeli problem "one of the most intractable with which we have ever had to deal." But he does not believe war is inevitable.

In the House of Commons today, Prime Minister Eden was asked what decisions have been reached in the three-power discussions in Washington. (These talks, between the United States, Britain and France, have been in progress for several weeks). Eden said he could not make public, any military decisions. And he did not say what political decisions, if any, had been reached.

In the House of Lords, former Prime Minister Attlee criticized the American attitude, toward the Middle East problem. He said: "I sometimes feel, with all friendliness to our American friends, that they are a little apt to stand on the sidelines." He cited the fact that America does not belong to the Baghdad Pact.

In Jerusalem, the United Nations mixed armistice commission has condemned both Jordan and Israel for a border incident on Monday, in which one woman was killed. Today, Israel and Egypt accused each other of new attacks in the Gaza area. Four incidents were reported, all on a small scale.

The government of Lebanon resigned today. Ostensibly, it fell on the issue of subsidizing private schools.

ON Cyprus, the Communist-dominated labor organization has called for an end to the four-day general strike. There was no immediate reaction from the workers, who have been protesting the deportation of Archbishop Makarios. Scattered bombings continued. In London, the Archbishop of Canterbury demanded assurance that the exile of Makarios will end, when peace is restored to the island.

At the Hague, Russia and Czechoslovakia have refused to accept the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice in the shooting down of two American aircraft. The United States claimed damages of a million, 600-thousand dollars in the loss of a B-29 bomber and its crew off the coast of Japan. The incident took place in October, 1952. In March, 1953, an F-84 Thunderjet was shot down by two Czech fighters over West German territory. The pilot survived the crash. For the loss of the airplane, the United States demanded 270-thousand dollars. Both cases have now been removed from the docket of the International Court.

Former Premier Malenkov arrived in London today, for his first visit outside the Iron Curtain. My colleague, Alex Kendrick, cables from London that British authorities have taken the strictest possible precautions for the safety of their guest during his three-week stay.

Edward R. Murrow: March 15, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

A few pieces have been set in place this week, of what may become the mosaic of a new foreign policy for the United States. / One is the invitation to Prime Minister Nehru to visit President Eisenhower in Washington. / Another is the Administration's intention to ask an increase of 40 to 50 percent in the economic aid scheduled for India. / Still another is the invitation to President Soekarno of Indonesia to visit the White House. / And another - and perhaps the most significant so far - is a statement made by Secretary Dulles to Indonesian newsmen in Djakarta on Tuesday. / He stressed that a country getting economic aid from the United States is under no obligation to enter a mutual defense pact with us. Membership in SEATO - the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization - he declared, is not a test of friendship. "Our friendship for other countries" he stated, "is just as great as it is with members of SEATO."

One feature of these items is, that the red carpet is to be prepared for heads of the two largest neutralist countries in the East. / One could quibble technically and say this is not a change in policy. But it certainly is a change in emphasis. / Not very long ago Washington frowned on neutralism, as though neutrals at heart must be against us, since they were not for us. When the neutrals made trade deals with Communist countries, excitedly accepted the Kremlin's flattery, and took to using Communist propaganda phrases about American military intentions, such suspicions seemed to be confirmed.

But that was before the nuclear stalemate was reached, which now dominates Soviet-American relations. Up to that time, the Communists not only based their foreign policy on their military power, they used that power as in Korea. The Western answer had been to build all the deterrent military strength possible. It was in this period that the reluctance of neutrals to join in collective defense against Communist aggression looked to many to be, at best, ~~moral~~ indifference. Now we are in the era of the nuclear stalemate, and world war is officially judged to be unthinkable. So the nature of the conflict between East and West has changed. The danger of local wars remains, but it seems that local wars will not be risked unless it seems certain they can be kept local. So it no longer is necessary for the West to go on expanding its defensive military coalitions with world-wide commitments. Those in existence are enough to maintain the stalemate.

This being so, we should have changed our attitude toward neutrals even if the Kremlin had not taken the lead in adjusting its foreign policy to the new conditions. But the Russians did it first, and derived a lot of benefit from their play on peace, friendship and economic aid. They went in extensively for the red-carpet treatment of neutrals, and sent their top men to visit many neutral capitals.

We, too, have had distinguished foreign guests, and Mr. Dulles travels even more than Bulganin and Khrushchev. But now our play is focusing on neutrals. We are not aiming to line them up as military allies, but to improve their economies, and so strengthen them against Communist penetration.

Of all the neutrals in Asia, India and Indonesia are by far the most important. And Mr. Dulles, to make headway in India, had to buck up against a set of nation-wide prejudices. One of them he created himself, with his quite unnecessary joint statement with Portugal about Goa, its tiny dependency in India. A much deeper resentment was over our arming Pakistan, and another over our seeming to take Pakistan's side in everything, and so to be against India on the Kashmir issue.

With his objectives in India in mind, Mr. Dulles walked the tightrope at the SEATO council meeting in Karachi. He helped to commit SEATO to endorse the Pakistan claim to its present frontier with Afghanistan. But he did it only in return for keeping the SEATO council from writing an anti-Indian resolution on Kashmir. And when he reached India he went to pains to explain that our arms for Pakistan are purely defensive, and if used for aggression against India, the United States would be on the side of India in the United Nations. All he could say about the Goa dispute was to disclaim that he was taking sides - which seems to be the State Department's handiest escape clause these days.

But the invitation to Nehru, which the Prime Minister is expected to accept, and the increased aid now proposed, and a better understanding of our intentions, may head us for a status of favor in India not enjoyed since the days of Ambassador Bowles. Mr. Bowles' successor, former Republican Senator Cooper, has been working effectively to bring this about.

These bits and pieces of change in foreign policy are promising, but they are fragmentary. Asia so far is the only continent where the new economic emphasis is so clearly recognizable. And even in Asia, the new policy cannot succeed unless the Administration can promise and deliver better things on better terms than the Kremlin and its satellites.

Bob White -

Word for Today

There are signs that American policy is being revised to meet Russia's economic challenge. Disraeli said, "Change is inevitable." It can also be the best strategy. For as the Chinese philosopher Lao-tsze counseled, more than two thousand years ago, "Whosoever adapteth himself shall be preserved to the end."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

THURSDAY, MARCH 15, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

The Senate is still in session, voting on amendments to the farm bill. Administration forces suffered a setback, during the day, when the Senate voted..45 to 44..to continue the "dual parity" formula for figuring price supports. Under this formula, farmers may use either of two methods .. whichever is higher..in computing the level of supports for the basic crops.. corn, cotton, peanuts and wheat. It's estimated that, under the dual system, farmers this year would receive about 400-million dollars more in benefits.

The White House said today that President Eisenhower plans to send Congress a special message on foreign aid, early next week. It's expected to call for nearly 5-billion dollars in new appropriations.

Representative Powell of New York..who is a Negro--said today that a new political party isa a "distinct possibility", as a result of the fight over segregation. Powell said unless Democrats return to the civil rights policies of former President Truman, "many Negroes will desert the party." He said of both parties "stand still" on the issue, a third party may be the answer.

Prime Minister Costello of Eira spoke before the National Press Club today, in Washington, and said Eire cannot join the North Atlantic Treaty Organization as long as it is "partitioned". Costello referred to the fact that part of Northern Ireland belongs to Britain. He called it a situation which "contradicts the facts of history and geography, and spuriously denies the democratic principle." But the paramount issue today, he said, is world peace.

A State Department spokesman said today he had no confirmation for the report that the United States is drawing up a proposal for a U.N. watchdog commission to operate in Israel and the Arab states. The spokesman said he could find no one in the department who had ever heard of the proposal, reported today by the New York Times. The Times said a function of the commission would be to alert the Security Council to any threat of war, and recommend action for preserving peace. The State Department spokesman said American policy provided for "utmost support" for the United Nations truce supervisor, General Burns.

The Biritsh foreign secretary..Selwyn Lloyd..said today he thought "certain actions" will have to be taken to keep peace in the Middle East. Lloyd made the statement on returning to London, after a series of talks with Arab and Israeli leaders. He called the Arab-Israeli problem "one of the most intractable with which we have ever had to deal." But hedoes not believe war is inevitable.

In the House of Commons today, Prime Minister Eden was asked what cecisions have been reached in the three- power discussions in Washington. (These talks, between the United States, Britain and France, have been in progress for several weeks.) Eden said he could not make public any military decisions. And he did not say what political decisions, if any had been reached.

In the House of Lords, former Prime Minister Attlee criticized the American attitude toward the Middle East problem. He said: "I sometimes feel, with all friendliness to our American friends, that they are a little apt to stand on the sidelines." He cited the fact that American does not belong to the Baghdad Pact.

In Jerusalem, the United Nations mixed armistice committion has condemned both Jordan and Israel for a border incident on Monday, in which one woman was killed. Today, Israel and Egypt accused each other of new attacks in the Gaza area. Four incidents were reported, all on a small scale.

The government of Lebanon resigned today. Ostensibly, it fell on the issue of subsidizing private schools.

On Cyprus, the Communist - dominated labor organization has called for an ende to the four-day general strike. There was no immediate reaction from the workers, who have been protesting the deportation of Archbishop Makarios. Scattered bombings continued. In London, the Archbishop of Canterbury demanded assurance that the exile of Makarios will end, when peace is restored to the island.

At the Hague, Russia and Czechoslovakia have refused to accept the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice in the shooting down of two American aircraft. The United States calimed damages of a million, 600-thousand dollars in the loss of a B-29 bomber and its crew off the coast of Japan. The indident took place in October, 1952. In March, 1953, an F-84 Thunderjet was shot down by two Czech fighters ofer West German territory. The pilot survived the crash. For the loss of the airplane, the United States demanded 270-thousand dollars. Both cases have now been removed from the docket of the International Court.

Former Premier Malenkov arrived in London today, for his first visit outside the Iron Curtain. My colleague, Alex Kendrick, cables from London that British authorities have taken the strictest possible precautions for the safety of their guest during his three-week stay.

A few pieces have been set in place this week, of what may become the mosaic of a new foreign policy for the United States. One is the invitation to Prime Minister Nehru to visit President Eisenhower in Washington. Another is the Administration's intention to ask an increase of 40 to 50 percent in the economic aid scheduled for India. Still another is the invitation to President Soekarno if Indonesia to visit the White House. And another - and perhaps the most significant so far - is a statement made by Secretary Dulles to Indonesian newsmen in Djakarta on Tuesday. He stressed that a country getting economic aid from the Unites States is under no obligation to enter a mutual defense pact with us. Membership in SEATO - the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization - he declared, is not a test of friendship. "Our friendship for other countries" he stated, "is just as great as it is with members of SEATO."

One feature of these items is, that the red carpet is to be prepared for heads of the two largest neautralist countries in the East. One could quibble technically and say this is not a change in policy. But it certainly is a change in emphasis. Not a very long ago, Washington frowned on neautralism as though neautrals at heart must be against us, since they were not for us. When the neautrals made trade deals with Communist countries, excitedly accepted the Kremlin's flattery, and took to using Communist propaganda phrases about American military intentions, such suspicions seemed to be confirmed.

But that was before the nuclear stalemate was reached, which now dominates Soviet-American relations. Up to that time, the Communists not only based their foreign policy on their military power, they used that power as in Korea. The Western answer had been to build all the deterrent military strength possible. It was in this period that the reluctance of neaturals to join in collective defense against Communist aggression looked to many to be, at best, moral indifference. Now we are in the era of the nuclear stalemate, and world war is officially judged to be unthinkable. So the nature of the conflict between East and West has changed. The danger of local wars remains but it seems that local wars will not be risked unless it seems certain they can be kept local. So it no longer is necessary for the West to go on expanding its defensive military coalitions with world-wide commitments. Those in existence are enough to maintain the stalemate.

This being so, we should have changed our attitude toward neautrals even if the Kremlin had not taken the lead in adjusting its foreign policy to the new conditions. But the Russians did it first, and derived a lot of benefit from their play on peace, friendship, and economic aid. They went in extensively for the red-carpet treatment of neautrals, and sent their top men to visit many neautral capitals.

We , too, have had distinguished foreign guests, and Mr. Dulles travels even more than Bulganin and Khurshchev. But now our play is focusing on neautrals. We are not aiming to line them up as military allies, but to improve their economies, and so strengthen them against Communist penetration.

Of all the neautrals in Asia, India and Indonesia are by far the most important. And Mr. Dulles, to make headway in India, had to buck up against a set of nation-wide prejudices. One of them he created himself, with his quite unnecessary statement with Portugal about Goa, its tiny dependency in India. A much deeper resentment was over our arming Pakistan, and another over our seeming to take Pakistan's side in everything, and so to be against India in the Kashmir issue.

With his objectives in India in mind, Mr. Dulles walked the tightrope at the SEATO council meeting an Karachi. He helped to commit SEATO to endorse the Pakistan claim to its present frontier with Afghanistan. But he did it only in reutrn for keeping the SEATO council from writing an anti-Indian resolution on Kashmir. And when he reached India he went to pains to explain that our arms for Pakistan are purely defensive, and if used for aggression against India, the United States would be on the side of India in the United Nations. All he could say about the Goa dispute was to disclaim that he was taking sides - which seems to be the State Department's handiest excape clause these days.

But the invitation to Nehru, which the Prime Minister is expected to accept, and the increased aid now proposed, and a better understanding of our intentions, may head us for a status of favor in India not enjoyed since the days of Ambassador Bowles. Mr. Bowles successor, former Republican Senator Cooper, has been working effectively to bring this about.

These bits and peices of change in foreign policy are promising, but they are fragmentary. Asia so far is the only continent where the new economic empahsis is so clearly recognizable. And even in Asia, the new policy cannot succeed unless the Administration can promise and deliver better things on better terms than the Kremlin and its satellites.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Hite.

HITE: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: There are signs that American policy is being revised to meet Russia's economic challenge". Disraeli said, "Change is inevitable." It can also be the best strategy. For as the Chinese philosopher Lao-Tsze counseled, more than two thousand years ago, "Whosoever adapteth himself shall be preserved to the end."

Good Night and Good Luck!

Edward R. Murrow Friday, March 16, 1956

This is the news:

An action was fought in Algeria today, between French troops and rebel Arab forces. French parachutists, and mechanized units, trapped a rebel detachment, 150 miles east of Algiers. The French say that in a running battle... that went into the night... they killed at least 107 rebels, at the cost of one French soldier.

A curfew has been clamped on Algiers, as the result of a raid this morning in the heart of the city. Masked machine-gunners set fire to a seven-story apartment building. The fire was confined to the basement. No one was injured. But a hundred cars parked in the basement were destroyed.

Other saboteurs cut telephone and telegraph communications between Algeria and French Morocco. And near the Moroccan border, Arab nationalists blocked a main highway.., by digging trenches across it at three points.

Algeria is bordered on the east by Libya, an Arab country which has achieved independence, but may be the next target for Soviet economic infiltration. My colleague, Blair Clark, has just returned to Paris from Libya. Here is his recorded report.

(tape runs 2:43, ends on (cue: "--to Edward R. Murrow
(in New York."

In Washington, the Greek ambassador called at the State Department today, and formally requested "friendly" mediation by the United States in the Cyprus dispute. The Greek ambassador gave no details. The situation, he said was too delicate for open discussion. At his last news conference, President Eisenhower offered all "reasonable and practicable" aid to Britain and Greece toward solving the dispute. (I should like to discuss the Cyprus question further in a few minutes).

Canada announced today that it has approved shipment to Israel of 136-thousand dollars' worth of spare tank parts, plus some ammunition. Prime Minister St. Laurent said early this month that permits for arms shipments to the Middle East would be held up, pending an easing of the situation. He said today "some easing of apprehensions" had occurred.

In Jerusalem, the Israeli chief of staff... General Moshe Dayan... warned today that Israel faces bombing attacks, unless the country gets arms from the West. But bombing, he said, will not defeat Israel.

New incidents were reported today along the Gaza Strip. Israel said Egyptian troops opened fire four times on Israeli outposts. Egypt said the Israelis fired first. Both sides agreed there were no casualties.

Syria accused Turkey today of violating Syrian territory. The interior ministry said a Syrian was killed by a Turkish border patrol yesterday on Syrian soil.

Former ~~Premier~~ Malenkov went ~~sightseeing today in London.~~ He ~~visited Hyde Park and Traralgar Square. But in his role of Soviet~~ minister of power stations, he ~~also conferred at the offices of~~ Britain's ~~central electrical authority.~~

The West German parliament completed action today on provisions for creating an army within the Atlantic Alliance. In voting final approval, the Bundesrat... or upper house... met for the first time in West Berlin. It met in Berlin, instead of Bonn, to symbolize the hope for a reunited Germany... and to boost the morale of the people of West Berlin.

On Formosa, Secretary of State Dulles conferred for more than two hours today with Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek. An announcement said the meeting had led to "further strengthening of friendship" between the two countries. It gave no details.

United Nations sources said today that an East-West ~~agreement~~ compromise agreement has been reached as to what relation the proposed atoms-for-peace agency will have to the U.N. Russia has insisted that the agency submit its reports, simultaneously, to the General Assembly and the Security Council. The West objected on grounds this would give Russia the veto power. Under the compromise plan, the atoms-for-peace agency would make most of its reports to the Assembly... where the veto power cannot be exercised.

In Washington, the Senate abandoned hope tonight of passing a farm bill this week... and decided to recess until Monday.

Edward R. Murrow: March 16, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

Bill Pepper cables me from Cyprus tonight that the Mayor of Nicosia told him today that Britain would never again see peace on the island until Cyprus had self-determination. He added: "You certainly can never turn back the clock of hatred." Pepper reports a population that is grimly silent. The British have thrown a barbed-wire barricade around eighty thousand square yards in the heart of the Greek area of Nicosia.-(seven murders and fourteen attempted murders in that area since last October.) Insistent questioning produced no information. Four hundred envelopes containing blank pieces of paper were circulated amongst the citizenry. They were asked merely to provide information without signing their names - everything would be kept secret. No information of value was obtained.

The Greek underground warns that anyone aiding the British will be shot. The terror and the hatred increase.

One difficulty of estimating the importance of what is happening in the Middle East - whether between Israel and its Arab neighbors, or in Cyprus - is in keeping in mind the bigger stakes behind the immediate happenings. Behind the Czech arms deal with Egypt is the century-long attempt of Russia to get a foothold in the Mediterranean. The Kremlin would be quite happy if the danger of war were to lead to its sharing the duties of the Big Three in keeping the peace in the Middle East. That would be two feet in the door.

~~Another big issue in the shadows, is the rivalry between Egypt and Turkey for leadership of the Arab world. That explains the strong Egyptian reaction when Iraq helped set up the Bagdad Pact, and it accounts for some of the fury of Arabs under Egypt's influence when Jordan was about to join too.~~

Cyprus is an unusually mixed-up case with local events and the bigger forces hard to keep in proper balance. It helps produce a little light to ask who gains most from the trouble in Cyprus. The answer is the Soviet Union. That is not because it is the self-appointed friend of colonial peoples, striving for freedom. It is because the pressure for union of Cyprus with Greece, conjures up a success the Kremlin could hardly dream of. That is an open breach between Greece and Turkey that would go a long way to wreck NATO power in south-eastern Europe, and indeed in Europe as a whole.

In the debate over Britain's policy in Cyprus, it is being argued that Britain can keep its base there if Cyprus joins Greece by simply turning it over to NATO, since Greece is also a NATO member. But this leaves Turkey out of account. And the issue isn't whether Greece is worth more to the West, than a British base on Cyprus. It is what happens to NATO itself.

Cyprus lies sixty miles off the coast of Turkey, and in Greece's possession would be a pistol pointed at Turkey's heart. Moreover, the recent weakness of the Greek Government does not assure Turkey that Greece will not fall under control of a coalition dominated by Communists.

As to NATO, there is no comparison between the importance of Turkey with that of Greece. Greece has five active NATO divisions, but is now talking of giving up the creation of any reserve divisions. Turkey supplies twelve active divisions, which is considerably more than Britain and France put together. Turkey also has ten reserve divisions that are real, and not the paper ones, of ~~many~~ some NATO members. The Turkish army not only is the largest army of NATO, it is in excellent condition.

Turkey feels that its own security forbids union of Cyprus with Greece. It would prefer to have the British keep possession, but it would not resist full local self-government. A solution that gives this to Cyprus was well within reach in the negotiations that finally broke down. After the present phase of violence has passed, it should be possible to get negotiations going again, though the British are determined not to deal with Archbishop Makarios again. It won't happen, however, if the Cyprus trade unions have anything to say about it, for they are under Communist domination.

The Turks blew up once over the Cyprus issue, in the reprehensible way of smashing up the Greek quarter of Istanbul. What they think today about the Cyprus crisis can only be guessed. We have only one clue. The Kremlin tried to find out how angry the Turks are, by suggesting softly that the time had come for closer relations with the Soviet Union. To this Turkey did not respond. The struggle hasn't reached that point yet. But this possibility, far more than the exile of Archbishop Makarios, and the present disorders, may well be the West's chief concern.

Word for Today

The barricades are up in Cyprus, but no one seriously believes the question can be settled, either with bombs or bayonets. Thomas Jefferson said, "Force cannot give right." And two thousand years before Jefferson, the Greek historian Herodotus said, "Where wisdom is called for, force is of small avail."

Goodnight and good luck!

CBS RADIO DIVISION

EDWARD R. MURROW

Friday, March 16, 1956
7:45-8:00 P.M.

MURROW: ... My colleague Blair Clark has just returned to Paris from Libya. Here is his recorded report.

CLARK: The next ten days may decide whether or not the Western Alliance is going to be able to hang on to its influence and its huge military bases in Libya. The threat to the Western position in this strategic Mediterranean area comes from the joint or parallel action of neighboring Egypt and of distant Russia. I have just returned from a visit to Libya, a country three times the size ofTexas with a population of only a million-and-a-half. Ten days from now the future of this barren but strategically valuable piece of North African real estate may be decided when the Libyan Prime Minister Mustapha ben Halim gets up in the Libyan Parliament and answers questions about Russian offers of economic aid. There have been rumors about the Soviet aid offers, ever since the Russians opened an elaborate embassy in Tripoli two months ago. Yesterday Prime Minister ben Halim told me that the offers do indeed exist and that they are attractive. He didn't say what he was going to do about them. But on our side there has been unusual diplomatic activity since the Russians moved in. The problem is a familiar one. Libya is a poor country. Its standard of living for the Arab population, even lower than in neighboring Egypt or French North Africa.

Last year the United States gave Libya seven million dollars as indirect payment for our enormous strategic air base, Wheelet's Field. The British paid ten million dollars for their military bases. But Libya has a six-year economic development plan which will cost about 100 million dollars. Only a third of that money is in sight. There's the problem! Are we going to ante up the rest, or about another twelve million dollars a year, or are we going to let the Russians or the Egyptians do it? It sounds pretty cruel to put it that way, but those are the terms in which Allied officials in Libya are talking about it this week. They resist the word "blackmail" in discussing the problem of Western and Russian offers of economic aid to a poor and struggling country which needs help from wherever it can get it.

But however delicately the problem is discussed, the fact remains that we are in Libya, as in other Middle Eastern states, engaged in a competition of influence with Russia and its new friends in the Arab world. Yesterday morning I watched a Matador pilotless bomber, a guided missile, launched from the Wheelet's Field base out over the great Western Desert of Libya. This is about the only base we have over here where there's enough empty space to practice with these missiles. And Wheelet's Field is just one of our stakes in Libya, as this little country makes up its mind about whose help it's going to accept.

Now back to Edward R. Murrow in New York.

-30-

Ediphone trans./E. Scheiner

Edward R. Murrow Mon., March 19, 1956

This is the news:

President Eisenhower asked Congress today for nearly 5-billion dollars for foreign aid in the next fiscal year. This is roughly 2-billion dollars more than Congress appropriated for the current year. Three billion of the nearly 5-billion dollars would go for military assistance. The President also requested authority for long-range commitments, up to 100-million dollars a year for the next ten years. This money would be used to help underdeveloped countries carry out long-term projects. Mr. Eisenhower warned that the need is urgent. We must have a flexible program, he said, to counter Russia's plans for exploiting political and economic weakness.

The program faces strong opposition in Congress. Republican Leader Knowland said he "does not look with favor" on commitments for 10 years, "except as to specific public works projects that may be approved by the Congress." Chairman Richards of the House Foreign Affairs Committee said it seemed to him that President

→

Eisenhower had asked for too much money. "Committee hearings," he said, "should reveal how much the figure should be cut."

President Eisenhower returned to the White House today, after spending the week-end at his Gettysburg farm. The trip took a half-hour longer than usual, because of icy road conditions. Mr. Eisenhower had planned to return to Washington yesterday, but was prevented by a storm that buried Eastern Pennsylvania under a foot of snow.

Here in New York, nearly 14 inches of snow has fallen since yesterday morning. That makes it the heaviest fall since December, 1947, when the city was covered with nearly 26 inches of snow. Highway traffic in the New York metropolitan area has been paralyzed. Trains are running up to an hour late. Most airline flights were canceled. And here in Manhattan, as many as three out of four office workers were unable to get to their jobs. By noon, three-fourths of the Fifth Avenue stores and offices had closed for the day. Tens of thousands of cars were stranded in drifts.

Six inches of snow fell in Northern Virginia. Maryland got up to 12 inches. New Jersey reported 15 inches, with drifts as high as 12 feet. Connecticut also reports 15 inches. Other New England states are being hit, as the storm moves to the northeast. One hundred and ten persons have died, mostly because of over-exertion and highway accidents.

The State Department announced today that Russia has paid 725-thousand dollars' compensation... for shooting down a Navy patrol bomber last summer, over the Bering Sea. No lives were lost in the incident. The amount paid by Russia amounts to half the costs involved. The State Department said this is the first time Russia, or any of its satellites, has paid compensation in connection with an air incident since the war.

FBI Director Hoover says the American Communist Party plans to become more active. The party, he says, feels it can exploit the atmosphere generated by the big four Geneva conference, and what it claims is "a growing understanding" of Communism in this country. Hoover appeared before a House committee last month, but his testimony was not released until today.

Democratic Senator Mansfield warned today that the recent denunciation of Stalin... by Communist Party Boss Khrushchev... could have a dangerous effect in neutral countries. / Mansfield told the Senate that reports of Khrushchev's action tend to "humanize" the present Soviet regime.

Five-power disarmament talks opened today in London. / Representatives of the United States, Britain, France, Canada and Russia are meeting as a subcommittee of the United Nations disarmament commission. / The British minister of state... Anthony Nutting... said the time had come "to replace mutual terror by mutual trust." As expected, Great Britain and France introduced their joint disarmament plan, embodying the most acceptable proposals to come out of past negotiations. / American officials are said to feel that the joint plan is "too far-reaching." Neither the United States nor Russia submitted their new proposals today.

Also in London, former Premier Malenkov had a 20-minute talk today with Prime Minister Eden. As Soviet minister of power stations, Malenkov was also taken on a tour of the atomic research center at Harwell.

Greek and Turkish partisans clashed on Cyprus today. Thirty of the rioters were injured. Greek Cypriots are demanding union with Greece. The Turkish minority on the island contends that if Britain ever gives up Cyprus, it should go to Turkey.

Israel charged today that troops of Jordan's Arab Legion had fired on an Israeli patrol, along the road from Hebron to Beersheba. It is the first attack reported in the area since 1954. An Israeli spokesman says there were no casualties.

In Algeria, the French resident minister has issued a series of decrees, amounting to the imposition of a virtual state of emergency. At the same time, he outlined initial plans for economic and administrative reform.

In Montgomery, Alabama, today, 90 Negroes were ordered brought to trial, for violating a state law, in their mass boycott of the city buses. A defense motion attacking the validity of the indictments, was DENIED. Charges against three other defendants were dropped. The court granted a defense motion for separate trials.

Edward R. Murrow: March 19, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

Most of the adverse comment on President Eisenhower's foreign aid message quoted from Washington today, objects to the amount of money asked for. Some of it also opposes commitments being made for more than a year at a time, even if no more than the ~~[illegible]~~ hundred millions a year the President requested. No body of opinion has been noted that criticizes the Eisenhower program as not adequate or imaginative enough to meet the new economic offensive of the Kremlin.

The President justified the program on the grounds that the Soviet threat to the free world has changed and grown. But Congress apparently sees the Administration's counter-offensive simply as an increased charge on the national treasury.

This is notable for at least two reasons. One is the assumption that President Eisenhower now rates so high in national esteem that he should expect to get all he needs for his foreign policy, and now is probably not going to get it. The other reason is that the transformation of the Soviet strategy has been the most far-reaching development in world affairs, if not since the world war, certainly since the Korean war. So one would expect congressional critique to be based on whether the President's program really meets the new dangers. But this is the aspect that seems to be ignored.

The Administration at least recognizes the changed nature of the threat. Whether or not it shows anything like enough imagination, it is obvious it will get little stimulation from any lively Congressional concern over the new state of things. Much of the Congressional reaction so far is much the same as recent reactions to any spending that is to reach foreigners at America's expense.

About two billions of the increase in foreign aid requested goes to refill the pipe line of military deliveries under the foreign aid program. This had been allowed to empty as a one-time device to make a better showing in balancing the budget. That is, the increase now asked is not as big as it looks. Even so it looks too big for some congressmen.

One Democratic objection comes from Senator Mike Mansfield, who thinks too much is going for military aid and not enough for economic aid. But he himself voices doubt about the President's request for ten year commitments at the rate of a hundred million a year. He recommends long-term loans at low interest rates instead.

President Eisenhower in his message warns that Soviet expansionism has merely taken on a somewhat different guise, and that its fundamental objective still is to disrupt and, in the end, dominate the free nations.

He stressed the changes in Soviet strategy. "The Soviet maneuver, which is still developing" he said, "includes offers of bi-lateral trade arrangements, which may involve provision of arms and capital goods, as well as technical assistance. "Had we any reason to believe" he said, "that the Soviet leaders had abandoned their sinister objective, and now shared our own high purpose of helping other nations to develop freedom and independence, we would welcome the new Soviet program, for it appears to have aspects of normal trade expansion and business competition." The world, he says, can welcome the ~~XXXX~~ respite from a Soviet policy of threat and violence, but he said: "it must take careful stock of what remains of it. The vast Soviet military establishment has not been scrapped. The threat implicit in this huge aggregation of military power still casts an ominous shadow over the world." In these words he is arguing for continuing military aid abroad.

On closer examination, the foreign aid program is found to go mostly for military uses. The outright military spending asked is about three billion dollars. The largest single sum assigned to the economic field is really for defense; this is a billion, three hundred million. It is explained this is designed to help nations strengthen their economies, to the point where they can support the military establishments they are now acquiring.

The kind of aid that aims at combatting communism by raising standards of living is relatively quite small. The sum destined for what is called "development assistance", which includes the all-important field of agriculture, is a hundred and seventy millions, while the Point Four program of technical assistance is a hundred and fifty-seven million.

This may be the wrong time to call attention to the small emphasis on economic aid. If Congress, in an election year, balks at a program of predominantly military aid, it would balks still more at one predominantly non-military. And it may be that the Administration is hard at work making a whole new foreign policy, that takes full account of the new nature of the cold war. If so, the time to judge its policy is not now, when only an interim request for funds is being made. However, there is no evidence in the interim request that a bold and imaginative approach is in preparation. Kowledge of it certainly is not clearly reflected in the message.

Word for Today

There is some objection, in Congress, to the price tag on the new foreign aid program. H.G. Wells said, "Nothing is dear, if it is good." The issue would appear to be a question of relative values. John Heywood observed, "A piece of a kid is worth two of a cat. One leg of a lark is worth the whole body of a kite."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

MONDAY, MARCH 19, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

President Eisenhower asked Congress today for nearly 5 - billion dollars for foreign aid in the next fiscal year. This is roughly 2 - billion dollars more than Congress appropriated for the current year. Three billion of the nearly 5 - billion dollars would go for military assistance. The President also requested authority for long- range commitments, up to 100- million dollars a yearfor the next ten years. This money would be used to help underdeveloped countries carry out long-term projects. Mr. Eisenhowerwarned that the need is urgent. We must have a flexible program, he said, to counter Russia's plans for exploiting political and economic weakness.

The program faces strong opposition in Congress. Republican Leader Knowland said he "does not look with favor" on commitments for 10 years, "except as to specific public works projects that maybe approved by Congress." Chairman Richards of the House Foreign Affairs Committee said it seemed to him that President Eisenhower had asked for too much money. "committee hearings," he said, "should reveal how much the figure should be cut."

Here in New York, nearly 14 inches of snow has fallen since yesterday morning. That makes it the heaviest fall since December, 1947, when the city has covered with nearly 26 inches of snow. Highway traffic in the New York Metropolitan area has been paralyzed. Trains are running up to an hour late. Most airline flights were canceled. And here in Manhattan, as many as three out of four office workers were unable to get to their jobs. By noon, three-fourths of the Fifth Avenue stores and offices had closed for the day. Tens of thousands of cars were stranded in drifts.

Six inches of snow fell in Northern Virginia. Maryland got up to 12 inches. New Jersey reported 15 inches, with drifts as high as 12 feet. Connecticut also reports 15 inches. Other New England states are being hit, as the storm moves to the northeast. One hundred and ten persons have died, mostly because of over-exertion and highway accidents.

The State Department announced today that Russia has paid 525 thousand dollars' compensation..for shooting down a Navy patrol bomber last summer over the Bering Sea. No lives were lost in the incident. The amount paid by Russia amounts to half the costs involved. The State Department said this is the first time Russia or any of its satellites has paid compensation in connection with an air incident since the war.

FBI Director Hoover says the American Communist Party plans to become more active. The party, he says, feels it can exploit the atmosphere generated by the big four Geneva conference, and what it claims is "a growing understanding" of Communism in this country. Hoover appeared before a House committee last month, but his testimony was not released until today.

Democratic Senator Mansfield warned today that the recent denunciation of Stalin..by Communist Party Boss Khrushchev..could have a dangerous effect in neautral countries. Mansfield told the Senate that reports of Khrushchev's action tend to "humanize" the present Soviet regime.

Five power disarmament talks opened today in London. Representatives of the United States, Britain, France, Canada and Russia are meeting as a subcommittee of the United Nations disarmament commission. The British minister of state..Anthony Nutting..said the time had come "to replace mutual terror by mutual trust." As expected, Great Britain and France introduced their joint disarmament plan, embodying the most acceptable proposals to come out of past negotiations. American officials are said to feel that the joint plan is "too far reaching." Neither the United States nor Russia submitted their new proposals today.

Also in London, former Premier Malenkov had a 20-minute talk today with Prime Minister Eden. As Soviet minister of power stations, Malenkov was also taken on a tour of the atomic research center at Harwell.

Greek and Turkish partisans clashed on Cyprus today. Thirty of the rioters were injured. Greek Cypriots are demanding union with Greece. The Turkish minority on the island contends that if Britain ever gives up Cyprus, it should go to Turkey.

Israel charged today taat troops of Jordan's Arab Legion had fired on an Israeli patrol, along the road from Hebron to Beersheba. It is the first attack reported in the area since 1954. An Israeli spokesman says there were no casualties.

In Algeria, the French resident minister has issued a series of decrees, amounting to the imposition of a virtual state of emergency. As the same time, he outlined initial plans for economic and administrative reform.

In Montgomery, Alabama, today 90 Negroes were ordered brought to trial for violating a state law in their mass boycott of the city buses. A defense motion attacking the validity of the indictments was denied. Charges against three other defendants were dropped. The court granted a defense motion for separate trials.

Most of the adverse comment on President Eisenhower's foreign aid message ouoted from Washington today, objects to the amount of money asked for. Some of it also opposes commitments being made for more than a year at a time, even if no more than the hundred millions a year the President requested. Nobody of opinion has been noted that criticizes the Eisenhower program as not adeuate or imaginateve enough to meet the new economic offensive of the Kremlin.

The President justified the program on the grounds that the Soviet threat to the free world has changed and grown. But Congress apparently sees the Administration's counter-offensive simply as an increased charge on the national treasury.

This is notable for at least two reasons. One is the assumption that President Eisenhower now rates so high in national esteem that he should expect to get all he needs for his foreign policy, and now is probably not going to get it. The other reason is that the transformation of the Soviet strategy has been the most far-reaching developemtn in world affairs, if not since the world war, certainly since the Korean war. So one would expect congressional critique to be based on whether the President's program really meets the new dangers. But t is is the aspect that seems to be ignored.

The Administration at least recognizes the changed nature of the threat. Whether or not is shows anything like enough imagination, it is obvious it will get little stimulation from any lively Congressional concern over the new state of things. Much of the Congressional reaction so far, is much the same as recent reactions to any spending that is to reach foreigners at America's expense.

About two billions of the increase in foreign aid requested goes to refill the pipe line of military deliveries under the foreign aid program. This had been allowed to empty as a one-time devise to make a better showing in balancing the budget. That is, the increase now asked is not as bi as it looks. Even so, it looks too big for some Congressmen.

One Demoratic objection comes from Senator Mike Mansfield, who thinks too much is going for military aid and not enough for enconomic aid. But he himself voiced doubt about the President's request for ten year commitments at the rate of a hundred million a year. He recommends long-term loans at low interest rates instead.

President Eisenhower in his message warns that Soviet expansionism has merely taken on a somewhat different guise, and that its fundamental objective still is to disrupt and, in the end, dominate the free nations. He stressed the changes in Soviet strategy. "The Soviet maneuver, which is still devloping" he said, "includes offers of bi-lateral arrangements, which may involve provision of arms and capital goods, as well as technical assistance."Had we any reason to believe" he said, "that the Soviet leaders had abandoned their sinister objective, and now shared our own high purpose of helping other nations to develop freedom and independence, we would welcome the new Soviet Program, for it appears to have aspects of normal trade expansion and business competition." The world, he says, can welcome the respite from a Soviet policy of threat and violence, but he said: "it must take careful stock of what remains of it. The vast Soviet military establishment has not been scrapped. The threat implicit in this huge aggregation of military power still casts an ominous shadow over the world." In these words he is arguing for continuing military aid abroad.

On closer examination, the foreign aid program is found to go mostly for military uses. The outright military spending asked is abou three billion dollars. The largest single sum assigned to the economic field is really for defense; this is a billion, three hundred million, It is explained this is designed to help nations strengthen their economies to the point where they can support the military establishments they are now acquiring.

The kind of aid that aims at combatting communism by raising standards of living is relatively quite small. The sum destined for what is called "development assistance", is which includes the all-important field of agriculture, is a hundred and seventy millions, while the Point Four program of technical assistance is a hundred and fifty-seven million.

This may be the wrong time to call attention to the small emphasis on economic aid. If Congress, in an election year, balks at a program of predominantly military aid, it would balk still more at one predominantly non-military. And it may be that the Administration is hard at work making a whole new foreign policy, that takes full account of the new nature of the cold war. If so, the time to judge its policy is not now, when only an interim request for funds is being made. However, there is no evidence in the interim request that a bold and imaginative approach is in preparation. Knowledge of it certainly is not clearly reflected in the message.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: There is some objection, in Congress, to the price tag on the new foreign aid program. H. G. Wells said, "Nothing is dear, if it is good." The issue would appear to be a question of relative values. John Heywood observed, "A piece of a kid is worth two of a cat. One leg of a lark is worth the whole body of a kite."

Good Night and Good Luck.

This is the news:

Hearings on President Eisenhower's new foreign aid program opened today before the House Foreign Affairs Committee. The first witness was Herbert Hoover, Jr., the acting secretary of state. Hoover said the program... calling for expenditure of nearly 5-billion dollars... is necessary to meet Russia's new economic offensive. He said authority to make long-range commitments would provide "a larger measure of flexibility." Strong opposition has been voiced to the President's request for this authority. Hoover explained that it would enable the government "to take prompt action in situations where assistance is wise, before others, hostile to free world objectives, exploit them dangerously." He emphasized that the rate of spending, under the new program, would remain about the same.

The Senate began debate today on a proposal for changing the Electoral College system. Under the present system, the presidential candidate receiving a plurality of the popular vote in any state, receives all of that state's electoral votes. / The proposed constitutional amendment, would divide the state's electoral votes more along the lines of the popular vote. / Today, Democratic Senator Douglas denounced the plan as an attempt by one-party states "to dominate the choice of President." / He said it would deprive city voters of fair representation, and create "chaos and confusion". Democratic Senator Barkley called for direct popular election of the president and vice president... doing away with the Electoral College system altogether.

→

Republican Senate Leader Knowland predicted today, that President Eisenhower will veto the farm bill, passed by the Senate last night, unless it is modified in the Senate-House conference committee. / He said Secretary of Agriculture Benson regards the measure... in its present form... "unworkable". / The bill includes the soil bank program requested by the President, but would increase the price supports for corn, cotton and wheat. / Farmers, moreover, would be required to take part in the soil bank, in order to qualify for these supports. The Administration favors a voluntary soil bank program.

This was primary day in Minnesota... with Adlai Stevenson and Senator Kefauver fighting for the state's 28 votes at the Democratic national convention. The weather was ideal, and voting was heavy in the major cities, where Stevenson is supposed to have most of his strength. Voting in the rural areas got off to a slow start, then began picking up later in the day. The polls will be open for another hour, and there are no returns.

British Prime Minister Eden went before the House of Commons today, to report on plans for the visit to England next month of Soviet Premier Bulganin and Communist Party Boss Khrushchev. Eden said the "primary object" of the visit is serious political discussion. Two of the 10 days that Khrushchev and Bulganin will be in England have been set aside for high-level talks. Eden said the Russian leaders would arrive at Portsmouth, aboard a Soviet warship, on April 18th.

France agreed today to recognize the independence of Tunisia. The protocol... signed by French and Tunisian representatives in Paris... calls for further talks next month, to define a relationship of inter-dependence, and to draw up a program of cooperation in matters of defense and foreign affairs.

The American ambassador to France... Douglas Dillon... expressed American support today for French policies in North Africa. Dillon voiced the support in a speech before a meeting of the French Diplomatic Press Association. It was noted that Dillon repeatedly confined American support to "liberal" French policies. It was an adjective he said he borrowed from Premier Mollet's own description of France's program. He acknowledged, however, that the Algerian elections promised by Mollet, could not be held so long as disorders continued. Those who take part in "blind terrorism", he said, "should not for a moment imagine that they have the support of my government."

In New Delhi today, Prime Minister Nehru accepted President Eisenhower's invitation to visit the United States. Nehru said he would go to Washington the first week of July, "for a brief visit of three or four days."

In the Indian parliament today, Nehru attacked the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization and the Baghdad Pact. He said the Seato powers... at their recent meeting... took sides with Pakistan in the dispute over Kashmir. And the Baghdad Pact, he said, "has rent Arab unity asunder."

Britain accused the Communists today of trying to partition the Indo-China state of Laos. The British Foreign Office noted that Communist rebels had refused to surrender their control of two northern provinces, as called for by the agreement ending the Indo-China War.

The Chinese Nationalists today announced the first Communist bombardment of Quemoy in five months. The announcement said Communist artillery fired 45 rounds, but inflicted no damage on installations on the island. The Nationalists also said a Communist naval raid on Matsu was repulsed. Five Red gunboats reportedly took part in the action.

Negotiations between Russia and Japan over a peace treaty were adjourned indefinitely today. The talks... which have been in progress in London for the last nine months... became deadlocked on the issue of Japanese territory occupied by Russia during World War Two.

The United States asked tonight for a meeting of the United Nations Security Council to consider "the Palestine question". In requesting the council meeting, American Ambassador Lodge said border incidents were "recurring at a dangerous rate." Consequently, he asked for " urgent and early action by the Security Council to consider the situation now prevailing in the Palestine area."

Bob White

The charge that Khrushchev made against Stalin, in his celebrated speech in the secret meeting of the Communist party, was not that he had been a tyrant, but that he had been a mad tyrant. / This distinction should be made, if events in the Soviet Union are to be seen in perspective. / The tyrannical Communist dictatorship is not being destroyed, now that Stalin's reputation is being destroyed. The much-vaunted collective leadership is just another name for oligarchy, and the tyranny of an oligarchy can be just as tyrannical as that of a single despot.

This is true despite what Malenkov told British Labor Party leaders at a private dinner in London last night. He said that not only had collective leadership been established, but so had the right to dissent outside the collective leadership, without the dissenter being branded a traitor. / This may sound liberal, but it isn't. / In theory communists have always had the right of dissent before a party decision was reached. / They are supposed to be free to debate policy in party meetings to their heart's content. / But once the decision falls they must accept it, support it, and execute it - or else. / What Malenkov seemed to be saying was that this principle stands. It is a change from Stalinism that a premier whose policy is repudiated, as Malenkov's was, should remain alive. / It is notable that Malenkov has kept his place as one of the oligarchy, and now is trusted with a mission to London to soften up the British for the coming visit of Krushchev and Bulganin.

In the days of the mad terror, he would have lost his head. Now, in a sense, he is Exhibit A that the mad terror is over. But he also is Exhibit A that there still is no true freedom to oppose in the Soviet Union. Malenkov had to confess in public the error of his ways. The error, you will recall, was to want the Five Year Plan to concentrate on consumer goods. He ate his words, he ate them publicly. He made a sorry figure eating them, and then he took up a humble position on the outskirts where he once had been Big Number One.

Foreign Minister Molotov is Exhibit B. He went through the same humiliation of public confession, not only once but several times. And he too kept a place in the oligarchy. But his way of doing it, like Malenkov's, is proof that dissent is not possible in the oligarchy. And dissent in the party, after policy is once decided, is just as tabu so far as we know. It must be, if the dictatorship is to work.

Malenkov, at the London dinner, said Russia had been "cleaned up". But when he said: "We have effectively prevented the repetition of the Stalin dictatorship", and was asked to tell in detail how it was done, he answered only: "We have done it."

What device could have been invented to prevent the dictatorship of an oligarchy turning into the dictatorship of a madman, which it once did, or even into the dictatorship of a single man who is not insane, is hard to imagine. ~~Under the Communist system, which is based on dictatorship, such a device could hardly work. The only real curb to tyranny is the democratic control of the leadership. Nobody pretends that this has been established in Russia, or is on the horizon, or even just beyond the horizon.~~

There are several theories as to the motives behind the Kremlin decision to destroy the Stalin myth. One is that it was done altogether for its effect on foreign opinion, which no doubt will be great. It will do much to promote the united-front strategy in France, Italy and other countries, with communist or socialist strength. Maybe England is to be the first testing ground for the new line when Khrushchev and Bulganin arrive. If the Labor Party falls for it, then indeed the anti-Communist coalition will soon go to pieces, the Kremlin will triumph and the United States will be left in hazardous semi-isolation.

Another theory is that the anti-Stalin drive had domestic motives, and that Krushchev and his colleagues found they had to break the hold Stalin had on Soviet minds before they could control those minds themselves.

Still another theory is that the army ordered it. ~~The public admission that Tukachevsky and his staff colleagues were executed on trumped-up charges points that way. But so far the evidence strongly indicates that the party leaders are masters of Marshal Zhukov, not the other way around.~~

~~However,~~ Some role for the army in the story cannot be denied. One of the still dark chapters in that story is the execution of Beria. When Stalin died Beria was the one heir who had a private army. He commanded the forces built up by the secret police. It appears that he surrounded Moscow with his forces and was about to seize power. Then suddenly he found himself under arrest and was whisked off to a treason trial and death. This would not have been possible if the other heirs had not been able to rely on the regular army. And they may well have paid a price for that aid, and it may have been this open repudiation of Stalin's misdeeds.

But it would be absurd to suggest that the Russian army is demanding the dismantling of the dictatorship. If the army aspires to power, it will need the dictatorship itself. And, I might add, it would feel at home in it.

Word for Today

The Soviet leaders are debunking Stalin. John Milton once wrote, "It is lawful, and hath been held so through all ages, for anyone who has the power to call to account a tyrant." But Thomas Jefferson said, "I have sworn upon the altar of God eternal hostility against every form of tyranny over the mind of man."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

TUESDAY, MARCH 20, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

Hearings on President Eisenhower's new foreign aid program opened today before the House Foreign Affairs Committee. The first witness was Herbert Hoover, Jr., the acting secretary of state. Hoover said the program.. calling for expenditure of nearly 5 - billion dollars..is necessary to meet Russia's new economic offensive. He said authroity to make long-range commitments would provide "a larger measure of flexibility." Strong opposition has been voiced to the President's request for this authroity. Hoover explained that it would unable the government "to take prompt action in situations where assistance is wise before others, hostile to free world objectives, exploit them dangerously." He emphasized that the rate of spending, under the new program, would reaain about the same.

The Senate began today on a proposal for changing the Electoral College system. Under the present system, the presidential candidate receiving a plurality of the popular vote in any state receives all of that state's electoral votes. The proposed constitutional amendment would divide the state's electoral votes more along the lines of the popular vote. Today, Democratic Seantor Douglas denounced the plan as an attempt by one-party states "to dominate the choice of President." He said it would deprive city voters of fair representation and create "chaos and confusion". Democratic Senator Barkley caled for direct popular election of the president and vice president..doing away with the Electoral College system altogether.

Republican Senate Leader Knowland predicted today that President Eisenhower will veto the farm bill passed by the Senate last night, unless it is modified in the Senate-House conference committee. He said Secretary of Agriculture Benson regards the measure..in its present form.."unworkable". The bill includes the soil bank program requested by the President, but would increase the price supports for corn, cotton and wheat. Farmers, moreover, would be required to take part in the soil bank in order to qualify for these supports. The Administration favors a voluntary soil bank program.

This was primary day in Minnesota...with Adlai Stevenson and Senator Kefauver fighting for the state's 28 votes at the Democratic national convention. The weather was ideal, and voting was heavy in the major cities, where Stevenson is supposed to have most of his strength. Voting in the rural areas got off to a slow start, then began picking up later in the day. The polls will be open for another hour, and there are no returns.

British Prime Minister Eden went before the House of Commons today, to report on plans for the visit to England next month of Soviet Premier Bulganin and Communist Party Boss Khrushchev. Eden said the "primary object" of the visit is serious political discussion. Two of the 10 days that Khurshchev and Bulganin will be in England have been set aside for high-level talks. Eden said the Russian leaders would arrive at Portsmouth, aboard a Soviet warship, on April 18th.

France agreed today to recognize the independence of Tunisia. The protocal..signed by French and Tunisian representatives in Paris .,calls for further talks next month, to define a relationship of inter- dependence, and to draw up a program of cooperation in matters of defense and foreign affairs.

The American ambassador to France..Douglas Dillon..expressed American support today for French policies in North Africa. Dillon voiced the support in a speech before a meeting of the French Diplomatic Press Association. It was noted that Dillon repeatedly confined American support to "liberal" French

French policies. It was an adjective he said he borrowed from Premier Mollet's own description of France's program. He acknowledged, however, that the Algerian elections promised by Mollet could not be held so long as disorders continued. Those who take part in "blind terrorism", he said, "should not for a moment imagine that they have the support of my government."

In New Delhi today, Prime Minister Nehru accepted President Eisenhower's invitation to visit the United States. Nehru said he would go to Washington the first week of July "for a brief visit of three or four days."

In the Indian parliament today, Nehru attacked the Southeast Aisa Treaty Organization and the Baghdad Pact. He said the Seato powers..at their recent meeting..took sides with Pakistan in the dispute over Kashmir. And the Baghdad Pact, he said, "has rent Arab unity asunder."

Negotiations between Russia and Japan over a peace treaty were adjourned indefinitely today. The talks..which have been in progress in London for the last nine months..became deadlocked on the issue of Japanese territory occupied by Russia during World War Two.

The United States asked tonight for a meeting of the United Nations security Council to consider "the Palestine question". In requesting the council meeting, American Ambassador Lodge said border indidents were "recurring at a dangerous rate." Consequently, he asked for "urgent and early action by the Security Coundil to consider the situation now prevailing in the Palestine area."

The charge that Khurshchev made against Stalin, in his celebrated speech in the secret meeting of the Communist party, was not that he had been a tyrant, but that he had been a mad tyrant. This distinction should be made, if events in the Soviet Union are to be seen in perspective. The tyrannical Communist deicatorship is not being destroyed, now that Stalin's reputation is being destroyed. The much - vaunted collective leadership is just another name for oligarchy, and the tyranny of an oligarchy can be just as tyrannical as that of a single despot.

This is true despite what Malenkov told British Labor Party leaders at a private dinner in London last night. He said that not only had collective leadership been established, but so had the right to dissent outside the collective leadership, without the dissenter being branded a traitor. This may sound liberal, but it isn't. In theory communists have always had the right of dissent before a party decision was reached. They are supposed to be free to debate policy in party meetings to their heart's content. But once the decision falls, they must accept it, support it, and execute it - or else. What Malenkov seemed bo be saying was that his principle stands. It is a change from Stalinism that a premier whose policy is repudiated, as Malenkov's was, should remain alive. It is notable that Malenkov has kept his place as one of the oligarchy, and now is trusted with a mission to London, to soften up the British for the coming visit of Khrushchev and Bulganin.

In the days of the mad terror, he would have lost his head. Now, in a sense, he is Exhibit A that the mad terror is over. But he also is Exhibit A that there still is no true freedom to oppose in the Soviet Union.

Malenkov had to confess in public the error of his ways, The error, you willrecall, was towant the Five Year Plan to concentrate on consumer goods. He ate his words, he ate them publicly. He made a sorry figure eating them, and then he took up a humble position on the outskirts where he once had been Big Number One.

Foreign Minister Molotov is Exhibit B. He went through the same humiliation of public confession, not on y once but several times. And he too kept a place in the oligarchy. But his way of doing it, like Malenkov's is proof that dissent is not possible in the oligarchy. And dissent in the party, after policy is once decided, is just as tabu ao far as we know. It must be, if the dictatorship is to work.

Malenkov, at the London dinner, said Russia had been "cleaned up". But when he said: "We have effectively prevented the repetition of the Stalin dictatorship", and was asked to tell in detail how it was done, he answered only: "We have done it."

What device could have been invented to prevent the dictatorship as an oligarchy turning into the dictatorship of a madman, which it once did, or even into the dictatorship of a single man who is not insane, is hard to imagine.

There are several theories as to the motives behind the Kremlin decision to destroy the Stalin myth. One is that it was done altogether for its effect on foreign opinion, which no doubt will be great. It will do much to promote the united - front strategy in France, Italy and other countries, with communist or socialist strength. Maybe England is to be the first testing ground for the new line when Khrushchev and Bulganin arrive. If the Labor Party falls for it, then indeed the anti-Communist coalition will soon go to pieces, the Kremlin will triumph and the United States will be left in hazardous semi-isolation.

Another theory is that the anti-Stalin drive had domestic motives, and that Khrushchev and his colleagues found they had to break the hold Stalin had on Soviet minds before they could control those minds themselves.

Still another theory is that the army ordered it. Some role for the army in the story cannot be denied. One of the still dark chapters in that story is the execution of Beria. When Stalin died, Beria was the one heir who had a private army. He commanded the forces built up by the secret police. It appears that he surrounded Moscow with his forces and was about to seize power. Then suddenly he found himself under arrest and was whisked off to a treason trial and death. This would not have been possible if the other heirs had not been able to rely on the regular army. And they may well have paid a price for that aid, and it may have been this open repudiation of Stalin's misdeeds.

But it would be absure to suggest that the Russian army is demanding the dismantling of the dictatorship. If the army aspires to power, it will need the dictatorship itslef. And, I might add, it would feel right at home in it.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Hite.

HITE :COMMERCIAL

MURROW: The Soviet leaders are debunking Stalin. John Milton once wrote, "It is lawful, and hath been held so through all ages, for anyone who has the power to call to account a tyrant." But Thomas Jefferson said, "I have sworn upon the alter of God, eternal hostility against every form of tyranny over the mind of man."

Good Night and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Wed., March 21, 1956

This is the news:

The United States tonight made public the text of the resolution it will submit to the United Nations Security Council, for preserving [redacted] peace in the Middle East. The resolution... which probably will be submitted to the council on Monday... asks United Nations Secretary General Hammarskjold to undertake a survey of the Palestine situation, and arrange for the adoption of measures that would lead to a lessening of tensions between Israel and the Arab states. Three measures are suggested in the draft resolution. They are: Withdrawal of Israeli and Arab forces from the armistice demarcation lines, full freedom of movement along those armistice lines, and in the defensive areas of either side, and establishment of local arrangements to prevent border incidents. The resolution states that continuance of the present situation "is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security."

President Eisenhower said at his news conference today that any major conflict in the Middle East "would be a catastrophe to the world."

→

He said the United States is trying to make the Middle East countries see that their best interest lies in mediation. He added that he will confer tonight with Secretary of State Dulles, who is just back from his Asian tour. In Tel Aviv today, the Israeli prime minister... David Ben Gurion... told a group of American editors that Premier Nasser of Egypt is a prisoner of his military junta, and that Nasser may be forced to make war on Israel. Ben Gurion called the situation "very serious".

President Eisenhower... at his news conference... warned that in this country, the segregation dispute must not be regarded as "a tremendous fight that is going to separate Americans." He said: "Again I plead for understanding, for really sympathetic consideration of a problem that is far larger than most of us realize." Yet, he said, "it is incumbent on all the South to show some progress" toward complying with the Supreme Court decision outlawing segregation in the public schools.

Mr. Eisenhower said he would want to "study" the returns from the Minnesota primary, before commenting on Senator Kefauver's upset victory over Adlai Stevenson. But he brushed off Kefauver's suggestion that the vote reflected a revolt against his agricultural program. Mr. Eisenhower indicated... strongly... that he will veto the farm bill, if it reaches him in its present form. He called it an "unworkable" measure, and expressed hope that it will be improved by the Senate-House conference committee.

Latest returns from the Minnesota primary show Senator Kefauver in possession of 26 of the state's 30 votes at the Democratic national convention. Adlai Stevenson has only two sure votes, with the contest for the other two still in doubt. On the basis of present returns, Kefauver got 57-thousand more votes than Stevenson at the polls. Only about 150 of the 38-hundred precincts have still to report. Stevenson says he has no intention of withdrawing from the race for the Democratic presidential nomination. He said he would work harder than ever. "I am no longer the front runner." Kefauver said he took satisfaction in the fact that he polled more votes than President Eisenhower on the Republican side of the primary. He thought some Republicans voted for him, in protest against the President's farm program... but he attributed a lot of his success to hard work.

The Atomic Energy Commission announced tonight, that Russia exploded [redacted] "another nuclear device within the past few days." [redacted] The announcement gave no details.

The United States proposed an experiment in international disarmament today, with as much as 30-thousand square miles of territory in this country and Russia, set aside for the test. The proposal was made by Harold Stassen, President Eisenhower's special assistant on disarmament, at the current arms conference in London. The territory, in the pilot experiment, would be patrolled by inspection teams, made up of representatives of the United States, Russia, Canada, Britain and France. (These are the five powers represented on the United Nations subcommittee on disarmament.) The territory would serve as a kind of laboratory, for the testing of disarmament controls. Stassen suggested that the area include... among other installations... at least one seaport and an airfield. The inspection teams would be allowed to carry out tests of port control, make aerial pictures and report back to the U.N. subcommittee. So far, Russia has not reacted to the American proposal.

Secretary of the Air Force Quarles said today that the Air Force has been assigned overall responsibility for developing the intercontinental ballistic missile. He revealed further, that the Air Force is engaged in three ballistic missile projects---development of the "Atlas" and the "Titan", both intercontinental rockets, and the "Thor", an intermediate missile, with a 15-hundred-mile range. Quarles said the Air Force is giving these projects "the highest priority".

On Cyprus, a time bomb was found today in the bed of Sir John Harding, the British governor of the island. The bomb failed because of faulty construction. It had been hidden in the mattress. ~~A Greek Cypriot... employed at Government House... is being sought for questioning.~~

A British soldier was killed on Cyprus today, by a bomb hurled at the patrol car in which he was riding. Two suspects were arrested.

A new incident was reported today on the border of India and Pakistan. Pakistan charged that Indian troops fired on its border police. It said the police returned the fire. No casualties were reported.

Fighting is reported to have broken out between rival Nationalist groups in Algeria. The reports vary. Reuters says at least 33 Moslems were massacred in a mountain village, in reprisal for the murder of three Nationalist guerrillas. The Associated Press reports the discovery... by French authorities... of 20 political assassinations among the Moslem population. ~~A.P. says the conflict appears to be between the National Algerian Movement and the National Liberation Front.~~

Edward R. Murrow: March 21, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

The speech Ambassador Dillon made in Paris yesterday, in praise of France's liberal policy in North Africa was remarkable because it succeeded in being both anti-colonial and pro-French. It was pro-French enough to give genuine gratification to the French, and it did it without ruining our standing with colonial peoples. Ordinarily it would take magic to manage this in a single speech. Mr. Dillon did not use magic, he took advantage of the first moment in France's modern colonial history when our sincerest congratulations could be offered. Morocco and Tunis have both been granted their independence.

Obviously Mr. Dillon was not acting on his own. It was the State Department that seized upon the first moment when France could be so heartily praised. The department has been torn by a continual difference between those who want us to support our allies despite their colonial troubles - on the ground that it is imperative to keep our allies - and those who see the necessity of our competing for leadership of colonial peoples with the Kremlin. ~~Before Morocco was granted independence, the pro-French element couldn't out-argue the anti-colonial element. So we said nothing about our support of France. When Morocco was given its independence, the two factions in Washington could agree on a message congratulating France for this one act.~~

But ~~this did no good. It annoyed the French, who thought we were pressuring them to do for Tunis, and even Algeria, what had been done for Morocco.~~ But when Tunisia also won its independence, the two factions in Washington could ~~agree on giving France a resounding vote of approval.~~

The Dillon speech ~~is something more than this.~~ It contains an important formula, one that presumably will apply to all our allies having colonial troubles. We favor liberal policies, we approve negotiations and elections, and we roundly denounce terrorism. This came out in what Mr. Dillon had to say about Algeria. He recognized that Algeria is part of France, and admitted that not everyone in the United States understood it to be. Then he warmly recommended the way of negotiations. The Algerian problem he saw as one of co-existence, between eight million Moslems and a million, two hundred thousand French residents. He welcomed the French proposal of negotiations between the two communities, with elections to choose the negotiators. "But we all know" he went on to say, "that elections cannot take place while disorder reigns. My countrymen" he declared, "have always been shocked by blind acts of terrorism, and those who take part in such activity, should not for a moment imagine they have the support of my government, or of any segment of our public opinion."

This endorsement of negotiations pleased most of the French in France but not the French in Algeria. These latter are confirmed die-hards in opposing concessions to the Moslems. ~~Incidentally, let me say, they spend lavishly in France to support conservatives and Right Wing extremists like the Poujadists.~~ They believe that negotiations are bound to end white supremacy, and ultimately bring about severance from France. This might be called the French version of the white-supremacy issue. But this time the State Department could displease the Algerian French without displeasing the French government and the bulk of French opinion.

It remains to be seen whether the new formula will apply everywhere. If it does, it would seem to line us up against the terrorists on Cyprus, and on the side of the British so long as they keep their promise to negotiate when order is restored.

The Dillon speech had still further importance; it brought back sweetness and light in our relations with France. The French have been growing sour toward us for a long time. For example, they are strongly against the Bagdad Pact, which they think Washington made largely for military reasons. It split the Arab world and infuriated Colonel Nasser in Egypt, with the result that he stepped up his propaganda in North Africa and multiplied the French difficulties.

Foreign Minister Pinaud felt driven to make two quite sinister statements. He said that apparently America was hoping to fall heir to the mastery of North Africa. And he said that our policy toward the Soviet Union went too far for him to follow. That is, he rocked the coalition boat. Premier Mollet, on his visit to Sir Anthony Eden in London ten days ago, was considerably quieted down. Now we have at long last broken silence about supporting France.

We were able to do this because France finally took a bold and liberal course in North Africa, so the merit is France's, not ours. But it is a merit on the part of Washington that it has put into words where we do stand on the independence movements in the colonies of our allies, with special reference to terrorism when that enters the picture. It looks as though we may have finally hammered out a policy on what has been a baffling subject.

Word for Today

Ambassador Dillon sought... diplomatically... to reconcile two conflicting loyalties. Edmund Burke said, "All government, indeed every virtue and every prudent act, is founded on compromise." James Russell Lowell did not agree. "Compromise," he said, makes a good umbrella... but a poor roof."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 21, 1956
7:45—8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

The United States tonight made public the text of the resolution it will submit to the United Nations Security Council, for preserving peace in the Middle East. The resolution..which probably will be submitted to the council on Monday..asks United Nations Secretary General Hammarskjold to undertake a survey of the Palestine situation, and arrange for the adoption of measures that would lead to a lessening of tensions between Israel and the Arab states. Three measures are suggested in the draft resolution. They are: Withdrawal of Israeli and Arab forces from the armistice demarcation lines, full freedom of movement along those armisticelines, and in the defensive areas of either side, and establishment of local arrangements to prevent border incidents. The resolution states that continuance of the present situation "is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security."

President Eisenhower said at his news conference today that any major conflict in the Middle East "would be a catastrophe to the world." He said the United States is trying to make the Middle East conntries see that their best interest lies in mediation. He added that he will confer tonight with Secretary of State Dulles, who is just back from his Asian tour. In Tel Aviv today the Israeli prime minister David Ben Gurion..told a group of American editors that Premier Nasser of Egypt is a prisoner of his military junta, and that Nasser may be forced to make war on Israel. Ben Gurion called the situation "very serious."

President Eisenhower..at his news conference..warned that in this country the ssegregation dispute must not be regarded as "a tremendous fight that is going to separate Americans " He said: "Again I plead for understanding, for really sympathetic consideration of a problem that is far larger tnan most of us realize." Yet, he said, "It is incumbent on all the South to show some progress" toward complying with the Supreme Court decision outlawing segregation in the public schools.

Mr. Eisenhower said he would want to "study" the returns from the Minnesota primary, before commenting on Senator Kefauver's upset victory over Adlai Stevenson. But he brushed off Kefauver's suggestion that the vote reflected a revolt against his agricultural program. Mr. Eisenhower indicated.. strongly..that he will veto the farm bill, if it reaches him in its present form. He called it an "unworkable" measure, and expressed hope that it will be improved by the Senate-House conference committee.

Latest returns from the Minnesota primary show Senator Kefauver in possession of 26 of the state's 30 votes at the Democratic national convention. Adlai Stevenson has only two sure votes, with the contest for the other two still in doubt. On the basis of present returns, Kefauver got 57 - thousand more votes than Stevenson at the polls. Only about 150 of the 38-hundred precincts have still to report. Stevenson says he has no intention of withdrawing from the race for the Democratic presidential nomination. He said he would work harder than ever. "I am no longer the front runner". Kefauver said he took satisfaction in the fact that he polled more votes than President Eisenhower on the Republican side of the primary. He thought some Republicans voted for him, in protest against the President's farm program..but attributed a lot of his success to hard work.

The Atomic Energy Commission announced tonight that Russia exploded "another nuclear device within the past few days." The announcement gave no details.

The United States proposed an experiment in international disarmament today, with as much as 30-thousand square miles of territory in this country and Russia set aside for the test. The proposal was made by Harold Stassen, President Eisenhower's special assistant on disarmement, at the current arms conference in London. The territory, in the pilot experiment, would be patrolled by inspection teams made up of representatives of the United States, Russia, Canada, Britain and France. These are the five powers represented on the United Nations subcommittee on disarmement. The territory would serve as a kind of laboratory, for the testing of disarmament controls. Stassen suggested that the area include..among other installations..at least one seaport and airfield. The inspection teams would be allowed to carry out tests of port control, make aerial pictures and report back to the U.N. subcommittee. So far, Russia has not reacted to the American proposals.

Secretary of the Airforce Quarles said today that the Air Force has been assigned overall responsibility for developing the intercontinental ballistic missile. He revealed further, that the Air Force is engaged in three ballistic missile projects--development of the "Atlas" and the "Titan", both intercontinental rockets, and the "Thor", an intermediate missile with a 15-hundred -mile range. Quarles said the Air Force is giving thest projects "the highest priority".

On Cyprus, a time bomb was found today in the bed of Sir John Harding, the British governor of the island. The bomb failed because of faulty construction. It had been hidden in the mattress.

A British soldier was killed on Cyprus today, by a bomb hurled at the patrol car in which he was riding. Two suspects were arrested.

A new incident was reported today on the border of India and Pakistan. Pakistan charged that Indian troops fired on its border police. It said the police returned the fire. No casualties were reported.

Fighting is reported to have broken out between rival Nationalist groups in Algeria. The reports vary, Reuters says at least 33 Moslems were massacred in a mountain village, in reprisal for the murder of three Nationalist guerrillas. The Associated Press reports the discovery..by French authorities ..of 20 political assassinations among the Moslem population.

The speech Ambassador Dillon made in Paris yesterday, in praise of France's liberal policy in North Africa was remarkable because it succeeded inbeing both anti-colonial and pro-French. It was pro-French enough to give genuine gratification to the French, and it did it without ruining our standing with colonial peoples. Ordinarily it would take magic to manage this in a single speech. Mr. Dillon did not use magic, he took advantage of the first moment in France's modern colonial history when our sincerest congratulations could be offered. Morocco and Tunis have both been granted their independence.

Obviously Mr. Dillon was not acting on his own. It was the State Department that siezed upon the first moment when France could be so heartily praised. The department has been torn by a continual difference between those who want us to support our allies despite their colonial troubles - on the ground that it is imperative to keep our allies - and those who see the necessity of our competing for leadership of colonial peoples with the Kremlin.

The Dillon sppech contains an important formula, one that presumably will apply to all our allies having colonial troubles. We favor liberal policies, we approve negotiations and elections, and we roundly denounce terrorism. This came out in what Mr. Dillon had to say about Algeria. He recognized that Algeria is part of France, and admitted that not everyone in the United States understood it to be. Then he warmly recommended the way of negotiations. The Algerian problem he saw as one of co-existence between eight million

Moslems and a million, two hundred thousand French residents. He welcomed the French proposal of negotiations between the two communities, with elections to choose the negotiators. "But we all know" he went on to say, "that elections cannot take place while disorder reigns. My countrymen" he declared, "have always been shocked by blind acts of terrorism, and those who take part in such activity should not for a moment imagine they have the support of my government or of any segment of our public opinion."

This endorsement of negotiations pleased most of the French in France but not the French in Algeria. These latter are confirmed die-hards in opposing concessions to the Moslems. They believe that negotiations are bound to end white supremacy, and ultimately bring about severance from France. This might be called the French version of the white-supremacy issue. But this time the State Department could displease the Algerian French without displeasing the French government and the bulk of French opinion.

It remains to be seen whether the new formula will apply everywhere. If it does, it would seem to line us up against the terrorists on Cyprus, and on the side of the British so long as they keep their promise to negotiate when order is restored.

The Dillon speech had still further importance; it brought back sweetness and light in our relations with France. The French have been growing sour toward us for a long time. For example, they are strongly against the Baghdad Pact, which they think Washington made largely for military reasons. It split the Arab world and infuriated Colonel Nasser in Egypt, with the result that he stepped up his propaganda in North Africa and multiplied the French difficulties.

Foreign Minister Pinaud felt driven to make two quite sinister statements. He said that apparently America was hoping to fall heir to the mastery of North Africa. And he said that our policy toward the Soviet Union went too far for him to follow. That is, he rocked the coalition boat. Premier Mollet, on his visit to Sir Anthony Eden in London ten days ago, was considerably quieted down. Now we have at long last broken silence about supporting France.

We were able to do this because France finally took a bold and liberal course in North Africa, so the merit is France's, not ours. But it is a merit on the part of Washington that it has put into words where we do stand on the independence movements in the colonies of our allies, with special reference to terrorism when that enters the picture. It looks as though we hay have finally hammered out a policy on what has been a baffling subject.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: Ambassador Dillon sought,.diplomatically..to reconcile two conflicting loyalties. Edmund Burke said, "All government, indeed every virtue and every prudent act, is founded on compromise." James Russell Lowell did not agree "Compromise", he said, makes a good umbrella..but a poor roof."

Good Night and Good Luck!

Edward R. Murrow Thurs., March 22, 1956

This is the news:

France has proposed a meeting of the foreign ministers of the United States, Britain and France, to discuss Middle East policy. French Foreign Minister Pineau suggests that the talks be held in Paris, during the spring meeting of the ministers of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. [That meeting usually is held early in May.] A State Department spokesman says the French government made the proposal "informally", and no final decisions have been made. The spokesman was asked whether President Eisenhower plans to ask Congress for authority to intervene militarily in the Middle East, should intervention... in his opinion... be warranted. The spokesman said he had no knowledge of plans for such a request.

At the United Nations, a special session of the Security Council has been called for Monday... to take up an American resolution, designed to lessen tensions in the Middle East. Specifically, the resolution asks the U.N. secretary general... Dag Hammarskjold... to make a survey of the Middle East situation, with a view to reducing tensions between Israel and the Arab states. Informed sources at the United Nations say that if the resolution is approved, Hammarskjold will leave for the Middle East late next week, and stay for about three weeks.

Secretary of State Dulles reported to President Eisenhower... and Republican and Democratic congressional leaders today, on his 19-day Asian tour. Republican Senator Bridges said Mr. Dulles made "a moderately optimistic" report.

My colleague, Charles Von Fremd, who covers the White House, has obtained a story from an Administration source which has a direct bearing on the troubled international situation. For that story, we switch to Washington and Charles von Fremd.

(piece runs 4:25, ends on cue: "Now back to Ed Murrow in New York)

Dispatches from Tunisia report the heaviest action there in three years. / At least 70 rebels, out of a group estimated at 200, were killed in Southern Tunisia today by French fighter planes and troops. / The fighters flew low and machine-gunned scattered rebel forces as they tried to escape. / In Tunis, police used tear gas to break up a demonstration by several thousand Arab nationalists. Forty of the demonstrators were arrested. Tunisia was granted independence yesterday, but within the framework of inter-dependence with France.

The United States offered today to cut its armed forces to two and a half million men, if Russia will do the same. / The proposal was made at the meeting, in London, of the United Nations subcommittee on disarmament. The American delegate... Harold Stassen... emphasized that other countries, like Britain and France, would be expected to reduce their armed forces proportionately. He said the proposal "presupposes" East-West agreement on a workable inspection system.

The chief of Russia's secret police arrived in London today, to check security arrangements for the visit next month of Soviet Premier Bulganin, and Communist Party Boss Khrushchev. Editorials in London newspapers called the police chief... Ivan Serov... a "thug" and a "jackal". Aviation experts noted that he arrived in a jet airliner of advanced design, similar to Russia's top-secret TU-104 BOMBER.

In Washington, the NATO commander... General Gruenther... testified today before the House Foreign Affairs Committee. Gruenther said Russia has "tremendous" military strength... and it is growing. But Russia, he said, would lose any war it started now because of the present superiority of the West in long-range air power. He said that on the ground in Europe, NATO is not yet strong enough "to be certain of resisting successfully an all-out act of aggression." Gruenther made these statements in appealing for approval of the Administration's new foreign aid program. Three billion, of the nearly 5-billion dollars requested, would go for military assistance.

The Senate majority leader... Lyndon Johnson... said today that the Democrats will insist on high price supports in the farm bill, despite the possibility of a presidential veto. Johnson made his prediction after a talk with House Speaker Rayburn. Separate farm bills have been passed by the Senate and the House. On Monday, House and Senate conferees will start work on a compromise measure.

Senator Margaret Chase Smith today urged amendment of the Constitution, so that the President and Vice President may be nominated... and elected... by direct popular vote, instead of under the Electoral College system. Mrs. Smith said that under the present system, it is practically impossible for a woman to be nominated. "Yet the majority of voters," she said, "are women." She suggested a good start would be for qualified women to enter the preferential primaries.

Democratic Senator Kefauver arrived in San Francisco today, to start campaigning for the California primary on June 5th. Adlai Stevenson, whom Kefauver beat badly in Minnesota, has also filed in California. Kefauver said today he "does not know it to be a fact" that Governor Harriman of New York will now become an active candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination.

In Montgomery, Alabama, the Reverend Martin Luther King was convicted today as a leader of the Negro boycott of the city buses. The court ordered a fine of 500 dollars. The defense said it would appeal. And the state agreed to postpone the trials of the other 89 defendants, pending that action.

Railroads... operating in the eastern and western states... have asked the Interstate Commerce Commission for permission to raise their passenger fares by 5 percent, effective May first. A railroad spokesman said commutation fares would not be affected.

In Pittsburgh, the AFL-CIO transport workers voted today to strike against the Pennsylvania Railroad next Thursday, unless the railroad agrees to negotiate the furloughing of 25-hundred maintenance employes. The union says the railroad has cut maintenance below the requirements for safe operation. The railroad denies this. Intervention by the National Mediation Board would automatically postpone the strike for 60 days.

Harry Flannery

Word for Today

It would seem that in dealing with the problem of the Middle East, the United States is following the counsel of Publilius Syrus, who said, "Nothing can be done hastily and prudently." But too much delay will not do. For in Vergil's words, "Whatever the issue, we shall share one common danger, one safety."

Goodnight and good luck!

CBS RADIO DIVISION

EDWARD R. MURROW

Thursday , March 22, 1956
7:45-8:00 P.M.

MURROW: ... My colleague Charles von Fremd, who covers the White House, has obtained a story from an Administration source which has a direct bearing on the troubled international situation. For that story, we switch to Washington and Charles von Fremd.

VON FREMD: Ed, I learned today that President Eisenhower may make one or more trips abroad in the future, possibly during this 1956 Presidential election year. That sounds surprising, I know, when applied to a man who six months ago had a heart attack and who already has said rather flatly he plans to do very little campaigning in his bid for re-election this fall. Nevertheless, from a completely responsible source I learned that Mr. Eisenhower is seriously considering conferences abroad while still in office, visiting other countries in the role of an ambassador for world peace. The same road block that has stopped such trips before, with the exception of the summit meeting in Geneva, still exists; but Mr. Eisenhower thinks he knows a way to get around it. It's this: He would want assurances in advance that the pomp and ceremony, the protocol and diplomatic rituals, the rigid and tiresome schedule normally expected and imposed during a visit of state will be eliminated. He will go only if his visits can be casual and informal, if he can visit one country and not be bound to visit others, regardless of how friendly they are, in the same geographical area. The President himself is in the process of breaking this tradition. Next week he will be host to the President of Mexico and the Prime Minister of Canada at the resort town of White Sulphur Spring in West Virginia, where the official group will be small, the discussions entirely informal, in a relaxed atmosphere away from the formal agendas of official Washington.

In July he will be host to Prime Minister

Nehru of India. This correspondent has learned the conversations between these two important men will not take place in Washington but at some quiet, secluded point away from the formalities of this nation's capital. This is an entirely new approach to peacetime meetings of international leaders, but it is an innovation which would seem ideally suited for Mr. Eisenhower's particular talents. He has long been known both as a military and civilian leader to be most effective when earnestly expounding his own genuine beliefs in informal talks. This was never more evident that during last July's summit meeting in Geneva, when he all but overwhelmed startled Russian leaders at informal evening parties with his off-hand but sincere approach to the needs and ways of finding a lasting peace. He was unable to generate this same atmosphere at the large square conference table during the formal sessions.

Why is Mr. Eisenhower considering foreign informal conferences? Well, the President agreed to seek re-election ... or, rather, election in '52 for one primary reason: because he believed he could aid the cause of peace. He would need a large measure of false modesty not to recognize the unique position he holds in the world today. Even among some nations who often have doubts about American intentions and actions Mr. Eisenhower enjoys tremendous personal popularity. At a time when Khrushchev and Bulganin are winning numerous friends in many parts of the world with their beaming, waving road company tour, it would help Western relations with the free world immeasurably if President Eisenhower lent his considerable sincerity and charm to convincing heads of nations and the citizens of the countries that the United States and her allies do desperately desire nothing but world peace.

Nehru, who extended the invitation to the Russians, is almost certain to extend a similar one to President Eisenhower in July. On the informal basis it would probably be accepted. It would quite possibly lead to other meetings with leaders of various nations.

These things I learned today. Now, on the basis of this news, it is possible to speculate on what repercussions such informal overseas meetings of the future might cause. Obviously, if such conferences did strengthen world peace, Mr. Eisenhower's contributions would be mighty indeed. But, also, if these trips occur during (sic) Election Day year, the President's actions would inevitably have a political effect here at home. Democrats would probably scream "demagoguery", just as they did after Mr. Eisenhower's famous promise of "If elected, I shall go to Korea" in 1952. It probably would give added impetus to the Chief Executive's campaign, illustrating that he is both healthy and actively attempting to seek what everyone wants most - a permanent peace.

From a Republican viewpoint, election year trips abroad seeking a lasting peace would not only promote the hopes of Americans but, on a loftier plane, those of all freedom-loving peoples. The final decision will not be reached until after the President has visited with Nehru in this country in July, but it is being seriously considered at the White House and may well prove to be the most important decision the director of this Administration has made.

Now back to Ed Murrow in New York.

-30-

Ediphone trans./E. Scheiner

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C B.S. RADIO NETWORK

THURSDAY, MARCH 22, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

France has proposed a meeting of the foreign miniaters of the United States, Britain and France to discuss the Middle East policy.

French Foreign Minister Pineau suggests that the talks be held in Paris, during the spring meeting of the ministers of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. That meeting usually is held in early May. A State Department spokesman says the French government made the proposal "informally" and no final decisions have been made. The spokesman was asked whether President Eisenhower plans to ask Congress for authority to intervene militarily in the Middle East, should intervention..in his opinion ..be warrented. The spokesman said he had no knowledge of plans for such a request.

At the United Nations, a special session of the Security Council has been called for Monday..to take up an American resulution designed to lessen tensions in the Middle East. Specifically, the resolution asks the U.N. secretary general..Dag Hammarskjold..to make a survey of the Middle East situation, with a view to reducing tensions between Israel and the Arab ststes. Informed suources at the United Nations say that if the resulution is approved, Hammarskjold will leave for the Middle east late next week, and stay for about three weeks.

Secretary of State Dulles reported to President Eisenhower..and Republican and Democratic congressional leaders today, on his 19 - day Asian tour. Republican Senator Bridges aidd Mr. Dulles made 'a moderately optimistic report. "

My colleague, Charles Von Fremd, who covers the White House, has obtained a stor from an Administration source which has a direct bearing on the troubled international situation. For that story, we switch to Was ington and Charles Von Fremd.

VON FREMD: Ed, I learned today that President Eisenhower may make one or more trips abroad in the future, possibly during this 1956 Presidential election year. That sounds surprising, I know, when applied to a man who six months ago had a heart attack and who already has said rather flatly he plans to do very little campaigning in his bid for reelection this fall. Nevertheless, from a completely responsible source I learned that Mr. Eisenhower is seriously considering conferences abroad while still in office, visiting other countries in the rule of an ambassador for world peace. The same road block that has topped such trips before, with the exception of the summit meeting in Geneva, still exists; but Mr. Eisenhower thinks he knows a way to get around it. It's this: He would want assurances in advnnce that the pomp and ceremony, the protocal and diplomatic rituals, the rigid and tiresome schedule nor ally expected and imposed during a visit of state will be eliminated. He will go only if his visits can be casual and informal, if he can visit one country and not be bound to visit others, regardless of how friendly they are, in the same geographical area. The President himself is in the process of breaking this tradition. Next week he will be host to the President of Mexico and the Prime Minister of Canada at the resort town of White Sulphur Spring in West Virginia, where the official group will be small, the discussion entirely informal, in a relaxed atmosphere away from the formal agendas of official Washington.

In July he will be host to Prime Minister Nehru of India. This correspondent has learned the conversations between these two important men will not take place in Washington but at some quiet, secluded point away from the formalidies of this nation's capital. This is an entirely new approach to peacetime meetings of international leaders, but it is an innovation which would seem ideally suited for Mr. Eisenhower's particular talents. He has long been known both as a military and civilian leader to be most effective when earnestly expounding his own genuine beliefs in informal talks, This was never more evident than during last July's summit meeting in Geneva, when we all but overwhelmed startled Russian leaders at informal evening parties with his off-hand but sincere approach to the needs and ways of finding a lasting peace. He was unable to generate this same atmosphere at the large square conference table during the formal sessions.

Why is Mr. Eisenhower considering foreign informal conferences? Well, the President agreed to seek re-election..or rather, election in '52 for one primary reason: because he believed he could aid the cause of peace. He would need a large measure of false modesty not to recognize the unique position he holds in the world today. Even among some nations who often have doubts about American intentions and actions Mr. Eisenhower enjoys tremendous personal popularity. At a time when Khrushchev and Bulganin are winning numerous friends in many parts of the world with their beaming, waving road company tour, it would help Western relations with the free world immeasurably if President Eisenhower lent his considerable sincerity and charm to convincing heads of nations and the citizens of the countries that the United States and her allies do desperately desire nothing but world peace.

Nehru, who extedded the invitation to the Russians, is almost certain to extend a similar one to President Eisenhower in July. On the ifnormal basis it would probably be accepted. It would quite possible lean to other meetings with leaders of vaiouss nations. These things I learned today. Now, on the basis of this news, it is possible to speculate on what repercussions such informal overseas meetings of the future might cause. Obviously, if such conferences did strengthen world peace, Mr. Eisenhower's contributions would be mighty indeed. But, also, if these trips occur during Election Day year, the President's actions would inveitably have a political effect here at home.

Democrats would probably scream "demagoguery", just as they did after Mr. Eisenhower's famous promise of "If elected, I shall go to Korea" in 1952. It probably would give added impetus to the Chief Executive's campaign, illustrating that he is both healthy and actively attempting to seek what everyone wants most - a permanent peace.

From a Republican viewpoint, election year trips abroad seeking a lasting peace would not only promote the hopes of Americans but, on a loftier plane, those of all freedom loving peoples. The final decision will not be reached until after the President has visited with Nehru in this country in July, but it is being seriously considered at the White House and may well prove to be the most important decision the director of this Administration has made.

Now back to Ed Murrow in New York.

ERM: Dispatches from Tunisia report the heaviest action there in three years. At least 70 rebels, out of a group estimated at 200, were killed in Southern Tunisia today by French fighter planes and troops. The fighters flew low and machine-gunned scattered rebel forces as they tried to escape. In Tunis, police used tear gas to break up a demonstration by several thousand Arab nationalists. Forty o the demonstrators were arrested. Tunisia wa granted independence yesterday, but within the framework of inter-dependence with France.

The United States offered today to cut its armed forces to two and a half million men, if Russia will do the same. The proposal was made at the meeting, in London, of the United Nations subcommittee on disarmament. The American delegate..Harold Stassen..emphasized that other countries, like Britain and France, would be expected to reduce their armed forces proportionately. He said the proposal "presupposes" East-West agreement on a workable inspection system.

The chief of Russia's secret police arrived in London today to check security arrangements for the visit next month of Soviet Premier Bulganin and Communist Party Boss Khrushchev. Editorials in London newspapers called the police chief..Ivan Serov.. a "thug" and a "jackal". Aviation experts noted that he arrived in a jet airliner of advanced design, similar to Russia's top-secret TU-104 bomber.

In Washington, the NATO commander..General Gruenther..testified today before the House Foreign Affairs Committee. Gruenther said Russia has "tremendous" military strength..and it is growing. But Russia, he said, would lose any war it started now because of the present superiority of the West in long-range air power. He said that on the ground in Europe, NATO is not yet strong enough "to be certain of resisting successfully an all-out act of aggression." Gruenther made these statements in appealing for approval of the Administration's new foreign aid program. Three billion, of the nearly 5-billion dollars requested, would go for military assistance.

The Senate majority leader..Lyndon Johnson..said today that the Democrats will insist on high price supports in the farm bill, despite the possibility of a presidential veto. Johnson made his prediction after a talk with House Speaker Rayburn. Separate farm bills have been passed by the Senate and the House. On Monday, House and Senate conferees will start work on a compromise measure.

Senator Margaret Chase Smith today urged amendment of the Constitution so that the President and Vice President may be nominated..and elected by direct popular vote, instead of under the Electoral College system. Mrs. Smith said that under the present system, it is practically impossible for a woman to be nominated. "Yet the majority of voters," she said, "are women." She suggested a good start would be for qualified women to enter the preferential primaries.

Democratic Senator Kefauver arrived in San Francisco today, to start campaigning for the California primary on June 5th. Adlai Stevenson, whom Kefauver beat badly in Minnesota, has also filed in California.

Kefauver said today he "does not know it to be a fact" that Governor Harriman of New York will now become an active candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination.

In Montgomery, Alabama, the Reverend Martin Luther King was convicted today as a leader of the Negro boycott of the city buses. The court ordered a fine of 500 dollars. The defesne said it would appeal. And the state agreed to postpone the trials of the other 89 defendants, pending that action.

Railroads..oprating in the eastern and western states..have asked the Interstate Commerce Commission for permission to raise their passenger fares by 5 percent, effective May first. A railroad spokesman said commutation fares would not be affected.

In Pittsburgh, the AFL-CIO transport workers voted today to strike against the Pennsylvania Railroad next Thrusday, unless the railroad agress to negotiate the furloughing of 25-hundred maintenance employees. The union says the railroad has cut maintenance below the requriements of safe operation. The railroad denies this. Intervention by the National Mediation Board would automatically postpone the strike for 60 days.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Harry Kramer:

KRAMER: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: It would seem that in dealing with the problem of the Middle East, the United States is following the counsel of Pubilius Syrus, who said, "Nothing can be done hastily and prudently." But too much delay will not do. For in Vergil's words," "Whatever the issue, we shall share one common danger, one safety." .....Good Night and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Fri., March 23, 1956

This is the news:

The State Department has released the text of the speech Secretary Dulles will make to the nation tonight on his Asian tour. Here are some of the things Mr. Dulles will say. The leaders of the 10 countries he visited are "quite aware" of the danger of penetration by international Communism. They know that the economic lures of Communism "generally go with a hook and line that leads to Moscow and Peiping." The spot in the Far East where conflict threatens most is the Formosa area. The Chinese Nationalists... and the South Koreans... are willing to make almost any sacrifice to restore freedom to their countries as a whole. But the will to sacrifice "is tempered by knowledge that modern war creates such widespread devastation... so many evils... that it provides no clear solution to any problem." The new foreign aid program should be approved. It provides the margin of difference "between a world environment which is friendly and one which is corroded by massive discontents, dangerous both to us and to the discontented." CBS Radio will broadcast Dulles' speech at 10:30 tonight, Eastern Time. OVER MOST OF THESE (STATIONS,)

Pakistan became a republic today within the British Commonwealth. Ceremonies marking the birth of the Islamic republic were attended by special envoys from 50 countries. The Soviet representative... First Deputy Premier Mikoyan... took the occasion to say that Russia hopes for "mutually beneficial cooperation" with Pakistan in the economic field. At a reception in Moscow, Soviet Foreign Minister Molotov indicated that Russia is ready to supply Pakistan with technical aid.

Tragedy marred the celebration in one city in Pakistan. Thirty persons were killed when a bridge collapsed. Fifty other persons were injured.

Britain said today it had information that "a considerable number" of Egyptian Army personnel are being trained by Russian military experts in Poland. The British foreign office said: "We are placing reliance in these reports." A foreign office spokesman confirmed that Britain has plans "which could be put into action very rapidly" in case war breaks out between Israel and the Arab states. The spokesman said that in implementing these plans... to suppress such a war... Britain believes it would have the support of the United States and France.

Reuters reports tonight that the Sudan... the southern neighbor of Egypt... is considering an offer by Czechoslovakia to sell it arms. Negotiations are reported in progress with the Sudanese defense ministry.

In Paris, the French cabinet today approved a series of decrees designed to improve the living standards of the Arab population of Algeria. The cabinet acted under the special powers bill, passed recently by the National Assembly.

In Washington, the State Department has cancelled a foreign tour of the Symphony of the Air... after receiving complaints that some of the musicians in the orchestra are Communists. The tour would have been made next fall, on behalf of the United States cultural program. The orchestra made a similar tour of the Far East last summer, under the sponsorship of the State Department, and was a smash hit. None of the alleged Communists... or Communist sympathizers... was named.

There was talk today of inducing Senate Majority Leader Johnson to run for the Democratic presidential nomination. Senator Mansfield of Montana made a speech on the Senate floor, praising Johnson as "the great leader of the Democratic team in the Senate." Senator Ellender of Louisiana said he would be "100 percent" for Johnson for the Democratic nomination. Ellender predicted the South would never go for Senator Kefauver's views on civil rights.

~~Kefauver held a news conference in California today... and said~~ the major issues are President Eisenhower's policies and the failure of the Republicans to carry out their promises. He referred specifically to Republican promises to labor, the farm problem, and what he called the lack of a strong foreign policy.

In Chicago, Adlai Stevenson said that in trying to get the Democratic nomination, he was not going to try to out-promise anyone. He told reporters, "If I don't think 100 percent of parity is desirable, I'm not going to say so. If the people vote against me, then my ~~communications have~~ failed... or they don't like what I've got."

Secretary of Agriculture Benson said today he could not conceive of President Eisenhower signing a farm bill, like the one passed by the Senate last week. At the White House, News Secretary Hagerty said he knows of "no change at all" in the President's view, that the Senate bill is unworkable. In Chicago, a rumor that the Administration might be willing to compromise on price supports for wheat, touched off a buying spree today on the Board of Trade. Wheat futures shot up more than 5 cents a bushel. The present support price for wheat is 76 percent of parity; the Senate bill would support wheat, produced for domestic food consumption, at 100 percent of parity.

The White House announced today that President Eisenhower hopes to have a week's vacation at Augusta, starting April 9th or 10th. Mr. Eisenhower plans to be back in Washington in time to throw out the first ball, of the local baseball season, on April 17th. The game will be between the Yankees and the Senators.

Edward R. Murrow: March 23, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

No silence could be deeper than that of the Administration over any plans to implement the Three Power declaration of 1950 on keeping the peace in the Middle East. That was a clear and worthy declaration, which if read in context with what is now happening, could hardly be bettered - that is insofar as its rhetoric is concerned. But it was born without teeth. Newsmen now understandably believe something will be done to give it teeth. That is why they keep pressing for information about Administration plans to go to Congress.

But they get no information. At his Wednesday news conference President Eisenhower twice avoided being drawn out on this subject. Yesterday a bi-partisan conference was held by the President and Secretary Dulles with Senate leaders. To their surprise the Senators were told nothing about the Middle East, in fact it wasn't mentioned. But for that matter, neither was Cyprus, or the President's foreign aid program. The meeting was devoted altogether to hearing a travelogue by the returned diplomat, the Secretary of State.

Newsmen then assumed that a meeting of top defense, State Department and intelligence advisers called for today would hammer out a Middle Eastern policy. But the meeting was postponed, and the White House let it be known that it was to be a routine meeting which would not deal with the Middle East in any way.

The one hard fact that points to an approaching commitment by Washington is in a recent statement by Sir Anthony Eden. He said three-power discussion had resulted in agreement, about which more could not be said because it involved constitutional procedures in other countries. That is the formula often used by Europeans to explain that the United States usually doesn't take major actions without congressional authority. The remark explains why newsmen think the President, if the emergency gets worse, will go to Congress for standby authority to use American forces in the Middle East.

But obviously the British themselves don't believe an adequate agreement has been reached, for high British officials are openly prodding Washington to act. One official is quoted as saying: "Almost without noticing it we have passed from the post-war to the pre-war era. We know it. We hope you know it in Washington." British officials are reported to doubt whether President Eisenhower is being told just what the chances of war are, and what the effect would be on our European allies if the oil of the Middle East should be cut off or lost. Some officials in London no longer say if war begins, but when war begins. And the British, for their part, are taking strong measures to apply force in the Middle East at twenty-four hour notice, with troops, planes and ships. But while they do this they also point out that these forces would not have to be used if the United States were prepared to act and everyone knew we were prepared to act.

At the time the 1950 declaration was made, arms in the Middle East had not become the critical problem. The Soviet Union had not decided to back the Arabs against Israel and supply Egypt with weapons and with fighter and bomber planes. A three-power declaration, even without teeth, seemed to be enough. Here is its final paragraph: "The three governments (that is, the United States, Britain and France) take this opportunity of declaring their deep interest in, and their desire to promote, the establishment and maintenance of peace and stability in the area, and their unalterable opposition to the use of force, or threat of force, between any states in the area. The three governments, should they find that any of these states was preparing to violate frontiers or armistice lines, would, consistently with their obligations as members of the United Nations, immediately take action both within and outside the United Nations, to prevent such violation."

This declaration, being without teeth, now has no further value. The Soviet Union is in the picture, Israel is clamoring for arms to offset Egypt's newly acquired air power, and the British, who know the region best of all, are convinced that war is coming unless the United States commits itself publicly to uphold the declaration.

This reporter does not wish to imply that the silence of the Administration means that it will not ask Congressional support under the right circumstances. What it is doing is to go first to the United Nations, somewhat as the declaration of 1950 promised. We introduced the resolution in the security council that will send Secretary General Hammarskjold back to the Middle East on minor armistice problems, but also with broad and vague powers to find ways of easing the tension. His mission has the benefit of Soviet approval. It has one probable advantage, it may buy a month's time.

The Secretary General would normally report to the Security Council at its next Regular meeting, a month or so from now. If he accomplished something, so much the better. If he failed, the President then could go to Congress for the standby authority. And his case would be the stronger for having tried the United Nations first. If this is the schedule, it would explain the silence of the Administration.

Word for Today

Events in the Middle East are moving apace... and diplomats are perplexed. Mark Twain, who was a humorist, had a simple solution for all such problems. "By and by," he said, "when each nation has 20-thousand battleships and 5-million soldiers, we shall all be safe. And the wisdom of statesmanship shall stand confirmed."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

FRIDAY, MARCH 23, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

The State Department has released the text of the speech Secretary Dulles will make to the nation tonight on his Asian tour. Here are some of the t things Mr. Dull s will say. The leaders of the 10 countries he visited are "Quite aware" of the danger of penetration by international Communism. They know that the economic lures of Communism " generally go with a hook and line that leads to Moscow and Peiping." The spot in the Far East where conflict threatens most is the Formosa area. The Chinese Nationalists..and the South Koreans..are willing to make almo t anysacrifice to restore freedom to their countries as a whole. But the will tosacrifice "is tempered by knowledge that modern war creates such widespread devastation..so many e ils..that it provides no clear solution to any problem." The new foreign aid program should be approved. It provides the margin of difference "between a world enviornment which is friendly and one which is corroded by massive discontents, dangerous both to us and to the discontended." CBS Radio will brodcast Dulles' speech at 10:30 tonight, Eastern Time, over most of these stations.

Pakistan became a republic today within the British Commonwealth. Ceremonies marking the birth of the Islamic republic were attended by special envoys from 50 countries. The Soviet representative..First Deputy Premier Mikoyan ..took the occasion to say that Russia hopes for "mutually beneficial cooperation" with Pakistan in the economic field

At a reception in Moscow, Soviet Foreign Minister Molotov indicated that Russia is ready to supply Pakistan with technical aid.

Tragedy marred the celebration in one city in Pakistan. Thirty persons were killed when a bridge collapsed. Fifty other persons were injured.

Britain said today it had the information that "a considerable number" of Egyptian Army personnel are being trained by Russian military experts in Poland. The British foreign office said: "We are placing reliance in these reports." A foreign office spokesman confirmed that Britain has plans "which could be put into action very rapidly", in case war breaks out between Israel and the Arab states. The spokesman said that in implementing these plans..to suppress such a war..Britain believes it would have the support of the United States and France.

Reuters reports tonight that the Sudan..the southern neighbor of Egypt.. is considering an offer by Czechoslovakia to sell it arms. Negotiations are reported in progress with the Sudanese defense ministry.

In Paris, the French cabinet today approved a series of decrees designed t inprove the living standards of the Arab population of Algeria. The cabinet acted under the special powers bill, passed recently by the National Assembly.

In Washington, the State Department has cancelled a foreign tour of the Symphony of the Air..after receiving complaints that some of the musicians in the orchestra are communists. The tour would have been made next fall, on behalf of the United States cultural program. The orchestra made a similar tour of the Far East last summer, under the sponsorship of the State Department, and was a smash hit. None of the alleged Communists..or the Communist sympathizers..was named.

There was talk today of including Senate Majority Leader Johnson to run for the Democratic presidential nomination. Senator Mansfield of Montana made a speech on the Senate floor, praising Johnson as "the great leader of the Democratic team in the Senate." Senator Ellender of Louisiana said he would be "100 percent" for Johnson for the Democratic nomination. Ellender predicted the South would never go for Senator Kefauver's views on civil rights.

Secretary of Agriculture Benson said today he could not conceive of President Eisenhower signing a farm bill like the one passed by the Senate last week. At the White House, News Secretary Hagerty said he knows of "no change at all" in the President's view that the Senate bill is unworkable. In Chicago, a a rumor that the Administration might be willing to compromise on price supports for wheat, touched off a buying spree today on the Board of Trade. Wheat futures shot up more than 5 cents a bushel. The present support price for wheat is 76 percent of parity; the Senate bill would support wheat produced for domestic food consumption at 100 percent of parity.

The White House announced today that President Eisenhower hopes to have a week's vacation at Augusta, starting April 9th or 10th. Mr. Eisenhower plans to be back in Washington in time to throw out the first ball of the local baseball season on April 17th. The game will be between the Yankees and the Senators.

No silence could be deeper than that of the Administration over any plans to implement the Three Power declaration of 1950 on keeping the peace in the Middle East. That was a clear ond worthy declaration, which if read in context with what is now happening, could hardly be bettered - that is insofar as its rhetoric is concerned. But it was born without teeth.

Newsmen now underatandably believe something will be done to give it teeth. That is why they keep pressing for information about Administration plans to go to Congress.

But they get no information. At this Wednesday news conference President Eisenhower twice avoided being drawn out on this subject. Yesterday a bi-partiann conference was held by the President and Secretary Dulles with Senate leaders. To their surprise the Senators were told nothing about the Middle East, in fact it wasn't mentioned. But for that matter, neither was Cyprus , or the President's foreign aid program. The meeting was devoted altogether to hearing a travelogue by the tururned diplomat, the Secretary of State.

Newsmen then assumed that a meeting of top defense, State Department and intelligence adivsers called for today would hammer out a Middle Eastern policy. But the meeting was postponed, and the White House let it be known that it was to be a routine meeting which would not deal with the Middle East in any way.

The one hard fact that points to an approaching commitment by Washington is in a recent statement by Sir Anthony Eden. He said three-power discussion had resulted in agreement, about which more could not be said because it involved constitutional procedures in other countries. That is the formula often used by Europeans to explain that the United States usually doesn't take ajor actions without congressional authority. The remark explains why newsmen think the President, if the emergency gets worse, will go to Congress for standby authority to use American forces in the Middle East.

But obviously the British themselves don't believe an adequate agreement has beenreached, for high British officials are openly prodding Washington to act. One official is quoted as sa ing: "Almost without noticing it we have passed from the post-war to the pre-war era. We know it. We hope you know it in Washington." British officials are reported to doubt whether President Eisenhower is being told just what the chances of war are, and what the effect would be on our European allies if the oil of the Middle East should be cut off or lost. Some officials in London no longer say if war begins, but when war begins. And the British, for their part, are taking strong measures to apply force in the Middle East at twenty-four hour notice, with troops, planes and ships. But while they do this, they also point out that these forces would not have to be used if the United States were prepared to act and everyone know we were prepared to act.

At the time the 1950 declaration was made, arms in the Middle East had not become the critical problem. The Soviet Union had not decided to back the Arabs against Israel and supply Egypt with weapons and with fighter and bomber planes. A three-power declaration, even without teeth, seemed to be enough. Here is its final paragraph: "The three governments (that is, the United States, Britain and France) take this opportunity of declaring their deep interest in, and theirdesire to promote, the establishment and maintenance of peace and stability in the area, and their unalterable oppositionn to the use of force, or threat of force, between any states in the area. The three should they find that any of these states was preparing to violate frontiers of armistice lines, would, consistently with their obligations as members of the United Nations, immediately take action both within and outside the United Nations, to prevent suc violation.

This declaration, being without teeth, now has no further value. The Soviet Union is in the picture, Israel is clamoring for arms to offset Egypt's newly acquired air power, and the British, who know the region best of all, are convinced that war is coming unless the United States commits itself publicly to uphold the declaration.

This reporter does not wish to imply that the silence of the Administration means that it will not ask Congressional support under the right circumstances. That it is doing is to go first to the United Nations, somewhat as the declaration of 1950 promised. He introduced the resolution in the security council that will send Secretary General Hammarskjold back to the Middle East on minor armistice problems, but also with broad and vague powers to find ways af easing the tension. His mission has the benefit of Soviet arproval. It has one probably advantage, it may buy a month's time.

The Secretary General would normally report to the Security Council at its next regular meeting, a month or so from now. If he accomplished something, so much the better. If he failed, the President then could go to Congress for the standby authority. And his case would be the stronger for having tried the United Nations first. If this is the schedule, it would explain the silence of the Amministration.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment. Now, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: Events in the Middle East are moving apace..and diplomats are perplexed. Mark Twain, who was a homorist, had a simple solution for all such problems. "By and by", he said, "when each nation has 20-thousand battleships and 5- million soldiers, we shall all be safe. And the wisdom of statesmanship shall s tand conformed."

Goodnight and goodluck.

7.45 pm collingwood - picker
3/26/56

The United Nations Security Council heard an appeal from the United States today to check the drift toward war in the Middle East -- and send Secretary General Hammarskjold on a peace mission to that area. United States Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge, pointing to continued bloodshed and tension on the Palestine frontiers, asked the 11-nation body to act urgently. Until recently, he declared, progress had been made in resolving Arab-Israeli differences. But, he went on to say: "that trend, unfortunately, has during the past year been reversed." And he said the present alarming situation challenges the U.N. to find new means of halting the trend toward war.

Before Lodge spoke, the western big three powers had agreed to grant the Arabs and Israelis a chance to express their views on the proposal to send the secretary general to the Middle East to seek peace.

The Security Council AGREED TO DELAY ACTION ~~adjourned late this afternoon~~ until Wednesday-- because of the Passover holiday which Jews around the world start celebrating at sundown today -- the holiday celebrating the liberation of the Israelites from Egypt in ancient times....Later, AT THE REQUEST OF AN ARAB SPOKESMAN the Security Council decided to postpone final action until next week, on the Hammarskjold peace mission.

In the Middle East, the Greek Minister of State had a 30-minute talk in Damascus today with the Premier of Syria. At the meeting, the Syrian official promised to support Greece whenever the Cyprus issue is brought before the United Nations, in return for "continuous Greek non-recognition of Israel. It's reported that Syria will also ask the Arab league council for a recommendation of support for Greece -- a recommendation which would give Greece the backing of the nine Arab league states in the U.N. on the Cyprus question.

Cyprus itself was comparatively calm today, as the British ended a 24-hour curfew which placed all residents of the Mediterranean island under virtual house arrest yesterday, on the anniversary of Greek independence. The move was made in order to prevent the outbreak of violence on the part of Cypriots demanding union with Greece. Only one Cypriot town remained under 24-hour curfew regulations today. During yesterdays general curfew only a few scattered cases of violence were reported.

A big fire broke out in Algeria today, in a French military depot containing 40-thousand gallons of gasoline, near the Moroccan border. The French rushed troops and police to the area, thinking it was a case of sabotage. Later they discovered the fire was started accidentally, by welding operations.

At the United Nations disarmament meeting in London, the United States has submitted a plan designed to prevent a sneak atomic attack. The plan calls for nations joining in a disarmament agreement to give advance notice to the world if they send armed men outside their borders, by land, sea or air.

It was presented by Harold Stassen, President Eisenhower's adviser on disarmament questions. Stassen argued that danger of a surprise attack would be greatly reduced if nations were obliged to tell in advance of plans to move any of their armed forces into foreign countries. This was the fourth major American proposal made at the current disarmament talks. The others called for setting up test areas for inspection in Russia and the United States, for an exchange of technical missions, and for limiting the defense forces of the United States and Russia to two-and-a-half million men each.

Inside Russia, it's revealed that the communist party secretary of Tiflis University has been dismissed for failing to indoctrinate students with communism. This was disclosed in the Saturday issue of a Tiflis newspaper that reached Moscow today. Tiflis, it will be recalled, was the scene of recent student demonstrations protesting the Kremlin's anti-Stalin drive. The Tiflis newspaper says that students have been cutting classes on a wide scale for more than a year, and that many had to be punished by the university or arrested. Despite these new indications of unrest among the youth of Georgia -- which was Stalin's home republic -- there are no indications in Moscow of any serious trouble in that area.

During the day, Russia charged that West Germany is permitting the launching of American propaganda balloons, despite a soviet protest. A new soviet note says the Kremlin expects the West German government to stop further launchings.

The Moscow Radio reports that the communist world has banded together to set up a joint nuclear research institute, which will be somewhere in the Soviet Union. The countries attending the nuclear conference in Moscow included the communist satellites in Europe as well as red China, North Korea and Mongolia.

Prime Minister Nehru of India held a four hour talk in New Delhi today with soviet deputy premier Mikoyan. The two were said to have discussed a wide range of subjects, including the Kremlin's campaign against the Stalin myth, the problem of reuniting Viet Nam, disarmament and German unification. It's reported that when Mikoyan arrived in New Delhi today, he received a much warmer welcome than that given to the western big three foreign ministers early this month.

President Eisenhower extended a warm greeting today, at White Sulphur Springs, West Virginia, to President Adolfo Ruiz Cortines of Mexico, and Canada's Prime Minister, Louis St. Laurent. The three leaders are holding a friendship conference symbolizing North American unity. Mister Eisenhower was the first to arrive on the scene, and he lost no time in getting in a round of golf this morning, with Sam Snead -- noted pro -- before the arrival of his guests. The Mexican and Canadian officials arrived late in the day. And all three arranged for a first talk on matters of mutual interest at an informal dinner tonight.

CBS News Correspondent Charles Von Fremd reports this evening from White Sulphur Springs that President Eisenhower likens the North American Big Three Summit meeting to that of "someone holding a dinner party to get to know each other better" -- the same as "inviting two next door neighbors to drop in for dinner."

There is no formal agenda, Von Fremd reports, adding that the fourteen men representing all three delegations will discuss whatever they have on their minds.

In Washington, Senate-House conferees have agreed to start voting on a compromise farm bill tomorrow, in an effort to get final congressional approval of the measure by Thursday. Chairman Cooley of the House Agriculture committee said after the group's first three-hour meeting that he has hopes of completing the bill by Wednesday.

High administration officials today flatly refused to turn over to the Senate investigations subcommittee confidential papers on communist trade policy. Commerce Secretary Weeks, undersecretary of state Herbert Hoover, junior, and foreign aid administrator John Hollister all refused to give the information on the grounds that it would violate national security, and that it was confidential material of the executive branch of the government. However, the officials renewed their offer to tell behind closed doors the full story of the 1954 agreement by western nations to relax some of the controls on trade with Russia and her communist satellites.

16

The Supreme Court, by a 7 to 2 decision, today upheld a 1954 law to compel witnesses to give testimony in cases involving national security, in return for immunity from prosecution. Justice Frankfurter, giving the majority decision, said that the fifth amendment privilege against compulsory self-incrimination ends when "immunity replaces danger" of prosecution. But Justice Douglas, who dissented (ALONG) with Justice Black, said the framers of the constitution "put it beyond the power of congress to compel anyone to confess his crimes." Justice Douglas argued that Congress "has granted far less than it has taken away."... Among other actions, the high court agreed to review the first two convictions under the provision under the Smith Act which makes it a crime to belong to the communist party with knowledge that it advocates violent overthrow of the government. The court agreed to rule on the convictions of Claude Lightfoot, (OF) Chicago, and Junius Scales, communist party leader in Tennessee and the Carolinas.

On the political scene, former democratic national chairman Frank McKinney has come out for New York's Governor Averell Harriman as democratic nominee for president....The Missouri Democratic State Committee has endorsed Senator Stuart Symington as a "favorite son" candidate for the democratic nomination...Senator Kefauver made a swift tour of two southern california counties today, in his campaign for the state's delegation to the democratic national convention... Adlai Stevenson is planning to leave for California in a few days, in an effort to block Kefauver....

50

collingwood
26 March

THINK

The most absorbing manifestation of politics these days is the campaign for the state primaries which have become dueling grounds for Estes Kefauver and Adlai Stevenson. This reporter has recently spent a good deal of time and traversed a great many snow-covered miles covering the New Hampshire and Minnesota primaries and would like to share with you certain reflections on them.

The question that everyone asks, including a reporter, is what is the secret of Kefauver's extraordinary success in primaries? Its hard to explain. Because Estes Kefauver is not a particularly magnetic figure. He's no spellbinder. He doesn't even have a close-knit, well-oiled organisation. He is not, in short, the typical free-swinging, barnstorming politician you might expect to clean up at the hustings -- further evidence of that is that typical politicians don't seem to like him very much. Kefauver doesn't have the support of a single one of his colleagues in the Senate or of any of the state organisations in the places where he has a fight on his hands. Yet he keeps winning primaries.

One reason is that he works at them. The Senator from Tennessee has the constitution of a bull elephant and regularly goads himself to extremes of physical endurance that a self-respecting mahout would hesitate to demand of his beast of burden. In Minnesota it was nothing for him to be on the road 16 hours a day, travelling two or three hundred miles, making several big speeches and any number of chats, appearances and hand shaking bees. Now, of course, Stevenson maintained a strenuous schedule, too. But Kefauver seemed to like it -- to want to be where he was. While Stevenson, if he didn't actually give the impression that he didn't think much of the whole business, at least showed the strain to a marked degree. People who turn out to see a candidate like to feel that he wants to see them, too. Kefauver seems to give them that feeling.

They like the way he looks, too. That is, the farmers in Minnesota said "He looks like a farmer." And the people in the small towns of New Hampshire said "Kefauver looks like he came from a small town." The sense of identification can be very important in political choice and more people seemed to find it easier to identify themselves with Kefauver than with Stevenson.

Another thing that helped Kefauver both in New Hampshire and in Minnesota was his position as underdog. The best position for a primary candidate is to be an underdog with a chance. That way he can't be hurt. If he loses, everyone says, well he figured to lose anyway. But if he wins, then he's scored a big upset and made himself capital. Moreover, especially in primaries, people look with special affection on the underdog and try to help him if they can. Kefauver is a master in reaching this position. In New Hampshire, for instance, he wasn't really the underdog at all. He should have been the favorite all the way. But because the state's leading Democrats backed Stevenson and because the Stevenson camp got overconfident, Kefauver was able to make it appear that he was battling against tremendous odds... "If I get half the delegates," he said with becoming modesty, "I will be happy." Of course, he got them all, as he should have done from the beginning. But having staked out the underdog position, Kefauver was able to make New Hampshire seem a much greater victory than it actually was.

Minnesota was something else again. Kefauver was really the underdog there and Stevenson the legitimate favorite. But Kefauver out-campaigned Stevenson there and his appeal, so difficult to define, was very effective. In the last week the handwriting was on the wall for all to read. Stevenson then tried Kefauver's New Hampshire tactics... Anything better than half the vote would make him happy, he said... But Kefauver was not going to surrender the underdog's rôle... If I get 30 percent, he said, I'll consider it a victory..

Primaries are funny things... They don't really have much to do with what happens at the Convention as Estes Kefauver remembers from 1952... The political leaders (the bosses, as they hate to be called) control more convention votes than any candidate can win in the primaries. But if a candidate can't really win in the primaries, he can certainly lose... You remember how Harold Stassen was setting the prairies afire in 1948 until Thomas E. Dewey knocked him off in Oregon?....That could happen to Adlai Stevemson this year. The professional politicians who control the votes which really decide whom a convention nominates hate to pick a man who has been beaten often in primaries. They don't mind supporting someone who hasn't even entered primaries.... but if he enters, he'd better win his share.

Therefore, Stevenson faces really crucial tests in Florida and California where he must lock horns with Kefauver again. The same factors which helped Kefauver win in New Hampshire and Minnesota will operate again -- the underdog, the capacity for endless work, the folksiness, the fact that he likes getting around to places that never saw a presidential candidate before.... Whatever good it may do him at the Convention, Mr. Kefauver is a formidable campaigner from Mr. Stevenson's point of view. And to just the degree that he threatens Stevenson, he gives hope to all the other Democratic hopefuls who have stayed out of the primaries..... But that's a subject for another broadcast...

I'll be back in a moment with a footnote to the days news..... But first, Bob Dixon

FOOTNOTE

The stories from Russia about the ~~xxx~~ student disturbances in Stalin's home province of Georgia are giving the West an interesting picture of college life in the Soviet Union. But one item in today Russian ~~the~~ indictment of the goings-on at the University of Tiflis is reminiscent ~~of~~ of springtime campus activities in other parts of the world ~~elsewhere.~~ It is reported with indignation that one N. Moudjiry, a student in the Geology department, sneaked off with a lady student from the bilogy division AND GOT MARRIED.. What this had to do with the agitation over the downgrading of Josef Stalin is not indicated... But apparently college kids will be college kids, even at the U. of Tiflis.

THIS IS C.C.... See you tomorrow

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

MONDAY, MARCH 26, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

CHARLES COLLINGWOOD REPORTING:

Good Ecening:

The United Nations Security Council heard an appeal from the United States today to check the drift toward war in the Middle East -- and send Secretary General Hammaraskjoldon a peace mission to that area. United States Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge, pointing to continued bloodshed and tension on the Palestine frontiers, asked the 11-nation body to act urgently. Until recently, he declared, progress had been made in resolving Arab - Israeli differences. But, he went on to say: "That trend, unfortunately, has during the past year been reversed." And he said the present alarming situation challenges the U.N. to find new means of halting the trend toward war.

Before Lodge spoke, the western big three powers had agreed to grant the Arabs and Israelis a chance to express their views on the proposal to send the Secretary general to the Middle East to seek peace.

The Security Council agreed to delay action until Wednesday --because th the Passover holiday which Jews around the world start celebrating at Sundown today - the holiday celebrating the liberation of the Israelites from Egypt in ancient times. Later, at the request of an Arab spokeman the security Council decided to postpone final action until next week, on the Hammarskjold peace mission.

In the Middle East, the Greek Minister of State had a 30-minute talk in Damascus today with the Premier of Syria. At the meeting, the Syrian official promised to support Greece whenever the Cyprus issue is brought before the United Nations, in reutrn for "continuous Greek-non-recognition of Israel. It is reported that Syria will also ask the Arab league council for recommendation of support for Greece -- a recommendation which would give Greece the backing of the nine Arab league states in the U.N. on the Cyprus question.

Cyprus itself was compartatively calm today, as the British ended a 24-hour curfew which placed all residents of the Mediterranaan island under virtual arrest yesterday, on the anniversary of Greek independence. The move was made in order to prevent the outbreak of violence on the part of the Cypriots demanding union with Greece. Only one Cypriot town remained under 24-hour curfew regulations today. During yesterdays general curfew only a few scattered cases of violence were reported.

A big fire broke out in Algeria today, in a French military depot containing 40-thousand gallons of gasoline, near the Moroccan border. The French rushed troops and police to the area, thinking it was a case of sabotage. Later they discovered the fire was started accidentally, by welding operations.

At the United Nations disarmament meeting in London, the Unites States has submitted a plan designed to prevent a sneak atomic attack. The plan calls for nations joining in a disarmement agreement to give advance notice to the world if they send armed men outside their borders, by land, sea or air.

It was presented by Harold Stassen, President Eisenhower's adviser on disarmement questions. Stassen argued that danger of a surprise attack would be greatly reduced if nations were obliged to tell in advance of plans to move any of their armed forces into foreign countries. This as the fourth major American porposal made at the current disarmement talks. The others called for setting up test areas for inspection in Russia and the United States, for an exchange of technical missions, and for limiting the defense forces of the United States and Russia to two-and-a-half - million men each.

Inside Russia, it's revealed that the Communist party secretary of Tiflis University has been dismissed for failing to indoctrinate students with Communism. This was discolsed in the Saturday issue of a Tiflis newspaper that reached Moscow today. Tiflis, it will be recalled, was the scene of recent student demonstrations protesting the Kremlin's anti-Stalin drive.. The Tiflis newspaper says that students have been cutting classes on a wide scale for more than a year, and that many had to be punished by the university or arrested. Despite these new indications of unrest among the youth of Georgia -- whichwas Stalin's home republic - there are no indications in Moscow of any serious trouble in that area.

During the day, Russia charged that West Germany is permitting the launching of American propaganda balloons, despite a Soviet protest. A new soviet note says the Kremlin expects the West German government to stop further launchings.

The Moscow Radio reports that the communist world has banded together to set up a joint nuclear research insittute, which will be somewhere in the Soviet union. The countries attending the nuclear confer nces in oscow included the communist satellites in Europe as well as Red China, North Korea and Mongolia.

Prime Minister Nehru of India held a four hour talk in New Delhi today with Soviet deputy premier Mikoyan. The two were said to have discussed a wide range of subjects, including the Kremlin's campaign against the Stalin myth, the problem of reuniting Viet Nam, disarmement and German unification. It's reported that when Mikoyan arrived in New Delhi today, he received a much warmer welcome than that given to the western big three foreign ministers early this month.

President Eisenhower extended a warm greeting today, at White Sulphur Springs, West Vriginia, to President Adolfo Ruiz Cortines of Mexico, and Canada's Prime Minister, Louis St. Laurent. The three leaders are holding a friendhsip conference symbolizing North American unity. Mister Eisenhower was the first to arrive on the scene, and he lost no time in getting in a round of golf this morning, with Sam Snead -- noted pro -- before the arrival of his guests. The Mexican and Canadian officials arrived late in the day. And all three arranged for a first talk on matters of mutual interest at an informal dinner tonight.

CBS News Correspondent Charles Von Fremd reports t is evening from White Sulphur Springs that Presdient Eisenhower likens the North American Big Three Summit meeting to that of "someone holding a dinner party to get to know each other better"-- the same as "inviting two next door neighbors to drop in for dinner." There is no formal agenda, Von Fremd reports, adding that the fourteen men representing all three delegations will discuss whatever they have on their minds.

In Washington, Senate- House conferees have agreed to start voting on a compromise farm bill tomorrow, in an effort to get final congressional approval of the measure by Thursday. Chairman Cooley of the House Agriculture committee said after the group's first three-hour meeting that he has hopes of completeing the bill by Wednesday.

High administration officials today flatly refused to turn over to the Senate investigations subcommittee confidential papers on communist trade policy. Commerce Secretary Weeks, undersecretary of state Herbert Hooser, Junior, and foreign aid administrator John Hollister all refused to give information on the grounds that it would violate national security, and that it was confidential material of the executive branch of the government. However, the officials renew their offer to tell behind closed doors t e full story of the 1954 agreement by western nations to relax some of the controls on trade with Russia and her communist satellites.

The Supreme Court, by a 7 to 2 decision, today upheld a 1954 law to compel witnesses to give testimony in cases involving national security, in return for immunity from prosecution. Justice Frankfurter, giving the majority decision, said that the fifth amendment privilege against compulsory self-incrimination ends when "immunity replaces danger" of prosecution. But Justice Douglas, who dissented along with Justice Black, said the framers of the Constitution "put it beyond the power of congress to compel anyone to confess his crimes." Justice Douglas argued that Congress "has granted far less than it has taken away." Among other actions, the high court agreed to review the first two convictions under the provision under the Smith Act which makes it a crime to belong to the communist party with knowledge that it advocates violent overthrow of the government. The court agreed to rule on the convictions of Claude Lightfoot of Chicago, and Junius Scales, communist party leader in Tennessee and the Carolinas.

On the political scene, former democratic national chairman Frank McKinney has come out for New York's Governor Averell Harriman as democratic nominee for president..the Missouri Democratic State Committee has endorsed Senator Sutart Symington as a "favorite son" candidate for the democratic nomination..Senator Kefauver made a swift tour of two southern california counties today, in his campaign for the state's delegation to the democratic national convention..Allai Stevenson is planning to leave for California in a few days, in an effort to block Kefauver.

The most absorbing manifesto of politics these days is the campaign for the state primaries which have become dueling grounds for Estes Kefauver and Adlai Stevenson. This reporter had recently spend a good deal of time and traversed a great many snow-covered miles covering the New Hampshire and Minnesota primaries and would like to share with you certain reflections on them.

The question that everyone asks, including a reporter, is what is the secret of Kefauver's extraordinary success in primaries? It is hard to explain. Because Estes Kefauver is not a particularly magnetic figure. He's no spell-binder. He doesn't even have a close-knit, well-oiled organization. He is not, in short, the typical free-swinging , barnstorming politician you might expect to clean up at the hustings -- further evidence of that is that typical politicians don't seem to like him very much. Kefauver doesn't have the support of a single one of his colleagues in the Senate or of any of the state organizations in the places where he has a fight on his hands. Yet he keeps winning primaries.

One reason is that he works at them. The Senator from Tennessee has the constitution of a bull elephant and regularly goads himself to extremes of physical endurance that a self-respecting mahout would hesitate to demand of his beast of burden. In Minnesota it was nothing for him to be on the road 16 hours a day, travelling two or three hundred miles, making several big speeches and any number of chats, appearances and hand shaking bees. Now, of course, Stevenson maintained a strenuous schedule, too. But Kefauver seemed to like it--to want to be where hw was. While Stevenson, if he didn't actually give the impression that he didn't think much of the whole business, at least showed the strain to a marked degree. People wo turn out to see a candidate like to feel that he wants to see them, too. Kefauver seems to give them that feeling.

They like the way he looks, too, That is, the farmers in Minnesota said "He looks like a farmer2 And the people in the small towns of New Hampshire said "Kefauver looks like he came from a small town." The sense of identification can be very important in political choice and more people seemed to find it easier to identify themselves with Kefauver than with Stevenson.

Another thing that helped Kefauver both in New Hampshire and in Minnesota was his position as underdog. The best position for a primary candidate is to be an underdog with a chance. That way he can't be hurt. If he loses, everyone says well he figured to lose anyway. But if he wins, then he's scored a big upset and made himself capital. Moreover, especially in primaries, people look with special affection on the underdog and try to help him if they can. Kefauver is a master in reaching this position. In New Hampshire, for instance, he wasn't really the underdog at all. He should have been the favorite all the way. But because the state's leading Democrats backed Stevenson and because the Steve on camp got overconfident, Kefauver was able to make it appear that he was battling against tremendous odds.."If I get half the delegates," he said with becoming modesty, "I will be happy". of course, he got them all, as he should have done from the beginning. But having staked out the underdog position, Kefauver was able to make New Hampshire seem a much greater victory than it actually was.

Minnesota was something else again. Kefauver was really the underdog there and Stevenson the legitimate favorite. But Kefauver out-campaigned Stevenson there and his appeal, so difficult to define, was very effective. In the last week the handwriting was on the wall for all to read. Stevenson then tried Kefauver's New Hampshire tactics..Anything better than half the vote would make him happy, he said..but Kefauver was not going to surrender the underdog's role..If I get 30 percnet, he said, I'll consider it a victory.

Primaries are funny things.. They don't really have much to do with what happens at the Convention as Estes Kefauver remembers from 1952.. The political leaders (the bosses, as they hate to be called) control more convention votes than any candidate can win in the primaries. But if a candidate can't really win in the primaries, he can certainly lose..You remember how Harold Stassen was setting the praries afire in 1948 until Thomas E. Dewey knockedhim off in Oregon?.. That could happen to Adlai Stevenson this year. The professional politicians who control the votes which really decide whom a convention nominates hate to pick a man who has been beaten often in primaries. They don't mind supporting someone who hasn't even entered primaries..but if he enters, he'd better win his share.

Therefore, Stevenson faces really crucial tests in Florida and California where he must lock horns with Kefauver again. The same factors which helped Kefauver win New Hampshire and Minnesots will operate again-- the underdog, the capacity for endless work, the folksiness, the fact that he likes getting around to places that never saw a presidential candidate before..Whatever good it may do him at the Convention, Mr. Kefauver is a formidable campaigner from Mr. Stevenson's point of view. And to just the degree that he threatens Stevenson, he gives hope to all the other Democratic hoepfuls who have stayed out of the primaries..tht that's a subject for another broadcast.

I'll be back in a moment with a footnote to the day's news..But first, Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

COLLINGWOOD: The stories from Russia about the student disturbances in Stalin's home province of Georgia are giving the West an interesting picture of college life in the Soviet Union. But one item in today's Russian indictment of the goings-on at the University of Tiflis is reminiscent of springtime campus activities in other parts of the world. It is reported with indignation that one N. Moudjiry, a student in the Geology Department, sneaked off with a lady student from the biology division and got married. What this had to do with the agitation over the downgrading of Joseph Stalin is not indicated..but apparently college kids will be college kids, even at the U. of Tiflis. This is Charles Collingwood. See you tomorrow.

7:45 pm
3/27/56

collingwood - picker

The American communist party ~~is~~ WAS virtually PUT on the streets today -- evicted by ~~the~~ Treasury department agents for alleged non-payment of income taxes. The revenue men pounced on party headquarters in New York, and the party's newspaper, the Daily Worker, and also on party headquarters in San Francisco, Philadelphia and Chicago. An internal revenue official in New York says the party owes 389-thousand dollars, and the newspaper 46-thousan dollars in back income taxes, for the years 1951 through 1953. ~~This financial~~ woe comes on top of the party's recent ideological strains in adapting ITSELF to the new Kremlin line of reviling Stalin instead of revering him. During the past few years, the Daily Worker has been on the verge of bankruptcy, with a drastically reduced circulation. When the revenue agents ~~[illegible]~~ appeared at the newspaper's offices this afternoon, the staff refused to leave the premises, protesting the seizure as unconstitutional. Several hours later, the communist newspapermen, on the advice of their attorney, left the 8th floor of the building and the doors were padlocked. The staff then went down one flight, to the offices of a job printer on the seventh floor, to get out tomorrow's issue of the newspaper. A Daily Worker spokesman said that for the past several years the newspaper has been losing about 200-thousand dollars a year, adding that it has never operated in the black, and that it has no assets, only liabilities. The spokesman said the paper will appear tomorrow in spite of the closing of the office.

A communist party official claimed that this was the first time the party knew it had to pay taxes, SINCE income of political parties used for party expenses is tax exempt. In Washington, however, internal revenue headquarters said there is an exception to this rule -- income from profit-making activities. And the communists long have conducted parties, dances, lectures and similar things as fund-raising devices. It was also explained that one of the many requirements for tax exemption is that no substantial part of an organization's activity be devoted to attempting to influence legislation for propaganda purposes. Top revenue officials in Washington were reluctant to meet newsmen, to explain the background of today's actions.

The F-B-I has announced the arrest of a top communist official in Chicago -- Emanuel Blum -- on charges of being a party member in full knowledge of its aims, in violation of the Smith Act. Yesterday the Supreme Court agreed to hear arguments on the constitutionality of this provision, in the cases of two other communists who had been arrested on the same basis.

At White Sulphur Springs, West Virginia, President Eisenhower and the leaders of Canada and Mexico discussed the world situation and reached agreement on a number of points. They agreed that the three North American countries should offer moral and economic aid to block possible communist domination of newly independent nations. Mister Eisenhower was quoted as saying that he doesn't believe for an instant that the communists have given up their idea of world domination, and the use of slave camps to keep people in check.

The President also told his guests that this country views the Arab-Israeli dispute and other Middle East tensions as "a possible threat to peace."

But the story of violence in the Middle East continued. Two British military policemen were killed in an ambush in Cyprus only a few hours after British Governor Sir John Harding had appealed for an end to violence. Earlier in the day a Greek-speaking customs official was shot to death...In Tunisia, two moderate leaders of the dominant Independence party were killed by Arab extremists...And in Jerusalem, two Israeli civilians were reported injured by shots fired from the Jordon-held old part of the city.

In London, Soviet deputy foreign minister Gromyko has put forward a new disarmament plan. It is said to agree with the American plan for reducing conventional armaments, but avoids the issue of limiting atomic weapons. American sources said the United States viewed the new soviet proposal as "serious and important." But French and British officials were reported disappointed with it. The details of the Soviet plan are being kept secret pending study of it by the western governments.

Russia's first deputy premier, A.I. Mikoyan, held a news conference in New Delhi today, during his current visit to India. In reply to questions, Mikoyan said the soviet communist party will be strengthened by the recent Kremlin criticism of the late, (and now officially unlamented,) Joseph Stalin.

Mikoyan went on to say that too much good had been said about Stalin -- by the communists, that is -- and that the 20th communist party congress in Moscow last month criticized some of his actions, in order to set the record straight, historically, and to show what was right and what was wrong in Stalin's record. Mikoyan denied there was unrest in Stalin's home republic of Georgia, but he admitted that some people there might have taken the criticizm of Stalin "hard." This was only natural, he explained, saying that "it is difficult to do away with long-held ideas in a day or two."

Back In Washington, the Senate, by a voice vote a short while ago, sent back to its judiciary committee all proposals for revising the electoral college system of electing presidents and vice presidents. The action killing off all the proposals was taken soon after the Senate voted 48 to 37 for a plan to give the states a choice between two methods of casting their electoral votes. But this was far short of the two-thirds majority required to win approval of a constitutional amendment. And Senator Daniel of Texas, a chief sponsor of the plan, said it was apparent the necessary votes could not be obtained.

A Senate-House conference committee rewriting the farm bill has turned thumbs down on the administration's flexible price support system. And Agriculture Secretary Benson promptly predicted the action would bring a presidential veto.

81

The conferees agreed to write into the bill a provision to support major crops at 90 per cent of parity, which would mean an extra 1-billion dollars in 1956 benefits to the farmers. Benson told newsmen he was disappointed at the committee's decision, and said he didn't think the President would approve -- even for one year -- a return to the high, rigid price supports which were in force during World War two. Benson also termed the committee's vote to keep a "dual parity" plan in the farm bill. This would permit farmers to use either the old parity formula or the new, whichever is higher, in figuring crop support levels.

Defense Secretary Wilson has put in the hands of one man the responsibility for speeding this country's drive for victory in the long-range strategic missile race with Russia. The man he gave this job to is Eger Murphree, a research engineer, [redacted] Wilson said that Murphree, in his post as special assistant for guided missiles, will have more authority than any other man who has tried to coordinate the growing military missile program. Wilson indicated that he expected Murphree to speed up the development of a ballistic, or rocket-type missile that eventually could be fired from this country and land on a target, across the ocean, 5-thousand miles away.

100

Commerce Secretary Weeks predicts this evening that there is a better than even chance that the nation's economy will spurt ahead to new records again this year. He made this prediction as the Commerce Department reported that last year's business boom has levelled off somewhat. However, the report says the nation's economy generally is up to THE high level that was reached at the end of 1955. Secretary Weeks says that business should "not try to get all that the traffic will bear," and that labor "should be as much interested in what a dollar buys as in how many dollars they get."

The National Mediation Service reports that the Transport Workers Union has postponed indefinitely a strike against the Pennsylvania Railroad that had been set to begin at midnight tonight. Mediation talks in the dispute will begin tomorrow in Philadelphia.

Representative Adam Clayton Powell says in New York that Negroes and whites in many communities across the country are expected to join tomorrow in "National Deliverance Day of Prayer." The movement is an outgrowth of the Negro boycott of busses in Montgomery, Alabama. Powell, a Negro minister, is chairman of the committee sponsoring the day of prayer.

Senator Estes Kefauver wound up five days of campaigning in southern California today, for the democratic presidential nomination. And Adlai Stevenson is planning to go to California tomorrow, to start his campaign for the June 5th primary there. Stevenson says he has also planned two visits to Florida next month...And in Kansas City, former President Truman says he is going to the democratic national convention -- but he repeats that he has no desire to be president again. Commenting on reports that he might be drafted, Mr. Truman says: "thirty years of public office is enough."

Charles Collingwood
27 March

THINK

When the Treasury Department clamped down on the Daily Worker this afternoon an irreverent observer remarked that from the editor's point of view it probably couldn't have happened at a better time -- if the paper was closed he wouldn't have to continue explaining why it is that Josef Stalin isn't a hero any more.

To the Communist mind, adjusted for a generation to the automatic acceptance of everything Stalin did as the ultimate manifestation of perfect wisdom, these explanations must be a painful problem. To the rest of us this is no problem at all. We have no doubt as to why Stalin isn't a hero any more because we never thought he was one in the first place. What interests the non-Communist is why the Russians themselves have suddenly started de-bunking Stalin.

There are as many answers as there are experts. One theory is that Mikoyan, who first brought it up, did so in order to block Kruschev who was showing signs of wanting to make himself another Stalin. Another is that Russia's new leaders wanted to further their new "soft" policy in international affairs by freeing themselves of the burden of the Stalin legend and the identification of past Soviet excesses with Stalin.... No less an authority than Harrison Salisbury of the New York Times thinks that some spark of idealism still burning in the breasts of Russia's bosses may have had something to do with it. There's a theory, too, that the great Russian masses, having suffered so much under Stalin's rule, forced the change on the leadership... That one would be more plausible if any of the accounts from Russia had reported demonstrations of joy on the part of the populace. Instead they've reported uneasiness and some intellectual distress at the latest about-face.

But for whatever reason the men in the Kremlin decided to turn on Stalin's memory, one thing appears clear already. And that is that it is -- or at least is intended to be -- a minor and not a major operation. In other words, relegating Stalin to outer darkness was not the signal for any basic change in Soviet organisation or attitude. No one in Russia has now suggested that the farms be de-collectivized, or that the concentration on heavy industry be abandoned, or that the expansionist foreign policy be changed. All of these things, which were Stalin's policies -- and, indeed, the whole authoritarian fabric of the Soviet State -- are still the order of the day and not, apparently in question.

This raises some interesting questions about the fundamental durability of the whole Soviet system. If Stalin, who more than anyone else created it, can not only die and be succeeded but can then be denounced and denigrated, and still the system remains with its basic outlines unchanged, then that system obviously has aspects of permanence that do not depend on the individuals who control it.

Ever since Communist Russia began to throw her weight around in the world there have been two main theories about this... One is that the strength of Russia and the magnitude of the Russian threat stems from the fanatical doctrine of Communism. According to this view, the Communist philosophy is what has shaped the structure of the Soviet nation and has guided it on its destructive course through history. Moreover, it is that philosophy, so different from our western tradition of liberty and equality, that is the real threat to us in the west.

But there is another theory. And that is that Russia is a threat because she is Russia -- that her interests and our interests would have been in conflict even if there had never been a Russian revolution.

In this view, Communism is only one aspect of the Russian problem, one arm, one method by which Russia seeks to extend her influence along lines which she would tend to follow anyway, People who believe this can quote Karl Marx himself who, mind you, didn't think his theories would have much success in Russia. In 1867, Marx said: " The policy of Russia is changeless. Its methods, its tactics, its maneeuvres may change, but the polar star of its policy --world domination -- is a fixed star.".....Back around 1820, when we were a very young nation, the great French observer de Tocqueville ~~said forxxxxxxthexdayxwhenxRussia andxthexUnitedxStates~~ predicted that it was "the will of Heaven" that the United States and Russia would grow im power and influence until each would sway the destinies of half the globe. In other words, Russia's size, geographical position, ~~xxxx~~ physical and historical endowments all tend to place her in opposition to us and in competition with us for the loyalty and cooperation of the rest of the world.

But whichever of these theories has the most merit, the fact remains that the ability of the Russians to disavow Stalin and still keep their whole system pretty much as it was argues a stability in the Russian system that does not make the West's task any easier. It is always pleasant to watch our opponents admitting weaknesses, but it would be a mistake to assume that just because the Russians are kicking the ghost of Stalin around, the virulence of the Russian threat is thereby diminished. The indications are the Russians will be just as much trouble with Stalin carrying a pitchfork as they were when he wore a halo.

I'LL BE BACK IN A MOMENT WITH A FOOTNOTE TO THE DAYS NEWS... BUT FIRST *_____.

FOOTNOTE

Speaking of the new men in Russia.... Georgi Malenkov, who had a whirl at being top man after Stalin but is still alive, is visiting Britain. Malenkov toured Scotland and presented himself as a great lover of Robert Burns, quoting from the bard in Russian and carrying a copy of the poems around. The British were not too impressed, no one figuring out how a line like "The gossip keekit in his loof," could possibly be translated into Russian.

THIS ISC.C..... SEE YOU TOMORROW

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

TUESDAY, MARCH 27, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

CHARLES COLLINGWOOD REPORTING:

Good Evening:

The American Communist party was virtually put on the streets today -- evicted by the Treasury department agents for alleged non-payment of income taxes. The revenue men pounced on party headquarters in New York, and the party's newspaper, the Daily Worker, and also or party headquarters in San-Francisco, Philadelphia and Chicago. An internal revenue official in New York says the party owes 389-thousand dollars, and the newspaper 46-thousand dollars in back income taxes, for the years 1951 through 1953.

A Daily Worker spokesman said that for the past several years the newspsper has been losing about 200-thousand dollars a year, adding that it has never operated in the black, and that it has no assets, only liabilities. The spokesman said the paper will appear tomorrow, inspite of the closing of the office.

A communist party official claimed that this was the first time the party knew it had to pay taxes, since income of political parties used for party expenses is tax exempt. In Washington, however, internal revenue headquarters said there is an excretipn to this rule -- income from profit-making activities. And the communists long have conducted parties, dances, lectures and similar things as fund-raising devices. It was also explained that one of the main requirements for tax exemption is that no substantail part of an organization's activity be devoted to attempting to influence legislation for propaganda purposes. Top revenue officials in Washington were reluctant to meet newsman to explain the background of today's actions.

The F.B.I has announced the arrest of a top communist official in Chicago-Emanuel Blum -- on charges of being a party member in full knowledge of its aims, in violation of the Smith act. Yesterday the Supreme Court agreed to hear arguments on the constitutionality of this provision, in the cases of two other communists who had been arrested on the same basis.

At White Sulphur Springs, West Virginia, President Eisenhower and the leaders of Canada and Mexico discussed the world situation and reached agreemeng on a number of points. They agreed that the three North American countries should offer moral and economic aid to block possible communist domination of of newly independent nations. Mister Eisenhower was quoted as saying that he doesn't believe for an instant that the communists have given up their idea of world domination, and the use of slave camps to keep people in check. The President also told his guests that this country views the Arab-Israeli dispute and other Middle East tensions as "a possible threat to peace."

But the story of violence in the Middle East continues. Two British military policemen were killed in an ambush an Cyprus only a few hours after British Governor Sir John Harding had appealed for an end to violence. Earlier in the day a Greek speaking customs official was shot to death..in Tunisia, two moderate leaders of the dominant Independence party were killed by Arab extremists..and in Jerusalem, two Israeli civilians were reported injured by shots fired from the Jordan - held old part of the city.

In London, Soviet deputy foreign minister Gromyko has put forward a new disarmement plan. It is said to agree with the American plan for reducing conventional armaments, but avoids the issue of limiting atomic weapons. American sources said the United States viewed the new soviet proposal as "serious and important", But French and British officials were reported disappointed with it. The details of the Soviet plan are being kept secret pending study of if by the western governments.

Russia's first deputy premier, A.I. Mikoyan, held a news conference in New Delhi today, during his current visit ti India. In reply to questions, Mikoyan said the soviet communist party will be strengthened by the recent Kremlin criticism of the late, and now officially unlamented Joseph Stalin. Mikoyan went on to say that too much good had been said about Stalin -- by the communists, that is -- and the 20th communist party congress in Moscow last month criticized some of his actions, in order to set the record straight, historically, and to show what was right and what was wrong in Stalin's record. Mikoyan denied there was unrest in Stalin's home republic of Georgia, but he admitted that some people there might have taken the criticism of Stalin "hard". This was only natural, he explained, saying that "it is difficult to do away with long-held ideas in a day or two."

Back in Washington, the Senate, by a voice vote a short while ago, sent back to its judiciary committee all proposals for revising the electoral college system of electing presidents and vice presidents. The action killing off all the proposals was taken soon after the Senate voted 48 to 37 for a plan to give the states a choice between two methods of casting their electoral votes. But this was far short of the two-thirds majority required to win approval of a constututional amendment. And Senator Daniel of Texas, a chief sponsor of the plan, said it was apparent the necessary votes could not be obtained.

A Senate-House conference committee rewriting the farm bill has turned thumbs down on the administration's flexible price support system. And Agriculture Secretary Benson promptly predicted the action would bering a presidential veto.

The conferees agreed to write into the bill a provision to support major crops at 90 percent of parity, which would mean an extra 1-billion dollars in 1956 benefits fo the farmers. Benson told newsmen he was disappointed at the committee's decision, and said he didn't think the President would approve -- even for one year -- a return to the high, rigid price supports which were in force during World War Two. Benson also termed "indefensible" the committee's vote to keep a "dual parity "plan in the farm bill. This would permit farmers to use either the old parity formula or the new, whichever is higher, in figuring crop support levels.

Defense Secretary Wilson has put in the hands of one man the responsibility for speeding this country's drive for victory in the long-range strategic missile race with Russia. The man he gave this job to is Eger Murphree, a research engineer. Wilson said that Murphree, in his post as special assistant for guided missiles, will have more authority than any other man who has tried to coordinate the growing military missile program. Wilson indicated that that he expected Murphree to speed up the development of a ballistic, or rocket-type missile that eventually could be fired from this country and land on a target, across the ocean, 5-thousand miles away.

Commerce Secretary Weeks predicts this evening that there is a better than even chance that the nation's economy will spurt ahead to new records again this year. He made this prediction as the Commerce Department reported that last year's business boom levelled off somewhat. However, the report says the nation's economy generally is up to the high level that was reached at the end of 1955. Secretary Weeks says that business should "not try to get all that the traffic will bear, " and that labor "should be as much interested in what a dollar buys as in how many dollars they get."

The National Mediation Service reports that the Transport Workers Union has postponed indefinitely a strike against the Pennsylvania Railroad that had been set to begin at mignight tonight. Mediation talks in the dispute will begin tomorrow in Philadelphia.

Representative Adam Clayton Powell says in New York that Negroes and whites in many communities across the country are expected to join tomorrow in "National Deliverance Day of Prayer. The movement is an outgrowth of the Negro boycott of busses in Montgomery, Alabama. Powell, a Negro minister, is chairman of the committee sponsoring the day of prayer.

Senator Estes Kefauver wound up five days of campaigning in southern California today, for the democratic presidential nomination. And Adlai Stevenson is planning to go to California tomorrow, to start his campaign for the June 5th primary there. Stevenson says he has also planned two visits to Florida next month..and in Kansas city, former President Truman says he is going to the democratic national convention -- but he repeats that he has no desire to be president again. Commenting on reports that he might be drafted, Mr. Truman says: "thirty years of public office is enough."

When the Treasury Department clamped down on the Daily Worker this afternoon an irreverent observer remarked that from the editor's point of view it probably couldn't have happened at a better time -- if the paper was closed he wouldn't have to continue explaining why it is that Joseph Stalin isn't a hero any more.

To the Communist mind, adjusted for a generation to the automatic acceptance of everything Stalin did as the ultimate manifestation of perfect wisdom, these explanations must be a painful problem. To the rest of us this is no problem at all. We have no doubt as to why Stalin isn't a hero any more because we never thought he was one in the first place. What interests the non-Communist is why the Russians themselves have suddenly started de-bunking Stalin.

There are as many answers as there are experts. One theory is that Mikoyan, who first brought it up, did so in order to block Khurshchev who was showing signs of wanting to make himself another Stalin. Another is that Russia's new leaders wanted to further their new "soft" policy in international affairs by freeing themselves of the burden of the Stalin legend and the identification of past Soviet excesses with Stalin..No less an authority than Harrison Salisbury of the New York Times thinks that some spark of idealism still burning in the breasts of Russia's bosses may have had something to do with it. There's a theory, too, that the great Russian masses, having suffered so much under Stalin's rule, forced the change of the leadership..that one would be more plausible if any of the accounts from Russia had reported demonstrations of joy on the part of the populace. Instead they've reported uneasiness and some intelectual distress at the latest about-face.

But for whatever reason the men in the Kremlin decided to turn on Stalin's memory, one thing appears clear already. And that is that it is--or at least is intended to be -- a minor and not a major operation. In other words, relegating Stalin to outer darkness was not the signal for any basic change in Soviet organization or attitude. No one in Russia has not suggested that the farms be de-collectivized, or that the concnetration on heavy industry be abandoned, or that the expansionist foreign policy be changed. All of these things, which were Stalin's policies -- and, indeed, the whole authoritarian fabric of the Soviet State -- are still the order of the day and not, apparently in question.

This raises some interesting questions about the fundamental durability of the whole Soviet system. If Stalin, who more than an one else created it, can not only die and be succeeded but can then be denounced and deingrated, and still the system remains with its basic outlines unchanged, then thet system obviously has aspects of permanence that do not depend on the individuals who control ti.

Ever since Communist Russia began to throw her weight around in the world there have been two main theories about this..one is that the strength of Russia and the magnitude of the Russian threat stems from the fanatical doctrine of Communism. According to this view, the Communist philospphy is what has shaped the structure of the Soviet nation and has guided it on its destructive course through history. Moreover, it is that philosophy, so different from our western tradition of liberty and equality, that is the real threat to us in the west.

But there is another theory. And that is that Russia is a threat because she is Russia -- that her interests and our interests would have been in conflict even if there had never been a Russian revolution.

In this view Communism is only one aspect of the Russian problem, one arm, one method by which Russia seeks to extend her influence along lines which she would tend to follow anyway, People who believe this can quote Karl Marx himself who, mind you , didn't think his theories would have much success in Russia. In 1867, Marx said: "The policy of Russia is changeless. Its methods, its tactics, its maneuvers may change, but the polar star of its policy-- world domination -- is a fixed star." Back around 1820, when we were a very young nation, the great French observer de Tocqueville predicted that it was "the will of Heaven" that the United States and Russia would grow in power and influence until each would sway the destinies of half the globe. In other words, Russia's size, geographical position, physical and historical endowments all tend to place her in opposition to us and in competition with us for the loyalty and cooperation of the rest of the world.

But whichever of these theroies has the most merit, the fact remains that the ability of the Russians to disgrow Stalin and still keep their whole system pretty much as it was argues a stability in the Russian system that does not make the West's task any easier. It is always pleasant to watch our opponents admitting weaknesses, but it would be a mistake to assume that just because the Russians are kicking the ghost of Stalin around, the virulence of the Russian threat is thereby diminished. The indications are the Russians will be just as much trouble with Stalin carrying a pitchfork as they were when he wore a halo.

I'll be back in a moment with a footnote to the day's news..but first.... here is our announcer.

ANNOUNCER: COMMERCIAL

COLLINGWOOD: Speaking of the new men in Russia..Georgi Malenkov, who had a whirl at being top man after Stalin but is still alive, is visiting Britain. Malenkov toured Scotland and presented himself as a great lover of Robert Burns, quoting from the board in Russian and carrying a copy of the p ms around. The British were not too impressed, no one figuring out how a line like "The gossip keekit in his loof", could possible be translated into Russian.

This is Charles Collingwood. See you tomorrow.

March 28, 1956

Adlai Stevenson lashed out at Senator Kefauver tonight, accusing him of weakening the Democratic party by discrediting its leaders. ~~Speaking~~ Stevenson spoke in Los Angeles shortly after arriving in California to campaign for that state's 68 democratic presidential delegate votes. Kefauver himself is heading back east after five days of campaigning in California. Stevenson, who was defeated by Kefauver in the Minnesota primary last week, said Kefauver was trying to "injure" him and win support in California by the same "false and divisive boss nonsense" Kefauver had raised in Minnesota. Stevenson was referring to Kefauver's charges that Stevenson had the support of the democratic bosses. Stevenson said he was honored to have the unsolicited support of party leaders in Minnesota and California, and that Kefauver had tried, and failed, to get the support of some of the same people. Stevenson said such tactics could only help the republicans. ~~, adding that for the past four years he has been doing his best to unite the democratic party, not tear it apart~~. Stevenson also attacked the Eisenhower administration for its handling of foreign and domestic problems, including the farm problem and the Middle East crisis.

~~During the day,~~ Senator Kefauver (has already) announced he will enter Indiana's democratic presidential primary. ~~And~~ aide to Adlai Stevenson said he would not enter that contest, which will be held on May 8th. Kefauver also entered in Nebraska.

[redacted]

Congress has voted to take a 10-day Easter recess starting at the end of tomorrow's session. The House shouted its approval of the recess resolution, and the Senate approved it without debate. The vacation ends April 9th.

A Senate-House conference committee has decided to kill a farm bill provision that opponents said would drive cotton prices down from five to ten dollars a bale. The provision was aimed at improving the competitive position of American cotton in world markets. As the committee continued to revise the legislation, one member, Senator Holland of Florida, said: "We may have sounded the death knell for any farm bill this session."

The Eisenhower Administration was scheduled to present its new civil rights proposals to congress today, but it cancelled two meetings for that purpose without explanation. It's reported that justice department officials ordered the delay in order to make some last-minute changes in the language of the program. Originally, Congress had expected to receive the civil rights proposals on March 1st.

President (EISENHOWER) returned to Washington this afternoon by train from White Sulphur Springs, West Virginia. The President was described as "well satisfied" that his talks with Canadian and Mexican leaders served to build good will and help check the spread of communism. The President was said to have enjoyed particularly the atmosphere of cordial informality that prevailed throughout his conferences with his Canadian and Mexican guests.

Back in Washington, the President went directly to the White House, where he was said to have scheduled an important meeting with Secretary of State Dulles. The President met with Dulles for two hours, The Secretary declared afterwards that there was nothing urgent about the meeting. There had been some speculation earlier that the meeting had been arranged to discuss the latest Russian disarmament proposals submitted in London.

These proposals, submitted at the London disarmament talks, yesterday, have not yet been made public. However it's reported that in them, the Russians for the first time have embraced the basic idea of President Eisenhower's open sky arms inspection system. The Russian proposals are said to be qualified and incomplete. But despite this, DIPLOMATIC sources SAY they THINK Russia HAS come closer to the western position on inspection than ever before. They SAY the Russian plan has a genuine ring and represents something more than propaganda.

Russia is now reported to have more engineers and scientists than the United States. This is disclosed in a special report prepared by a Library of Congress expert for the Senate-House Atomic energy committee. The report goes on to say that Russia is now producing these specialists at such a rapid rate, that even the combined advantage now held by the United States and ~~the~~ countries of western Europe is being threatened. According to the report, this country has about 760-thousand engineers and scientists, compared to 890-thousand in Russia.

Russia has decided to lift its ban on foreigners travelling in Georgia and Armenia next week to permit Sweden's Prime Minister to visit the area. Georgia, the home republic of Stalin, was the scene of recent student demonstrations protesting the current Kremlin campaign of criticism of the late dictator....The sharpest anti-Stalin criticism yet published in a soviet satellite country was made today in the newspaper of the Polish communist party. It condemned Stalin as a mentally sick man who employed slander as a weapon of murder.....And in communist East Germany, Premier Grotewohl criticized the justice ministry headed by Mrs. Hilde Benjamin, known as "Red Hilde." He accused the ministry of making illegal and unjustified arrests of citizens. As Grotewohl spoke, before the East German communist party congress, Mrs. Benjamin sat on the speaker's platform, without batting an eyelash. She'll probably address the conference tomorrow or Friday.

(96)

The Internal Revenue Service declared today that the sudden tax raids on communist party headquarters yesterday were made in line with standard operating procedure. Revenue Commissioner Harrington issued a brief statement saying the case was handled the same as any similar taxpayer case. He gave out this statement after conferring with Donald Moysey, New York regional tax chief, who apparently ordered the crackdown on his own authority, and without informing Washington in advance. Moysey figured that the communist party owed 389-thousand dollars, and its newspaper, the Daily Worker, owed 46-thousand dollars in back income taxes. Tax agents, going through the Daily Worker's assets today, reportedly in New York, found 48-cents and an old magazine in one safe, and 10-dollars and 52-cents in another safe.

Incidentally, the crackdown on the communist party for failure to file federal tax returns appears to have raised some questions for the republican and democratic parties, also. Spokesmen for both national committees said they do not file returns with the internal revenue service. At the same time, a government tax EXPERT said there is no exemption from filing for political parties, even if they are not required to pay any income taxes. But Commissioner Harrington refused to discuss the matter, and he wouldn't say whether any action is planned against the democratic or republican parties for failure to file returns.

U.S. Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge declared in the U.N.Security Council TODAY that the only purpose in the United States resolution to send Secretary General Hammarskjold to the Middle East is to prevent war. He spoke to dispel the fears of the Arab states regarding the aim of the American proposal, and to call for its speedy approval by the Security Council... In the Holy Land, Egypt and Israel each accused the other of starting an exchange of gun fire that lasted three hours this morning.

A fierce spring storm lashed the western prairie states today. Crops in the GREAT plains were smothered with dust, while sleet, freezing rain, snow and ice were cast on the northern midwest. Chill winds, ranging from 30 to 60 miles an hour ranged from Kansas into the Dakotas, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan and the Great Lakes. Seations of the midwest were virtually paralyzed, as high winds knocked down utility lines and ice-coated trees. Ice, slush and deep snow closed many highways. At least ten Wisconsin communities were cut off by bad weather, while other towns were isolated in Minnesota and the Dakotas.

Negroes and white sympathizers in scattered cities across the nation PAUSED for prayer today on behalf of the bus boycotters in Montgomery, Alabama. However, there is no estimate of the number of persons taking part in the movement described as the "National Deliverance Day of Prayer." In Boston, episcopal Bishop Norman Nash told 8-hundred worshipers that discrimination exists "right here in Boston" -- adding that the guilty are not only "they" but also "we."

Charles Collingwood
28 March 7:45 PM

THINK

Ever since Estes Kefauver bowled over Adlai Stevenson in Minnesota there's been a great deal of talk about the possibility of a "dark horse" capturing the Democratic (PRESIDENTIAL) nomination. It makes interesting conversation, but its a little like speculating about the unicorn. Its not quite true that there ain't no such animal as a "dark horse" in politics, but he's considerably more rare than the whooping crane. Its almost a rule of politics that a party does not give its presidential nomination to a man (WHO) doesn't want it, hasn't worked for it and hasn't had a chance from the beginning.

Of course, it depends on what you mean by a "dark horse." If you just mean that its somebody you didn't think had a chance, then almost anyone who isn't an obvious favorite qualifies as a "dark horse." But if you think of a "dark horse" in the strict sense as a candidate who comes out of no where to his own and everyone else's surprise, well, then they're very scarce, indeed.

A current recreation of political writers is the promulgation of lists of supposed Democratic "dark horses." Most of them are not very dark at all. Take Governor Averell Harriman, who figures on many of them. Here is a man who has so many supporters around the country working for his cause that a recent strategy meeting in his interest was not only presided over by a former Democratic National Chairman, but it included representatives from 14 states. In the by no means unlikely event that Harriman gets the Democratic nomination, no one would be justified in calling him a "dark horse." Or take Senator Stuart Symington. He's on most of the "dark horse" lists. Yet the Missouri Democratic Committee has endorsed him as their candidate, and friends are beating the bushes for him all over the country. Another, frequently mentioned as a dark horse is the Democratic Leader in the Senate, Lyndon Johnson of Texas. Senator Johnson has been proposed as Texas's favorite son by no less a personage than Speaker of the House Sam Rayburn and a good many moderate Southerners are telling each other and their friends that he's just man.

People with the backing of these men just aren't "dark horses." They are contenders.... Just as Warren Harding was, although he's sometimes ~~xxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxx~~ referred to as an example of a dark horse nomination. There are a good many myths about nominees who were supposed to have been dark horses, but if you investigate them, in almost every instance the nomination ~~xxx~~ turns out to have been carefully engineered.... Like that of William Jennings Bryan, who is supposed to have so mesmerized the Democratic Convention of 1896 with his impromptu Cross of Gold Speech that they irresistibly swept him onto the ticket. Well, not only had Bryan been rehearsing his ad libs before the mirror for days, but his agents had been out among the delegates for months. His drive for the nomination was well-planned. He was second on the first ballot and won out on the fifth.

Of course there are a few instances of genuine dark horses getting the nomination. One occurred at the 1868 Democratic Convention which opened in Tammany Hall on the 4th of July. There were a number of prominent contenders, among them Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase and President Andrew Johnson, still smarting from the impeachment proceedings. The Convention made former Governor of New York Horatio Seymour the permanent chairman. The ballotting over which he presided was lengthy and confused. After the 18th ballot the convention adjourned for the night. The next day Ohio suddenly threw her votes to Seymour, the presiding officer, who hadn't even been mentioned before. Although he protested from the chair, Seymour ~~xxxx~~ was nominated on the 22nd ballot -- a man who had not expected and probably didn't even hope to be nominated.

Another dark horse who came through was James K. Polk. He got the nomination because the Democratic Convention of 1844 didn't want Martin Van Buren and had to have somebody. His name didn't even go in until the 8th ballot. Polk was so dark a horse that the convention's first nominee for Vice President refused to run on the same ticket with him, saying he did not choose to ride behind on the "black pony." Nevertheless Polk got elected and historians generally account him to have been a pretty fair President.

But few "dark horses" get nominated and fewer still elected. The highly organized politics of the 20th century do not lend themselves to the random selection of candidates. A national party has too much at stake to entrust its fortunes to a candidate who does not represent important elements of the party.

This is not to say that there can't be deadlocks, or that a deadlock isn't a real possibility at next summer's Democratic Convention. That could happen, and the lightning could strike someone who wasn't one of the front runners. But if it does, it will almost certainly strike someone you had heard about as a potential candidate, someone who was available and who was working for just that outcome. That's very different than a real dark horse coming out of nowhere to take down the prize.

I'LL BE BACK IN A MOMENT WITH A FOOTNOTE TO THE DAYS NEWS

BUT FIRST, BOB DIXON

FOOTNOTE

A note on the changing times...At the University of Oklahoma a professor of Zoology wants to study the bedbug. The only trouble is he can't find any. He's even offered his students an A if they come up with a collection of the little creatures. The students have combed the countryside, even advertised in the papers, but no one has got an A yet. The professor thinks insect extermination has practically eliminated the bedbug, which once figured in American folklore as heavily as Davy Crockett.

THIS IS C.C.... SEE YOU TOMORROW

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 28, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

CHARLES COLLINGWOOD REPORTING:

Good Evening:

Adlai Stevenson lashed out at Senator Kefauver tonight, accusing him of weakening the Democratic party by discrediting its leaders. Stevenson spoke in Los Agneles shortly after arriving in California to campaign for that state's 68 democratic presidential delegate votes. Kefauver himself is heading back east after five days of campaigning in California. Stevenson, who was defeated by Kefauver in the Minnesota primary last week, said Kefauver was trying to "injure" him and win support in California by the same "false and divisive boss nonsense". Kefauver had reaced in Minnesota. Stevenson was referring to Kefauver's charges that Stevenson had the support of the democratic bosses. Stevenson said he was honored to have the unsolicited support of party leaders in Minnesota and California, and that Kefauver had tried, and failed, to get the support of some of the same people. Stevenson said such tactics could only help the republicans. Stevenson also attacked the Eisenhower administration for its handling of foreign and domestic problems, including the farm problem and the Middle East crisis.

Senator Kefauver has already announced he will enter Indiana's democratic presidential primary. And aide to Adlai Stevenson said he would not enter that contest, which will be held on May 8th. Kefauver also entered in Nebraska.

Congress has voted to take a 10-day Easter recess starting at the end of tomorrow's session. The House shouted its approval of the recess resolution, and the Senate approved it without debate. The vacation ends Arpil 9th.

A Senate - House conference committee has decided to kill a farm bill provision that opponents said would drive cotton prices down from five to ten dollars a bale. The provision was aimed at improving the competitive position of American cotton in world markets. As the committee continued to revise the legislation, one member, Senator Holland of Florida, said: "We may have sounded the death knell for any farm bill this session."

President Eisenhower returned to Washington this afternoon by train from White Sulphur Springs, West Virginia. The President was described as "well satisfied" that his talks with Canadian and Mexican leaders served to build good will and help check the spread of communism. The President was said to have enjoyed particularly the atmosphere of cordial informality that prevailed throughout his conferences with his Canadian and Mexican guests.

Back in Washington, the President went directly to the White House, where he was said to have scheduled an important meeting with Secretary of State Dulles. The President met with Dulles for two hours. The Secretary declared afterwards that there was nothing urgent about the meeting. There had been some speculation earlier that the meeting had been arranged to discuss the latest Russian disarmement proposals submitted in London.

These proposals, submitted at the London disarmament talks, yesterday, have not yet been made public. However it's reported that in them, the Russians for the first time have embraced the basic idea of President Eisenhower's open sky arms inspection system. The Russian proposals are said to be qualified and incomplete. But despite this, diplomatic sources say they think Russia has come closer to the western position on inspection than ever before. They say the Russian plan has a genuine ring and represents something more than propaganda.

Russia is nor reported to have more engineers and scientists than the United States. This is disclosed in a special report prepared by a Library of Congress expert for the Senate - House Atomic Energy committee. The report goes on to say that Russia is now producing these specialists at such a rapid rate, that even the combined advantage now held by the United States and the countries of Western Europe is being threatened. According to the report, this country has about 760 - thousand engineers and scientists, compared to 890-thousand in Russia.

Russia has decided to lift its ban on foreigners travelling in Georgia and Armenia next week to permit Sweeden's Prime Minister to visit the area. Georgia, the home republic of Stalin, was the scene of recent student demonstrations protesting the current Kremlin campaign of criticism of the late dictator..The sharpest anti-Stalin criticism yet published in a soviet satellite country was made today in the newspaper of the Polish communist party. It condemned Stalin as a mentally sick man who employed slander as a weapon of murder..And in Communist East Germany, Premier Grotewohl criticized the justice ministry headed by Mrs. Hilde Benjamin, knows as "Red Hilde". He accused the ministry of making illegal and unjustified arrests of citizens. As Grotewohl spoke, before the East German communist party congress, Mrs. Benjamin sat on the speaker's platform, without batting an eyelash. She'll probably address the conference tomorrow or Friday.

The Internal Revenue Service declared today that the sudden tax raids on Communist party headquarters yesterday were made in line with standard operating procedure. Revenue Commissioner Harrington issued a brief statement after conferring with Donald Moysey, New York regional tax cheif, who apparently ordered the crackdown on his own authority, and without informing Washington in advance. Moysey figured that the communist party owed 389 - thousand dollars in back income taxes. Tax agents, going thorugh the Daily Worker's assets in New York today, reportedly found 48-cents and an old magazine in one safe, and 10-dollars and 52 cents in another safe.

Indicentally the crackdown on the communist party for failure to file federal tax returns appears to have raised some questions for the republican and democratic parties, also. Spokesman for both national committees said they do not file returns with the internal revenue service. At the same time, a government tax expert said there is no exemption from filing for political parties, even if they are not required to pay any income taxes. But Commissioner Harrington refused to discuss the matter, and he wouldn't say whether any action is planned against the democratic or republican parties for failure to file returns.

U.S. Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge declared in the U.N. Security Council today that the only purpose in the United States resolution to send Secretary General Hammarskjold to the Middle East is to prevent war. He spoke to dispel the fears of the Arab states regarding the aim of the American proposal, and to call for its speedy approval by the Security Council. In the Holy Land, Egypt and Israel each accused the other of starting an exchange of gun fire that lasted three hours this morning.

A fierce spring storm lashed the western prarie states today. Crops in the great plains were smothered with dust, while sleet, freezing rain, snow and ice were cast on the northern midwest. Chill winds, ranging from 30 to 60 miles an hour ranged from Kansas into the Dakotas, Minnesots, Wisconsin, Michigan and the Great Lakes. Sections of the midwest were virtually paralyzed, as high winds knocked down untility lines and ice-coated trees. Ice, slush and deep snow closed many highways.. At least ten Wisconsin communities were cut off by bad weather, while other towns were isolated in Minnesota and the Dakotas.

Negroes and white sympathizers in scattered cities across the nation paused for prayer today on behalf of the bus boycotters in Montgomery, Alabama. However, there is no estimate of the number of persons taking part in the movement described as "National Deliverance Day of Prayer." In Boston, Episcopal Bishop Norman Nash told 8 - hundred worshippers that discrimination exists "right here in Boston" -- adding that the guilty are not only "they" but also "we."

Ever since Estes Kefauver bowled over Adlai Stevenson in Minnesota there's been a great deal of talk about the possibilbty of a "dark horse" capturing the Democratic Presidential nomination. It makes interesting conversation, but its a little like speculating about the unicorn. Its not quite true that there ain't now such animal as a "dark horse" in politics, but he's considerably more rare than the whooping crane. Its almost a rule of politics, that a a party does not give its presidentialnomination to a man who doesn't want it, hasn't worked for it and hasn't had a chance from the beginning.

Of course, it depends on what you mean by a "dark horse". If you just mean that its somebody you didn't think had a chance, then almost anyone who isn't an obvious favorite qualifies as a "dark horse". But if you think of a "dark horse" in the strict sense as as candidate who comes out of no where to his own and everyone else's surprise, well, then they're very scarce, indeed.

A current recreation of political writers is the promulgation of lists of supposed Demo ratic "dark horses." Most of them are not very dark at all. Take Governor Averell Harriman, who figures in many of them. Here is a man who has so many supporters around the country working for his cause that a recent strategy meeting in his interest was not only presided over by a former Democratic National Chairman, but it included representatives from 14 states. In the by no means unlikely event that Harriman gets the Democratic nomination, no one would be justified in calling him a "dark horse." Or take Senator Stuart Symington. He's on most of the "dark horse" lists. Yet the Missouri Democratic Committee has endorsed him as their candidate, and friends are beating the bushes for him all over the country. Another frequently mentioned as a dark horse is the Democratic Leader in the Senate, Lyndon Johnson of Texas. Senator Johnson has been proposed as Texas's favorite son by no less a personage than Speaker of the House Sam Rayburn and a good many moderate Southerners are telling each other and their friends that he's just the man.

People with the backing of these men just aren't "dark horses". They are contenders..just as Warren Harding was, although he's sometimes referred to as an example of a dark horse nomination. There are a good many myths about nominees who were supposed to have been dark horses, but if you investigate them in almost every instance the nominationturns out to have been carefully engineered..like that of William Jennings Bryan, who is supposed to have so mesmerized the Democratic Convention of 1896 with his impromptu Cross of Gold Speech that they irresistibly swept him onto the ticket. Well, now only had Bryan been rehearsing his ad libs before a mirror for days but his agents had been out among the delegates for months. His drive for the nomination was well-planned. He was second of the first ballot and won out of the fifth.

Of course there are a few instances of genuine dark horses getting the nomination. One occurred at the 1868 Democratic Convention which opened in Tammany Hall on the 4th of July. There were a number of prominent contenders, among them Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase and President Andrew Johnson, still smarting from the impeachment proceedings. The Convention made former Governor of New York Horatio Seymour the permanent chairman. The balloting over which he presided was lengthy and confused. After the 18th ballot the convention adjourned for the night. The next day Ohio suddenly threw her votes to Seymour, the presiding officer who hadn't even been mentioned before. Although he protested from the chair, Seymour was nominated on the 22nd ballot -- a man who had notexpected and probably didn't even hope to be nominated.

Another dark horse who came through was James K. Polk. He got the nomination because the Democratic Convention of 1844 didn't want Martin Van Buren and had to have somebody. His name didn't even go in until the 8th ballot. Polk was so dark a horse that the convention's first nominee for Vice President refused to run on the same ticket with him, saying he did not choose to ride behind on the "black pony". Nevertheless Polk got elected and historians generally account him to have been a pretty fair President.

But few "dark forses" get nominated and fewer still elected. The highly organized politics of the 20th century do not lend themselves to random selection of candidates. A national party has too much at stake to entrust its fortunes to a candidate who does not represent important elements of the party.

This is not to say that there can't be deadlocks, or that a deadlock isn't a real possibility at next summer's Democratic Convention. That could happen, and the lightning could strike someone who wasn't one of the front runners. But if it does, it will almost certainly strike someone who had heard about as a potential candidate, someone who was available and who was working for just that outcome. That's very different than a real dark horse. coming out of nowhere to take down the prize.

I'll be back in a moment with a footnote to the say's news. But first, Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

COLLINGWOOD; A note on the changing times..at the University of Oklahoma a professor of zoology wants to study the bedbug. The only trouble is he can't find any. He's even offered his students an A if they can come up with a collection of the little creatures. The students have combed the countryside, even advertised in the papers, but no one has got an A yet. The professor thinks insect extermination has practically eliminated the bedbug, which once figured in American folklore as heavily as Davy Crockett.

This is Charles Collingwood. See you tomorrow.

7.45 pm 3/29/56 collingwood - picker

Congress adjourned today for a ten-day Easter holiday until April 9. ~~And~~ Many members are planning to return to their home districts to do some politicking in preparation for the fall campaign. ~~They'll be back in Washington April 9th, and from then on will probably work without a major break until July or early August.~~

But even before today's adjournment there was plenty of politicking being done. Senator Kefauver was hand-shaking in the streets of Santa Fe and Albuquerque, in New Mexico today. ~~But he said he would not say anything disparaging about Adlai Stevenson, one of his chief opponents for the democratic presidential nomination -- despite Stevenson's attack on Kefauver in a speech in Los Angeles last night.~~ The Tennessee senator was asked by a reporter if he felt he could defeat President Eisenhower in a presidential race. And Kefauver replied: "I do not have the attractive personality of the president, but I think I do have a program that is good for the people."

During the day it was announced that Kefauver would make a five day barnstorming tour of New Jersey starting April 6th, in a campaign for that state's 72 national democratic convention delegates. And the office of New Jersey Governor Robert Meyner says Kefauver has declined an invitation to have lunch with the governor ~~on that date.~~ WHILE IN THE STATE.

Governor Meyner heads a slate of delegates that he says would go to the democratic convention unpledged, although some of them are said to favor Adlai Stevenson. Kefauver will campaign for a slate of delegates pledged to himself.

Adlai Stevenson, now campaigning in California, said in Los Angeles today that he will continue as a candidate for the Presidential nomination, regardless of the outcome of his California primary battle with Senator Kefauver on June 5th. Stevenson says this contest will be "very significant," but comments that he can't say whether it will be "decisive." ~~The California primary is generally viewed as a showdown between the two democratic presidential candidates.~~ HOPEFULS And Stevenson added that he didn't expect to lose. Then, following the tactics of Kefauver, he went on a handshaking tour of the Los Angeles garment district.

House Speaker Rayburn struck another blow today in his running battle with Governor Allan Shivers of Texas. Rayburn described Shivers as "a frustrated man" who "appears to realize that he is on a leaking boat which may go down at any time." Rayburn, is in a fight with Shivers over the democratic party leadership in Texas. Recently RAYBURN suggested that the Texas delegation to the democratic national convention be headed by Senator Lyndon Johnson, and THAT IT support Johnson as a favorite son candidate for president.

Shivers, in return accused Rayburn of a cynical effort to divide Texas conservatives. But Rayburn said today he belongs to no faction, except the democratic party, adding, "if that angers some people, they may make the most of it."

On the Republican side, President Eisenhower today accepted with what he called "profound personal regret" the resignation of Douglas McKay as Secretary of the Interior. And the President wished McKay well in his campaign to win the seat in the senate now held by Wayne Morse of Oregon. Morse, it will be recalled, was elected as a republican but later switched and became a democrat. And the republicans obviously would derive much satisfaction in defeating Morse next November.

President Eisenhower had another long meeting today with Secretary of State Dulles, and this time Attorney General Brownell was present. This followed a two hour meeting between the President and Dulles last night. ~~a meeting that was described in advance as "very important."~~ There was no official word on what was discussed at the two meetings, but there's speculation that they involved high policy decisions, perhaps dealing with the Middle East, and with the disarmament negotiations now going on in London. Speculation that the talks might have dealt with disarmament was heightened by the appearance TODAY at the White House of Bernard Baruch, chief author of the atomic control plan submitted by this country to the United Nations several years ago.

State Department officials were reported worried today over the demand of the Iceland parliament for the withdrawal of United States forces from that country. The Icelandic resolution voted yesterday is being given much study, and a State Department spokesman says there will be no comment until the matter has been thoroughly weighed from all angles. Iceland lies about midway between Moscow and New York, and is considered an important Atlantic defense position.

The House Appropriations Committee made public this evening a 1-thousand, 236-page volume of testimony recently given by the nation's top military leaders in support of the 35-billion dollar defense budget for the coming fiscal year. Here are some of the highlights: The Army Chief of Staff, General Maxwell Taylor, wants the army to have 500-thousand men more than the 1-million listed for next year. The Air force chief of staff, General Twining, testified that his department will have to reduce its fighting wings unless it gets more money next year, and several billions of dollars more for years to come...Admiral Arleigh Burke told the committee that Russia has at least 4-hundred submarines, and is increasing U-boat output at what he calls "an alarming rate."... Defense Secretary Wilson warns that atomic stockpiles are approaching the point where either the United States or Russia could "practically wipe out the world."

Wilson adds that the toughest problem facing U.S. military planners is what he calls "the unlimited race to destruction." ...And Air Force Secretary Donald Quarles expresses the belief that the United States and Russia are moving into what he terms a situation of "mutual deterrence" in which neither side will dare attack the other.

Undersecretary of state Herbert Hoover, junior, told senate investigators today he was "in error" when he testified the other day that the Chinese nationalists were shipping millions of dollars worth of goods to communist china every year. Hoover says he has no evidence of any direct trade between the nationalists and the communists. He explains there has been indirect trade, through the British crown colony of Hong Kong, over which the chinese nationalist government has no control.

Senate-House conferees on farm legislation have handed the administration two more setbacks. The lawmakers wrote two-price plans for wheat and cotton, into their new, compromise farm bill -- and they scheduled another night session tonight, to continue work on other provisions. They hope to have the bill in final shape by the time Congress returns from its Easter recess April 9th.

During the day, the Senate passed and sent to the House a bill increasing from 250-thousand to 400-thousand dollars a year the federal authorizations for the education of the blind.

A federal court jury in New Haven, Connecticut, has found 6 COMMUNIST LEADERS guilty of violating the Smith Act, which makes it a crime to conspire to teach or advocate the forceful overthrow of the government. The jury found another defendant innocent, and failed to agree on the eighth defendant. The jury received the case last Saturday after hearing more than 2-million words of testimony during the 5-month trial.

Overseas, the government of communist Hungary today overruled the verdict of one of its trials. But it was two late for five of the defendants. All five had been executed years ago -- including the one-time foreign minister of Hungary, Laszlo Rajk. Three other defendants in that treason trial back in 1949 had escaped with prison terms, and it's believed they will now be freed. The communist party chief of Hungary, Matyas Rakosi, today branded the convictions a mistake based on false evidence. Among other things, the victims had been charged with being "Titoists,"

India's Prime Minister Nehru has made one of his sharpest attacks so far on western alliances. He told the Indian parliament that the Baghdad and SEATO pacts "pushed the world in the wrong direction" and "blocked right tendencies" working for peace, and disarmament. And he charged that the two alliances tended to encircle India "in two or three directions.

114

In Algeria, increased fighting is reported between French troops and nationalist rebels. As many as 160 persons were reported killed in the last 24 hours. And the French are reinforcing the 200-thousand troops they already have stationed in the vast, troubled territory.

In the Holy Land, Israel and Syria exchanged a total of 46 prisoners today -- 41 persons returned to Syria, and five to Israel. The exchange was made under the auspices of the U.N. truce supervision organization....Meantime, Israel has asked U.N. authorities to investigate three new Egyptian attacks on the Israeli border.

Charles Collingwood
29 March 7:45 PM

THINK

The Congress of the United States, both the House and the Senate, have adjourned for ten days in order to celebrate properly the advent of the Easter season. Speaking purely professionally, they will be missed. For broadcasters, reporters, commentators, editorial writers and such have a special affection for Congress. Congress provides much grist for the mighty mill of news and public enlightenment which we serve. The words in their mouths are bread and butter in ours. Now that Congress is gone, for the next ten days we will have to depend on fires, floods, international crises and the weddings of movie actresses for things to talk about.

Not everyone takes as generous a view of Congress as the fraternity of news gatherers and news writers. Mark Twain, who reserved some of his gustiest invective for our legislators, once said sourly: " Fleas can be taught nearly everything that a Congressman can." And Henry Adams approvingly quoted a member of Grant's administration that "You can't use tact with a Congressman. A Congressman is a hog. You must take a stick and hit him on the snout.

Indeed, the American people have traditionally taken a curiously divided attitude toward members of Congress. On the one hand we load them with responsibility, burden them with routine, and demand wise action where Solomon himself would be perplexed. On the other, we regard them with suspicion, impugn their motives, and, if we aren't angry with them, we laugh at them. We demand the best and believe the worst.

Actually, the objective student of Congress would probably place it about where Abraham Lincoln did. It is told of Lincoln that when he was campaigning for his term in the House, he went to church one Sunday, as campaigners were careful to do in that day as well as this. In the course of his sermon, the preacher asked everyone who wanted to go to heaven to raise his hand. Everybody did except Lincoln. Then he asked everyone who wanted to go to the Other Place ~~to~~ raise his hand. Once again, Lincoln kept his hand by his side. The preacher leaned forward from the pulpit and said: "Mr. Lincoln doesn't seem to want to go to Heaven. And he doesn't want to go to the Other Place. Where, may I ask, does he want to go?" .... From the pew Lincoln said: "I want to go to Congress."

Well, that's about where Congress seems to be.... Somewhere between Heaven and the Other Place, like most of the rest of us. Made up of people, like most of the rest of us, trying to do the right thing and more than a little confused as to what that should be. The men and women in Congress are a pretty good reflection of the whole American community. They share the virtues and the weaknesses, the insights and the blind spots of all of us. As E.W. Howe once said: "After a man has been out of Congress awhile, people say, ' You wouldn't think that man had been in Congress, would you?'"

This particular Congress, the ~~83rd~~ 84TH of its line, has not, perhaps, set any records for massive achievment. Indeed, since its controlled by the Democrats, the Republicans are already talking about calling it a do-nothing Congress and using it as a campaign issue. Although Majority Leader Lyndon Johnson maintained today this Congress is much farther along at this point than usual, But the fact is that few of its actions have been taken on party lines. Coalitions have sprung up on almost every issue. Both Democrats and Republicans, according TO ~~ot~~ their lights and the fact that this is an election year, have labored manfully on an unusually complex set of problems. They haven't passed many important bills, but if they seem to have been inexcusably slow, just sit down and try to solve the farm problem some afternoon, or decide just how we ought to act in ~~solve~~ the Middle East crisis, or how we should best insure a proper posture of defense.

Few Congresses have been presented with a more difficult group of decisions, and few will begrudge ~~them~~ the ~~83rd~~ 84th its ten days of Easter Holiday. A reporter might wish them refreshment, a chance to take a long look at their problems, and an opportunity to renew contacts with the people they serve. And he might hope that the ladies and gentlemen of the ~~83rd~~ 84TH Congress will return on April 9, bouyed up in spirit, restored in enthusiasm, and full of quotable observations on the world around us. For the news will be less interesting while they are away.

I'LL BE BACK IN A MOMENT WITH A FOOTNOTE TO THE DAYS NEWS.....BUT FIRST _____

FOOTNOTE

Just to keep everybody up to date on the Grace Kelly wedding picture, its raining in Monaco today, but all the Monegasques, including Prince Rainier are hoping for clear skies on the big day. In spite of the weather, the roads to Monaco from the French Riviera and Italy are already solid with cars and many minor accidents reported. 20 thousand more visitors have made Easter reservations in Monaco this year than last.. No wonder the people of Monaco are happy over the event.

THIS IS C.C..... SEE YOU ~~XXT~~ TOMORROW

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

THURSDAY, MARCH 29, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

CHARLES COLLINGWOOD REPORTING

Good Evening:

Congress adjourned today for a ten-day Easter holiday, until April 9th. Many members are planning to return to their home districts to do some politicking in preparation for the fall campaign.

But even before today's adjournment there was plenty of politicking being done. Senator Kefauver was hand-shaking in the streets of Santa Fe and Albuquerque, in New Mexico today. The Tennessee senator was asked by a reporter if he felt he could defeat President Eisenhower in a presidential race. And Kefauver replied: I do not have the attractive personality of the president, but I think I do have a program that is good for the people."

Adlai Stevenson, now campaigning in California, said in Los Angeles today thet he will continue as a candidate for the presidential nomination regardless of the outcome of his California primary battle with the Senator Kefauver on June 5th. Stevenson says this contest will be "very significant", but comments that he can't say whether it will be "decisive". And Stevensoon added that he didn't expect to lose. Then, following the tactics of Kefauver, he went on a handshaking tour of the Los Angeles garment district.

House Speaker Rayburn struck another blow today in his running battle with Governor Allen Shivers of Texas. Rayburn described Shivers as "a frustrated man" who "appears to realize that is is on a leaking boat which may go down at any time." Rayburn is in a fight with Shivers over the democratic party leadership in Texas. Recently Rayburn suggested that the Texas delegation to the democratic national convention be headed by Senator Lyndon Johnson, and that it support Johnson as afavorite son candidate for president. Shivers in return accused Rayburn of a cynical effort to divide Texas conservatives. But Rayburn said today he belongs to no faction, except the democratic party, adding, "if that angers some people, they may make the most of it."

On the Republican side, President Eisenhower today accepted with what he called "profound personal regret" the resignation of Douglas McKay as Secretary of the Interior. And the President wished McKay well in his campaign to win the seat in the senate now held by Wayne Morse of Oregon. Morse, it will be recalled, was elected as a republican but later switched and became a democrat. And the Republicans obviously would derive much satisfaction in defeating Morse next November.

President Eisenhower had another long meeting today with Secretary of State Dulles, and this time Attorney General Brownell was present. This followed a two hour meeting between the President and Dulles last night. There was no official work on what was discussed at the two meetings, but there's speculation that they involved high policy decisions, perhaps dealing with the middle East, and with the disarmement negotiations now going on in London. Speculation what the talks might have dealt with disarmement was heightened by the appearance today at the White House of Bernard Baruch, chief author of the atomic control plan submitted by this country to the United Nations several years ago.

State Department officials were reported worried today over the demand of the Icelandic parliament for the withdrawal of United States forces from that country. The Icelandic resolution voted yesterday is being given much study, and a State Department spokesman says there will be no comment until the matter has been thoroughly weighed from all angles. Iceland lies about midway between Moscow and New York, and is considered an important Atlantic defense position.

The House Appropriations Committee made public this evening a 1-thousand, 236 - page volume of testimony recently given by the nation's top military leaders in support of the 35-billion dollar defense budget for the coming fiscal year. Here are some of the highlights: The Army Chief of Staff, General Maxwell Taylor, wnnts the army to have 500-thousand men more than the 1-million listed for next year. The Air force chief of staff, General Twining, testified that his department will have to reduce its fighting wings unless it gets more money next year, and several billions of dollars more for years to come. Admiral Arleigh Burke told the committee that Russia has at least 4-hundred submarines, and is increasing U-boat output at that he calls "an alarming rate". Defense Secretary Wilson warns that atomic stockpiles are approaching the point where either the United States or Russia could "practically wipe out the world." Wilson adds that the toughest problem facing U.S. military planners is what he calls "the unlimited race to destruction". And Air Force Secretary Donald Quarles expresses the belief that the Unites States and Russia are moving into what he terms a situation of "mutual deterrence" in which neither side will dare attack the other.

Undersecretary of state Herbert Hoover, junior. told senate investigators today he was "in error" when he testified the other day that the Chinese nationalists were shipping millions of dollars worth of goods to communist China every year. Hoover says he has no evidence of any direct trade between the nationalists and the communists. He explains there has been indirect trade, through the British crown colony of Hong Kong, over hwich the chinese nationalist government has no control.

Senate-House conferees on farm legislation have handed the administration two more setbacks. the lawmakers wrote two-price plans for wheat and cotton, into their new, compromise farm bill - and they scheduled another night session tonight, to continue work on other provisions. They hope to have the bill the bill in final shape by the time Congress returns from its Easter recess April 9th.

A federal court jury in New Haven, Connecticut, has found a communist leaders guilty of violating the Smith Act, which makes it a crime to conspire to teach or advocate the forceful overthrow of the government. The jury found another defendant innocent, and failed to agree on the eighth defendant.

Overseas, the government of communist Hungary today overruled the verdict of one of its trials. But it was two late for five of the defendants. All five had been executed years ago- including the one-time foreign minister of Hungary, Laszlo Rajk. Three other defendants in that treason trial back in 1949 has escaped with prison terms, and it's believed they will now be freed. The communist party chief of Hungary Matyas Rakoski, today branded the convictions a mistake based on false evidence. Among other things, the victims had been charged with being "Titoists."

India's Prime Minister Nehru has made one of his sharpest attacks so far on western alliances. He told the Indian parliament that the Baghdad and SEATO Pacts "pushed the world in the wrong direction" and "blocked right tendencies" working for peace and disarmamant. And he charged that the two alliances tended to encircle India "in two or three directions.

In Algeria, increased fighting is reported between French troops and nationalist rebels. As many as 160 persons were reported killed in the last 24 hours. And the French are reinforcing the 200-thousand troops they already have stationed in the vast, troubled territory.

In the Holy Land, Israel and Syria exchanged a total of 46 prisoners today -- 41 persons returned to Syria, and five to Israel. The exchange was made under the auspices of the U.N. truce supervision organization. Meantime, Israel has asked U.N. authroities to investigate three new Egyptian attacks on the Israeli border.

The Congress of the United States, both the House and the Senate, have adjourned for ten days in order to celebrate properly the advent of the Easter season. Speaking purely professionally, they will be missed. For broadcasters, reporters, commentators, editorial writers and such have a special affection for Congress. Congress provides much grist for the mighty mill of news and public enlightenment which we serve. The words in their mouths are bread and butter in ours. Now that Congress is gone, for the next ten days we will have to depend on fires, floods, internationalcrises and the weddings of movie actresses for things to talk about.

Not everyone takes as generous a view of Congress as the fraternity of news gatherers and news writers. Mark Twain, who reserved some of his gustiest invective for our legislators, once said sourley: "Fleas can be taught nearly everything that a Congressman can." And Henry Adams approvingly quoted a member of Grant's administration that "You can't use tact with a Congressman. A Congressman is a hog. You must take a stick and hit him on the snout.

Indeed, the American people have traditionally taken a curiously divided attitude toward members of Congress. On the one hand we load them with responsibility, burden them with routine, and demand wise action where Solomon himelsf would be perplexed. On the other, we regard them with suspicion, impugn their motives, and, if we aren't angry with them, we laugh at them. We demand the best and believe the worst.

Actually, the objective student of Congress would probably place it about where Abraham Lincoln did. It is told of Lincoln that when he was campaigning for his term in the House, he went to church on Sunday, as campaigners were careful to do in that day as well as this. In the course of his sermon, the preacher asked everyone who wanted to go to heaven to raise his hand. Everybody did except Lincoln. Then he asked everyone wanted to go to the Other Place.

to rais his hand. Once again, Lincoln kept his hand by his side. The preacher leaned forward from the pulpit and said: "Mr. Lincoln doesn't seem to want to go to Heaven and he doesn't want to go to the Other Place. Where, may I ask, does he want to go?" From the pew Lincoln siad: "I want to go to Congress."

Well, that's about there Congress seems to be. Somewhere between Heaven and the Other Place, like most of the rest of us. Made up of people, like most of the rest of us, trying to do the right thing and more than a little confused as to what that should be. The men and women in Congress are a pretty good reflection of the whole American community. They share the virtues and weaknesses, and insights and the blind spots of all of us. As E.W. Howe once said: "After a man has been out of Congress a while, people way, "You wouldn't think that man mad been in Congress, would you?"

This particular Congress, the 84th of its line, has not, perhaps, set any records for massive achievement. Indeed, since its controlled by the Democrats, the Republicans are already talking about calling it a do-nothing Congress and using it as a campaign issue. Although Majority Leader Lyndon Johnson maintained today this Congress is much further along at this point than usual. But the fact is that few of its actions have been taken on party lines. Coalitions have sprung up on almost every issue. Both Democrats and Republicans, according to their lights and the fact that this is an election year, have labored manfully on an unsuually complex set of problems. They haven't passed many important bills, but if they seem to have been inexcusably slow, just sit down and dry to solve the farm problem some afternoon, or decide just how we ought to act in the Middle East crisis, or how we should best insure a proper posture of defense.

Few Congresses have been presented with a more difficult group of decisions, and few will begrudge the 84th its ten days of Easter Holiday. A reporter mightwish them refreshment, a chance to take a long look at their problems, and an opportunity to renew contacts with the people they serve. And he might hope that the ladies and gentlemen of the 84th Congress will return in April 9, bouyed up in spirit, restored in enthusians, and full of quotable observations on the world aroundus. For the news will be less interesting while they are away.

I'll be back in a moment with a footnote to the day's news..but first....

ANNOUNCER: COMMERCIAL

COLLINGWOOD: Just to keep everybody up to date on the Grace Kelly wedding picture, its raining in Monaco today, but al the Monegasques, including Prince Rainier are hoping for clear skies on the big day. In spite of the weather, the roads to Monaco from the French Riviera and Italy are already solid with cars and many minor accidents reported. 20 thousand more visitors have made Easter reservations in Monaco this year than last. No wonder the people of Monaco are happy over the event.

This is Charles Collingwoood. See you tomorrow.

Good evening.

While there were no new military incidents in the Middle East today, diplomatic developments continued on several fronts. In Washington, Israeli Ambassador Abba Eban made his second call this week at the State Department. Eban refused to say what took place in the talks---specifically whether Israel's request for American arms was mentioned.

There is speculation in Washington that some new policy may be taking shape regarding the Middle East. In fact, Republican Representatives Keating of New York and Scott of Pennsylvania quote State Department officials as saying the Department is "crystallizing" a policy it hopes will promote peace between Israel and the Arab states.

In Tel Aviv, Israel's Foreign Minister Moshe Sharett conferred with Soviet Minister Alexander Abramov. There is no word on the topics they discussed. But in Jerusalem, the Israeli Chief of Staff General Moshe Dayan told a "public guidance" meeting that Israel needs only forty to fifty jet planes and other modern arms to offset the military assistance the Arabs are getting from the Communist bloc. He said Israel has a good chance of winning any new Palestine war, but warned that she could be defeated without a fight if the Arabs can win the goodwill of the West. And this, he said, the Arabs may try to achieve.

Egypt's Premier Nasser spoke out against the United Nations and the West today in an interview with Ludwell Denny of the Scripps-Howard newspaper chain. For one thing, he accused the United States of supporting British and French colonialism and of forcing Egypt to purchase arms from the Communists. But he credited his Soviet arms deal with reducing the danger of a Palestine war and denied that there is a risk of Egypt becoming a Soviet satellite. Nasser attacked the United Nations for failure to enforce its Palestine decisions and armistice agreements. He recognized the duty of the UN to intervene with force if necessary against aggression, but challenged the right of the Western powers to intervene under their tripartite agreement or otherwise. And Nasser attacked the Baghdad Pact as an imperialistic plot against Arab nationalism, which he described as the only barrier in the Middle East against Communist subversion.

French Foreign Minister Pineau protested to Syria and Lebanon today against an Arab League communique which pledged all-out aid to rebels in Algeria. And because of this action there were reports that Pineau is considering postponing his scheduled tour of the Middle East.

The French continued their campaign against the Algerian rebels today, claiming to have killed sixty-six of them in the past 24-hours. Meanwhile, the underground Algerian "liberation army" distributed propaganda leaflets, boasting that it will drive the French out of Algeria and then conquer the Southern part of France, which it called "the land of our Ancestors."

On the brighter side for the French, there was some promise of relief from attacks by rebel tribesmen in Morocco. There 30-young Chieftains of the outlaw "liberation army" knelt before Sultan ben Youssef today and promised to lay down their arms. The Sultan thanked them and said their actions will be called "one of our most beautiful pages of history."

Communist confusion continues in several spots over the new anti-Stalin campaign. The confusion appears greatest in France and Italy, with a possibility of large-scale defections. French Communist leader Maurice Thorez has arrived in Rome. Italian Communists say he is there only to see the sights, but he is expected to meet secretly with Italy's Communist boss, Palmiro Togliatti.

British Communists opened a party convention in London with no reference to the anti-Stalin line. Party members played it safe by concentrating on self-criticism of their own failure to exploit the gospel of Communism throughout Britain.

The Communists in East Germany ended their annual conference today. Ernst Wollweber, head of the East German secret police, admitted publicly that some false arrests have occurred in Communist states and ordered an easing of police methods in East Germany. He said, "certain measures which were formerly necessary are no longer needed in the same degree." The convention named an eight-man commission to re-examine party expulsions and punishment handed out to former comrades.

Communist China finally broke its silence on the anti-Stalin issue by circulating the attack which was made on Stalin ~~in~~ this week by the Russian Communist party newspaper Pravda.

Most of the Congress is enjoying a 10-day Easter recess but some of the legislators are still around cleaning up important business. Most important is the work of the House-Senate conference committee which is trying to iron out differences in the omnibus farm bill. They don't expect to have the bill as a whole ready before late next week, but they did make some headway today. For one thing, they agreed on a financing plan for the soil bank plan. They also agreed on details of a 450-million dollar conservation reserve, and approved an extra 500-million a year to buy surplus ~~xxx~~ pork and other perishable commodities outside regular price support operations. Earlier, the committee accepted a Senate provision that would allow the government to pay costs of processing surplus food commodities ~~kk~~ which are given away in this country and abroad. They rejected another

Senate proposal that would have directed larger acreage allotments for Virginia and Valencia type peanuts in states now having allotments under ten thousand acres. But they accepted provisions increasing the existing penalties for planting and marketing peanuts in excess of allotments.

Incidentally, the Agriculture Department reports that the nation's farmers showed a slight gain in their financial position between mid-February and Mid March. The prices they received for their products went up two percent during that period, making a total gain of three percent since the first of the year. At the same time, the prices of goods and services the farmers have to buy went up only about one-and-a-half percent since January 1st.

Senator McClellan says two Senators have suggested interesting leads to his special lobbying committee. That is the committee that will take up where ~~the~~ Senator George's committee left off in looking into the campaign contribution ~~that~~ which was offered to Senator Case. George was to have made his report on that inquiry today but put it off until ~~the~~ late next week. He says there is no disagreement among committee members---that "it's just a question of how to formulate the report."

All over the world, the faithful today observed Good Friday, and began preparing for the more joyous occasion of Easter Sunday. In Washington President and Mrs. Eisenhower attended Good Friday services at the National Presbyterian church. And the President sent the Pastor a letter in which he said that Good Friday is "of significance to all throughout the free world who strive to uphold the values of a civilization in which the Christian heritage is of immeasurable value."

At the Vatican, Pope Pius Twelfth appeared at the window of his study to bless the pilgrims who gathered in the vast St. Peter's Square below.

In the Holy Land, pilgrims followed the usual custom of travelling along the Via Dolorosa---the path followed by Christ as he carried the cross to Calvary. There were fewer pilgrims than in recent years because of the fear of some that war there might be imminent. Those who were there today were drenched by the rains of a heavy thunderstorm that struck Jerusalem only a few hours before they began their journey.

At home, the weather bureau in Washington issued a special Easter weather advisory predicting "a wide variety" of weather for Sunday. It ranges from fair on the East Coast to rain and snow in the Northern Plains and the Great Lakes region. Fair weather also is forecast for the Pacific Coast "except for Washington and Oregon, where increasing cloudiness may be followed by rain."

52

Charles Collingwood
30 March 7:45 PM

THINK

Yesterday the Government Printing Office issued a volume that ran to 1 thousand two hundred and some pages. Thats a pretty big book, even in this day of uncorsetted best sellers. This particular book will never be a best seller, though... It concerns a subject which most people don't particularly want to think about -- although if you were to pick ~~xxxxxxxx~~ the subject most ~~likely~~ important to our national survival, it might well be the one this book is about. For this 12 hundred page volume deals with national defense -- with air power, guided missiles, foot soldiers and atomic submarines. Its the record of the hearings ~~xxxxx~~ on the Defense Budget so far held by the House Committee on Aprropriations.

Now that's an awful lot of testimony, but its only before one Committee of Congress . In addition there's a vast accumulation of speeches, statements, articles and other official, semi-official, authoritative, and well-informed material.... And still the record is not in. The fact is that a debate of massive proportions is now going on around our defense program.... How much it should cost, what it should consist of and how it should be used. Its hard to think of a more important subject for discussion. Because if the debate doesn't produce the right answers, one of these days we could be in a terrible fix. But its one of the paradoxes of public opinion that this vast and vital discussion hardly echoes outside the halls of Congress and the endless corridors of the Pentagon. The ordinary citizen seems to throw up his hands and say "This is too complicated for me... I'll leave it to the experts."..... And the Defense Department itself hasn't helped by drawing a veil of security over the whole area which discourages discussion... If you want to get details, you have to dig.

But the broad outlines of this debate on our national security program are quite plain for all to see. They reveolve around three things... How much should it cost... What forces should it contain .... and how should they be used.... The cost problem looms largest, as perhaps it should when ~~you're talking about from~~ you start talking at around 35 to 40 billion dollars a year. The problem here is basically whether you start out by figuring how much the economy can afford for defense without interfering too much with other things and then tailor your forces to that, or whether you decide first what you think you really need in terms of defense and then get up the money no matter how much it is. In Washington the problem is usually put as whether Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey or Secretary of Defense Wilson is to decide how big the Defense Department's budget will be. In actual practise its a matter of compromise, of course, but its generally accepted that the Treasury's voice has been effective is securing a ceiling on Defense expenditures.

Now, obviously, if the amount of money you're going to spend is limited, then the things you can spend it on are going to be limited, too. This is the next area of the defense debate... On the one hand are those who say that our defense program should be kept up to snuff in all areas -- that we should be as good or better than our potential enemies in ground forces, in missiles, in air defense and in strategic air power, in submarines and surface ships. That we should be ready to meet a military threat in whatever area it is presented... Opposed to this is the theory that we can't be strong everywhere, and that therefore we should concentrate on one weapon and strategy, such as long range atomic bombers, even at the expense of other weapon systems. This is the tendency when you put a ceiling on defense expenditures. The people who disagree with it say that the trouble is maybe the enemy won't challenge you in a way that can be replied to with atomic bombers... What do you do then?

That of course, brings up the third great area of the debate. How do you employ the forces which you have. Do you spread your forces over a wide area to protect United States security interests in a variety of places? Or do you concentrate them to protect the most vital security interests? That of course, involves diplomacy. The situations in which you might have to use force depend upon the committments which have been made by diplomacy... Those committments in turn have to depend, or should depend, on what forces you have...

Its all interrelated.... ~~Thexkmexxidex~~ But two main positions emerge. On the one side you have those who want a limit put on defense expenditures. They also tend to place the emphasis on a single weapon and strategy and to be in favor of limited committments. The other side wants the defense budget to be based on military requirements. They generally favor a broad range of weapons in all of which we will be as good or better than our enemy, and they prefer to spread these out in order to meet an enemy threat with appropriate response wherever it appears to threaten United States interests..

Now there are all ~~kk~~ sorts of side issues and shadings of opinion between these two broad and over-simplified positions. But these are the ~~main~~ two main poles in the debate now going on. You can make good arguments on either side, and in between, and believe me, they are being made.... As they should be. For, this may not be the happiest thought to leave with you for the Easter season, but a lot of history may depend on whether we come up with the right answer.

I'LL BE BACK IN A MOMENT WITH A FOOTNOTE TO THE DAYS NEWS...

BUT FIRST, BOB DIXON

FOOTNOTE

At a London tavern called "The Widow's Son" a sailor put a hot cross bun in a basket with the remains of 130 other buns deposited there every year since the early 1800s. It started when the widow who owned the pub hung up a hot cross bun for her sailor son who never returned. Ever since then, for 130 years, every Good Friday a sailor has put a bun in the basket.... And in the English town of Oldbury a young man broke the hot cross bun record by eating 23 of them in 35 minutes.

THIS IS CHARLES COLLINGWOOD.... SEE YOU MONDAY

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

FRIDAY, MARCH 30, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

CHARLES COLLINGWOOD REPORTING:

Good Evening:

While there were no new military incidents in the Middle East today, diplomatic developments continued on several fronts. In Washington, Israeli Ambassador Abba Eban made his second call this week at the State Department. Eban refused to say what took place in the talks --specifically whether Israel's request for American arms was mentioned.

There is speculation in Washington that some new policy may be taking shape regarding the Middle East. In fact, Republican Representatives Keating of New York and Scott of Pennsylvania quote State Department officials as saying the Department is "crystallizing" a policy it hopes will promote between Israel and the Arab states.

In Tel Aviv, Israel's Foreign Minister Moshe Sharett conferred with Soviet Minister Alexander Abramov. There is no word on the topics they discussed. But in Jerusalem, the Israeli Chief of Staff General Moshe Dayan told a "public guidance " meeting that Israel needs only forty to fifty jet planes and other modern arms to offset the miltiary assistance the Arabs are getting from the Communist bolc. He said Israel has a good chance of winning any new Palestine war, but warned that she could be defeated without a fight if the Arabs can win the goodwill of the West. And this, he said, the Arabs may try to achieve.

Egypts Premier Nasser spoke out against the United Nations and the West today in an interview with Ludwell Denny of the Scripps - Howard newspaper chain. For one thing, he accused the Unites States of supporting British and French colonialism and of forcing Egypt to purchase arms from the Communists.

But he credited his Soviet arms deal with reducing the danger of a Palestine war and denied that there is a risk of Egypt becoming a Soviet satellite. Nasser attacked the United Nations for failure to enforce its Palestine decisions and armistice agreements. He recognized the duty of the UN to intervene with force if necessary against aggression, but challenced the right of the Western powers to intervene under their tripartite agreement or otherwise. And Nasser attacked the Baghdad Pact as an imperialistic plot against Arab nationalism, which he described as the only barrier in the Middle East against Communist subversion.

French Foreign Minister Pineau protested to Syria and Lebanon today against an Arab League communique which pledged all-out aid to rebels in Algeria. And because of this action there were reports that Pineau is considering postponing his scheduled tour of the Middle East.

The French continued their campaign against the Algerian rebels today, claiming to have killed sixty-six of them in the past 24 hours. Meanwhile, the underground Algerian "liberation army "distributed propaganda leaflets, boasting that it will drive the French out of Algeria and then conquer the Southern part of Frence, which it called "the land of our Ancestors."

On the brighter side for the French, there was some promise of relief from attacks by rebel tribesmen in Morocco. There 30-young Chieftans of the outlaw "liberation army" knelt before Sultan ben Youssef today and promised to lay down their arms. The Sultan thanked them and said their actions will be called "one of the most beautiful pages of history."

Communist confusion continues in several spots over the new anti-Stalin campaign. The confusion appears greatest in France and Italy, with a possibility of large-scale defections. French Communist leader Maurice Thorex has arrived in Rome. Italian Communists say he is there only to see the sights, but he is expected to meet secretly with Italy's Communist boss, Palmiro Togliatti.

British Communists opened a party convention in London with no reference to the anti-Stalin line. Party members played it safe by concentrating on self-criticism of their own failure to exploit the gospel of Communism throughout Britain.

The Communists in East Germany ended their annual conference today. Ernst Wollweber, head of the East German secret police, admitted publicly that some false arrests have occured in Communist states and ordered an easing of police methods in East Germany. He said, "certain measures which were formerly necessary are no longer needed in the same degree." The convention named an eight-man commission to re-examine party expulsions and punishment handed out to former comrades.

Communist China finally broke its silence on the anti-Stalin issue by circulating the attack which was made on Stalin this week by the Russian Communist party newspaper Pravda.

Most of the Congress is enjoying a 10-day Easter recess but some of the legislators are still around cleaning up important business. Most important is the work of the House-Senate conference committee which ist trying to iron out differences in the omnibus farm bill. They don't expect to have the bill as a whole ready before late next week, but they did make some headway today. For one thing, they agreed on a financing plan for the soil bank plan. They also agreed on details of a 450-million dollar conservation reserve, and approved an extra 500-million a year to buy surplus pork and other perishable commodities outside regular price support operations. Earlier, the committee accepted a Senate provision that would allow the government to pay costs of processing surplus food commodities which are given away in this country and abroad. They rejected another Senate proposal that would have directed larger acreage allotments for Virginia and Valencia type peanuts in states now having allotments under ten thousand acres. But they accepted provisions increasing the existing penalties for planting and marketing peanuts in excess of allotments.

Indidentally, the Agriculture Department reports that the nation's farmers showed a slight gain in their financial position between mid-February and mid March. The prices they received for their products went up two percent during that period, making a total gain of three percent since the first of the year. At the same time, the prices of goods and services the farmers have to buy went up only about one-and-a-half percent since January 1st.

Senator McClellan says two senators have suggested interesting leads to his special lobbying committee. That is the committee that will take up where Senator George's committee left off in looking into the campaign contribution which was offered to Senator Case. George was to have made his report on that inquirey today but put it off until late next week. He says there is no disagreement among committee members -- that "it's just a question of how to formulate the report."

All over the world, the faithful today observed Good Friday, and began preparing for the more joyous occasion of Easter Sunday. In Washington, President and Mrs. Eisenhower attended Good Friday services at the National Presbyterian church. And the President sent the pastor a letter in which he said that Good Friday is "of obvious significance to all throughout the free world who strive to uphold the values of a civilization in which the Christian heritage is of immeasurable value."

At the Vatican, Pope Pius Twelfth appeared at the window of his study to bless the pilgrims who gathered in the vast St. Peter's Square below.

In the Holy Land, pilgrims followed the usual custom of travelling along the Via Dolorosa--the path followed by Christ as he carried the cross to Calvary. There were fewer pilgrims than in recent years because of the fear of some that war there might be imminent. Those who were there today were drenched in the rains of a heavy thunderstorm that struck Jeruslane only a few hours before they began their journey.

At home, the weather bureau in Washington issued a special Easter weather advisory predicting "a wide variety" of weather for Sunday. It ranges from fair on the East Coast to rain and snow in the Northern Plains and the Great Lakes region. Fair weather also is forecast for the Pacific Coast "except for Washington and Oregon, where increasing cloudiness may be followed by rain."

Yesterday the Government Printing Office issued a volume that ran to 1 thousand two hundred and some pages. That is a pretty big book, even in this day of uncorsetted best sellers. This particular book will never be a best seller, though..it concerns a subject which most people don't particularly want to think about -- although if you were to pick the subject most important to our national survival, it might well be the one this book is about. For this 12 hundred page volume deals with national defense -- with air power, guided missiles, foot soldiers and atomic submarines. Its the record of the hearings on the Defense Budget so far held by the House Committee on Appropriations.

Now that's an awful lot of testimony, but it is only before one Committee of Congress In addition there's a vast accumulation of speeches, statements, articles and other official, semi-official, authroitative, ans well-informed material..and still the record is not in. The fact is that a debate of massive proportions is now going on around our defense program. How much it should cost, what it should consist of and how it should be used. It's hard to think of a more important subject for discussion. Because if the debate doesn't produce the right answers, one of these days we could be in a terrible fix. But its one of the paradoxes of public opinion that this vast and vital discussion hardly echoes outside the halls of Congress and the endless corridors of the Pentagon. The ordinary citizens seems to throw up his hands and say "This is too complicated for me,,I'll leave it to the experts". And the Defense Department itself hasn't helped by drawing a veil of security over the whole area which discourages discussion. It you want to get details,you have to dig.

But the broad outlines of this debate on our national security program are quite plain for all to see. They revolve around three things. How much should it cost,..What forces should it contain..and how should they be used.. the cost problem looms largest, as perhaps it should when you start talking at around 35 to 40 billion dollars a year. The problem here is basically whether you start out by figuring how much the economy can afford for defense without interfering too much with other things and then tailor your forces to that, or whether you decide first what you thing youreally need in terms of defense and then get up the money no matter how much it is. In Washington the problem is usually put as whether Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey or Secretary of Defense Wilson is to decide how big the Defense Department's budget will be. In actual practise its a matter of compromise, of course, but its generally accepted that the Treasury's voice has been effective in securing a ceiling on Defense expenditures.

Now, obviously, it the amount of money you're going to spend is limited, then the things you can spend it on are going to be limited, too. This is the next area of defense debate..On the one hand are those who say that our defense program should be kept up to snuff in all areas -- that we should be as good or better than our potential enemies in ground forces, in missiles, in air defense and in strategic air power, in submarines and surface ships. That we whould be ready to meet a military threat in whatever area it is presented.. opposed to this is the theory that we can't be strong everywhere, and that therefore we should concnetrate on one weapon and strategy, such as long-range atomic bombers, even at the expense of other weapon systems. This is the tendency when you put a ceiling of defense expenditures. The people who disagree with it say that the toruble is maybe the enemy wont challenge you in a way that can be replied to with atomic bombers. What do you do then?

That, of course, brings up the third great area of the debate. How do you employ the forces which you have. Do you spread your forces over a widea area to protect the United States security interests in a variety of places? or do you concentrate them to protect the most vital security interests? That of course, involves diplomacy. The situations in which you might have to use force depend opon the committments which have been made by diplomacy. Those commitments in turn have to depend, or should depend on what forces you have.

It is all interrelated. But two main positions emerge. On the one side you have those who want a limit put on defense expenditures. They also tend to place the emphasis on a single weapon and strategy and to be in favor of limited committments. The other side wants the defense budget to be based on military requirements. They generally favor a broad range of weapons in all of which we will be as good or better than our enemy, and they prefer to spread these out in order to meet an enemy threat with appropriate response wherever it appears to threaten United States interests.

Now there are all sorts of side issues and shadings of opinion between these two broad and over simplified positions. But these are the two main poles in the debate now going on. You can make good arguments on either side and in between, and believe me, they are being made..as they should be. For, this may not be the happiest thought to leave with you for the Easter season, but a lot of history may depend on whether we come up with the right answer.

I'll be back in a moment with a footnote to the day's news. But first, Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

COLLINGWOOD: At a London tavern called "The Widow's Son" a sailor put a hot cross bun in a basket with the reamins of 130 other buns deposited there every year esince the early 1800's. It started when the widow who owned the pub hung up a hot cross bun for her sailor sun who never returned. Even since then, for 130 years, every Good Friday, a sailor has put a bun in the basket..and in the English of Oldbury a young man broke the hot cross bun record by eating 23 of them in 35 minutes. This is Charles Collingoood. See you Monday.

Collingwood for Murrow Mon., April 2, 1956

Good evening:

The Atomic Energy Commission announced tonight that Russia recently conducted another nuclear test. The announcement gave no details, but noted that this is the sixth United States announcement of Soviet weapons tests in the past eight months. The last announcement was only twelve days ago, when the commission said the Russians had exploded "another nuclear device".

A jpint annpuncement.... issued earlier today by the Atomic Energy Commission and the Defense Department... said that newsmen will be allowed to witness, and report on, the hydrogen bomb tests the United States will conduct at the Eniwetok proving grounds in the Pacific, in May. The coverage will be on a "pool" basis, with representatives from all the news media, including radio and television. The announcement said: "The commission and the Department of Defense have determined that uncensored public reporting, (with the exception of some photography) can be permitted without endangering the security of weapons information.

The last time correspondents were allowed to witness a nuclear weapons test in the Pacific was in July, 1946, when an A-bomb was exploded under water. Of course since then, many newsmen... including this reporter... have covered the tests in Nevada.

The Supreme Court ruled today that the states have no power to prosecute persons accused of sedition against the Federal Government. It threw out the conviction of Communist leader Steve Nelson, under the state law governing sedition in Pennsylvania. The Supreme Court... in so many words... said that state laws dealing with conspiracy to teach and advocate the violent overthrow of the Government have been superseded by Federal statute. After his conviction by the state court, Nelson was convicted under the Smith Act, which is a Federal law passed by Congress. Nelson has appealed this Federal conviction, but the Supreme Court will not hear arguments on the appeal until next fall. Meanwhile, he is free on bail. (Forty-two states, along with Hawaii and Alaska, have their own sedition laws. So today's ruling is important, and I'd like to discuss it further in a few minutes).

In the field of racial segregation, the Supreme Court refused today to interfere with a lower court order... calling for immediate integration of elementary schools in Hillsboro, Ohio. The Hillsboro school board, which wants to delay complete integration until next September, now has 25 days in which to ask the Supreme Court to reconsider its action. And since school will be out pretty soon, it looks as though it will be September before full integration at Hillsboro is achieved.

There were reports from Washington today that President Eisenhower has decided to keep in suspension indefinitely, Israel's request for 60-million dollars' worth of American arms... neither approving the request, nor rejecting it. That is the Associated Press version of the story. The United Press quotes "Administration officials" (whom it does not name) as saying the President has decided against granting Israel's request at this time. Both the A.P. and the U.P. point out that Mr. Eisenhower had a long talk with Secretary of State Dulles last Wednesday, and say the top-level decision reportedly was made at that meeting. White House News Secretary Hagerty was asked about these reports, and said he knows of no change in the situation. This is taken to refer to the statement President Eisenhower made at his news conference on March 14th, that he had never said the United States would not furnish arms to Israel but that he was hoping for a better solution.

Jordan accused Israel today of ambushing a Jordanian patrol near Jerusalem, and killing one Arab soldier. An Israeli spokesman says no such incident occurred... that an investigation by United Nations truce supervisors could not find a trace of the action.

Today... in Iraq... a 30-million-dollar project for controling the waters of the Tigris River was inaugurated. American, British and German engineers are working on the project, which will divert the river's flood waters and irrigate 14-million acres of barren land. The cost is to be met with some of the money that Iraq gets from its oil.

On Cyprus today, British security forces used tear gas to break up a riot of Cypriot students in the port city of Paphos. The students tossed several home-made bombs, and a Cypriot teacher was wounded, apparently by accident. In Limassol (Lē mä.sōl), an elderly British couple was injured by a bomb that exploded in the same street where a British civilian was shot and killed yesterday.

There was more scattered violence today in French North Africa. And in France... in the big industrial city of Metz... police clashed briefly with Arab nationalist workers, who marched through the streets shouting independence slogans and waving flags.

Russia and Burma signed a new five-year trade pact today in Rangoon. Under the agreement, Russia will supply technical assistance and machinery in exchange each year for 400-thousand tons of Burmese rice.

Today... in New Delhi... Prime Minister Nehru told a news conference that India feels free to buy arms from any source it chooses. Nehru said arrangements are being made to obtain jet bombers from Britain. "But," he said, "we do not consider ourselves tied down to any country for arms purchases." He added that Russia had not offered arms to India, but India had made inquiries in Russia---"not for arms as such, but for civil and military aircraft." Nehru said he was looking forward to his meeting with President Eisenhower in Washington, next July.

In Washington today, the Treasury Department agreed to let the Communist Party "bail out" its frozen assets in four cities for 21-hundred dollars in cash. Last week, the government seized the party's property in New York, Philadelphia, Detroit and San Francisco... on grounds that the Communist Party in the United States owes more than a third of a million dollars in back income taxes. Most of that property has been found to be of little resale value. However, the party newspaper... the Daily Worker... is not included in today's agreement. That matter is bring discussed separately.

Today, Treasury agents took over the party's state offices at Newark, New Jersey, and party records were confiscated.

Four persons died today when a Northwest Orient Airlines plane crash-landed in Puget Sound, a few minutes after taking off from Seattle on a flight to Chicago. The airplane stayed afloat for nearly fifteen minutes, and 33 of the 37 persons on board are known to have survived. The accident occurred less than a day after a Trans-World Airlines plane crashed near Pittsburgh, taking a toll of 22 lives. That plane also crashed shortly after take-off, and an investigation into the cause of the tragedy is continuing. In the TWA crash, there were 14 survivors.

Charles Collingwood
2 April 7:45 PM

THINK

No one can say of the present Supreme Court of the United States that its taking the easy questions and ducking the hard ones. The Court has no sooner completed the foundation for a new structure of judicial doctrine on racial segregation than it begins the groundwork for another new construction covering the confusion of laws relating to sedition. Todays decision which, in effect, invalidates state and local laws against subversion and reserves the field to the Federal Government, appears to be one of a series the intent of which will be to bring order out of the mass of statutes relating to sedition, subversion, criminal syndicalism and other aspects of the same problem.

The problem before the Court in the case decided today concerned one Steve Nelson, a Communist party official in Pennsylvania. Nelson had BEEN convicted under a Pennsylvania Law against sedition and drew 20 years in jail. Later he was convicted in Federal Court under the Smith Act and sentenced to five years for plotting the violent overthrow of the government. Nelson appealed both to the Supreme Court. The one growing out of the Pennsylvania conviction was the one ruled on today. The question posed was the bold one of whether a state can impose penalties for attempting violently to overthrow the government, when the Federal Government has laws of its own against it.

The importance of the question was underlined by the fact that no less than 27 state ATTORNIES generals supported Pennsylvania's position that she had a right to try and sentence Nelson. The fact is that every state in the union except Arizona, Missouri, North Dakota, Oregon and Washington have laws banning advocacy of the violent overthrow of the government. Chief Justice Warren in the majority opinion, noted dryly that they are in no sense uniform. They are not, penalties range from fines and jail sentences(in Michigan you can get life) to the death sentence itself which appears to be possible under the Tennessee statute. The kinds of laws, also vary from state to state. Thus, when the modern phase of anti-subversive legislation began in 1919, many states adopted laws against the display of the red flag.... that was a simpler age and it seemed then that if you banned the symbol, you also blocked the threat. There are also a large number of states with laws against criminal syndicalism, against sabotage, and many other varieties of ~~subversiony~~ sedition, subversion, and disloyalty. By no means all of them are covered under Nelson decision announced today, but they are all there and they vary markedly from state to state.

The basic ground of the Chief Justice's opinion today is the primacy of federal authority over what is basically a threat to the federal government. He notes that "our attention has not been called to any case where the prosecution has been successfully directed against an attempt to destroy state or local government."... Then, reviewing the Smith Act and other federal laws, Chief Justice Warren, speaking for the majority, said "The conclusion is inescapable that Congress intended to occupy the field of sedition... (The federal laws) evince a congressional plan which makes it reasonable to determine there is no room left for the states to supplant it.... Therefore, a state sedition law is superseded." Congress, he said, has treated seditious conduct as a matter of vital national concern and in no sense a local enforcement problem.

Justices Reed, Burton and Minton dissented on the grounds that there's room for both state and national laws and that anyway Congress hadn't meant to invalidate the state laws.

The immediate effect of todays decision in the Nelson case is to outlaw all the "Little Smith Act" statutes enacted by ~~the~~ nearly all the states. But the impact does not end there. ~~Furthermore~~ For, amid the welter of legislation against sedition, there are a great many other areas where federal and state laws parallel each other. And once the principle is established, as it now seems to be, that wherever, in the field of sedition, federal and state laws parallel each other, then the federal law cancels out the state law.... ~~then~~ in that case there ARE a good many other state laws that are in question. Just because there are federal laws which have the same import.

It's clear that the Supreme Court is just beginning its task of straightening out and redefining our legislation against sedition. A basic step was taken today but there are a number of pending cases which bear on the same situation. Like the segregation issue, on which the court has already spoken, sedition and subversion is one which enlists the passions and prejudices of a great many Americans. It is likely that from this decision today and subsequent ones in the same field there will flow another torrent of controversy.... But if the court shows the same attitude it has since the segregation issue flared up, controversy will not dissuade it from what appears to be its desire to create a clear-cut, national legal pattern dealing with sedition.

I'LL BE BACK IN A MOMENT WITH A FOOTNOTE TO THE DAYS NEWS

BUT FIRST BOB DIXON

FOOTNOTE

A note from behind the Iron Curtain... Warsaw Radio says ~~is getting worried about the effect of the anti-Stalin campaign on young people.~~ Boys and girls in the Communist world, ~~behind the Iron Curtain, he said~~, having been told lies for so many years, are getting hypocritical and cynical. "When the child discovers that he has been told lies by grownups, Warsaw radio said, he loses the faith once and for all." He may be getting on dangerous ground... The next step in the argument is not to tell lies in the first place.

THIS IS C.C.... SEE YOU TOMORROW

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

MONDAY, APRIL 12, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

CHARLES COLLINGWOOD REPORTING

Good Evening:

The Atomic Energy Commission announced tonight that Russia recently conducted another nuclear test. The announcement gave no details, but noted that this is the sixth United States announcement of Soviet weapons tests in the past eight months. The last announcement was only twelve days ago, when the commission said the Russians has exploded "another nuclear device."

A joint announcement..issued earlier today by the Atomic Energy Commission and the Defense Department..said that newsmen will be allowed to witness, and report on, the hydrogen bomb tests the United States will conduct at the Eniwetok proving grounds in the Pacific in May. The coverage will ve on a "pool" basis, with representatives from all the news media, including radio and telebision. The Announcement said: "The commission and the Department of Defense have determined that uncensored public reporting, with the exception of some photograp y can be permitted without endangering the security of weapons information. The last time correspondents were allowed to witness a nuclear weapons test in the Pacific was in July, 1946, when an A-bomb, not a hydrogen bomb, was exploded under water. Of course since then, many newsmem..including this reporter..have covered the tests in Nevada.

The Supreme Court ruled today that the states have no power to prosecute persons accused of sedition against the Federal Government. It threw out the conviction of Communist leader Steve Nelson, under the state law governing sedition in Pennsylvania. The Supreme Court..in so many words..said that state laws dealing with conspiracy to teach and advocate the violent overthrow of the Government have been superseded by federal statute. After his conviction by the state court, Nelson was convicted under the Smith Act, which is a federal law passed by Congress. Nelson has appealed this federal conviction, but the Supreme Court will not hear arguments on the appeal until next fall. Meanwhile, he is free on bail. (Forty - two states, along with Hawaii and Alaska, have their own sedition laws. So today's ruling is important, and I'd like to discuss it further in a few minutes.)

In the field of racial segregation, the Supreme Court refused today to interfere with a lower court order ..calling for immediate integration of elementary schools in Hillsboro, Ohio. The Hillsboro school board, which wants to delay complete integration until next September, now has 25 days in which to ask the Supreme Court to reconsider its action. And since school will be out pretty soon, it looks as though it will be September before full integration at Hillsboro is achieved.

There were reports from Washington today that President Eisenhower has decided to keep in suspension indefinitely , Israel's request for 60-million dollars' worth of American arms..neither approving the request, nor rejecting it. That is the Associated Press version of the story. The United Press quotes "Administration officials" (whom it does not name) as saying the President has decided against granting Israel's request at this time. Both the A.P. and the U.P. point out that Mr. Eisenhower had a long talk with Secretary of State Dulles last Wednesday, and say the top-level decision reportedly was made at that meeting. White House News Secretary Hagerty was asked about these reports and said he knows of no change in the situation. This is taken to refer to the statement President Eisenhower made at his news conference on March 14th, that he had never said the United States would not furnish arms to Israel but that he was hoping for a better solution.

Jordan accused Israel today of abmushing a Jordanian patrol near Jerusalem, and killing one Arab soldier. An Israeli spokesman says no such incident occurred..that an investigation by United Nations truce supervisors could not find a trace of the action.

Today..in Iraq. 30-million - dollar project for controling the waters of the Tigris River was inaugurated. American, British and German engineers are working on the project, which will divert the river's flood waters and irrigate 14-million acrea of barren land. The cost is to be met with some of the money that Iraq gets from its oil.

On Cyprus today, British security forces used tear gas to break up a riot of Cypriot students in the port cit of Paphos. The students tossed several home-made bombs, and a Cypriot teacher was wounded, apparently by accident, In Limassol, an elderly British couple was injured by a bomb that exploded in the same street where a British civilian was shot and killed yesterday.

There was more scattered violence today in French North Africa. And in France..in the big industrial city of Metz..police clashed briefly with Arab nationalist workers, who marched through the streets shouting independence slogans and waving flags.

Russia and Burma signed a new five - year pact today in Rangoon. Under the agreement, Russia will supply technical assistance and machinery in exchange each year for 400-thousand tons of Burmese rice.

Today ..in New Delhi..Prime Minister Nehru told a news converence that India feels free to buy arms from any source it chooses. Nehru said arrangements are being made to obtain jet bombers from Britain. "But", he said, "we do not consider ourselves tied down to any country for arms purcheses." He added that Russia had not offered arms to India, but India has made inquiries in Russia -- "not for arms as such, but for civil and military air craft". Nehru said he was looking forward to his meeting with President Eisenhower in Washington, next July.

In Washington today, the Treasury department agreed to let the Communist Party "bail out" its frozen assits in four cities for 21-hundred dollars in cash. Last week, the government seized the party's property in New York, Philadelphia, Detroit and San Francisco..on grounds that the Communist Party in the United States owes more than a third of a million dollars in back income taxes. Most of that property has been found to be of little resale value. However, the party newspaper..the Daily Worker..is not included in today's agreement. That matter is being discussed separately.

Today, Treasury agents took over the party's state offices at Newark, New Jersey, and party records were confiscated.

Four persons died today when a Northwest Orient Airlines plane crash-landed in Puget Sound, a few mintess after taking off from Seattle on a flight to Chicago. The airplane stayed afloat for nearly fifteen minutes and 33 of the 37 persons on board are known to have survived. The accident occurred less than a day after a Trans-World Airlines plane crashed near Pittsburgh, taking a toll of 22 lives. That plane also crashed shortly after take-off, and an investigation into the cause of the tragedy is continuing. In the TWA crash, there were 14 survivors.

No one can say of the present Supreme Court of the United States that it is taking the easy questions and ducking the hard ones. The judicial doctrine on racial segregation than, it begin the groundwork for another new construction covering the confusion of laws relating to sedition. Todays decision which, if effect, invalidates state and local laws against subversion and reserves the field to the Federal Government, appears to be one of a series the intent of which will be to bring order ort of the mass of statutes relating to sedition, subversion, criminal syndicalism and other aspects of the same problem.

The problem before the court in the case decided today concerned on Steve Nelson, a Communist party official in Pennsylvania. Nelson has been convicted under a Pennsylvania Law against sedition and drew 20 years in jail. Later he was convicted in Federal Court under the Smith Act and sentenced to five years for plotting the violent overthrow of the government.

Nelson appealed both to the Supreme Court. The one growing out of the Pennsylvania conviction was the one ruled on today. The question posed was the bold one of whether a state can impose penalties for attempting violently to overthrow the government, when the Federal Government has laws of its own against. it.

The importance of the question uas underlined by the fact that no less than 27 state attornies general supported Pennsylvania's position that she had a right to try and sentence Nelson. The fact it that every state in the union except Arizona, Missouri, North Dakota, Oregon and Washington have laws banning advocacy of the violent overthrow of the government. Chief Justice Warren in the majority opinion, noted dryly that they are in no sense uniform. They are not, penalties range from fines and jail sentences (in Michigan you can get life) to the death sentence itself which appears to be possible under the Tennessee statuts. The kinds of laws, also very from state to state. Thus when the modern phase of anti-subversion legislation began in 1919, many states adopted laws against the display of the red flag...that was a simpler age and it seemed than that if you banned the symbol, you also blocked the threat. There are also a large number of states with laws against criminal syndicalism, against sabotage, and many other varieties of sedition, subversion, and disloyalty. By no means all of them are covered under Nelson decision announced today, but they are all there and they vary markedly from state to state.

The basic ground of the Chief Justice's opinion today is the primacy of federal authority over what is basically a threat to the federal government. He notes that "our attention has not been called to any case where the prosecution has been successfully directed against an attempt to destroy state or local government." Then, revieving the Smith Act and other federal laws,

Chief Justice Warren, speaking for the majority, said "The conclusion is inescapable that Congress intended to occupy the field of sedition . (The federal laws) evince a congressional plan which makes it reasonable to determine there is no room left for the states to supplant it. Therefore, a state sedition law is superseded." Congress, he said, has treated seditious conduct as a matter of vital national concern and in no sense a local enforcement problem.

Justices Reed, Burton and Minton dissented on the grounds that there's room for both state and national laws and that anyway Congress hadn't meant to invalidate the state laws.

The immediate effect of todays decision in the Nelson case is to outlaw all the "Little Smith Act" statutes enacted by n arly all the states. But the impact does not end there. Form, amid the welter of legislation against sedition, there are a great many other areas where federal and state laws parallel each other. And once the principle is established, as it now seems to be, that wherever, in the field of sedition, federal and state laws parallel each other, when the federal law cancels out the state law in that case, There are a good many other state laws that are in question. Just because there are federal laws which have the same import.

It is clear that the Supreme Court is just beginning its task of straightening out the redefining our legislation against sedition. A basic step was taken today but there are a number of pending cases which bear on the same situation. Like the segregation issue, on which the court has already spoken, sedition and subversion is one which enlists the passions and prejudices of a great many Americans. It is likely that from this decision today and subsequent ones in the same field there will flow another torrent of controversy.. But if the court shows the same attitude it has since the segregation issue flared up, controversiy will not dissuade it from whatever appears to be its desire to create a clear-cut, national legal pattern dealing with sedition.

I'll beback in a moment with a footnote to the days news but first, Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

COLLINGWOOD: A note from behind the Iron Curtain. Warsaw Radio says boys and girls in the Communist world, having been told lies for so many years, are getting hypocritical and cinical. "When the child discovers that he has been told lies by grownups, Warsaw radio said, he loses the faith once and for all. He may be getting on dangerous ground. The next step in the argument is not to tell lies in the first place.

Thes is Charles Collingwood. See you tomorrow.

Collingwood for Murrow Tues., April 3, 1956

Good evening:

Secretary of State Dulles said today that there is no change in Administration policy against selling arms to Israel at this time. This, he said, is in keeping with our desire for peace and security for all countries of the Middle East. But the same consideration, he explained, does not necessarily apply to other Western powers. They're free to sell arms to Israel if they wish. Mr. Dulles told reporters... at his weekly news conference... that President Eisenhower would not expect to use American armed forces in the Middle East without prior congressional approval, unless a sudden emergency made getting this prior approval impractical. But the Administration, he said, does not foresee any such emergency. Nor does it have any plan to ask Congress for standby authority to use American troops in the Middle East. He expressed confidence that if the U.N. Security Council approves the American resolution for lessening tensions in Palestine, the danger of an Arab-Israeli war will be appreciably reduced.

Debate on the resolution began in the Security Council today, but because Russia proposed a series of minor amendments, a vote may not be [illegible] tomorrow. U.N. observers say there's little likelihood that Russia will block the American plan, which calls... among other things... for sending Secretary General Hammarskjold on a special peace mission to the Middle East. Primarily, Hammarskjold will be trying to secure compliance with armistice arrangements the Council already has endorsed. A vote is due tomorrow. In a speech in the Security Council today, Russian delegate Sobolev denounced what he called "a clear-cut trend" on the part of some Western powers toward direct military intervention in Palestine. There was evidence, he claimed, that the the United States, Britain and France are ready for quick intervention "on the pretext of preventing a war."

It was announced simultaneously today... in Washington and Paris... that French foreign minister Pineau will come to this country in June. Pineau is coming at the invitation of Secretary Dulles. The French foreign minister, and Premier Mollet, have both criticized American foreign policy... on grounds that too great emphasis ~~was~~ is being placed on military ~~preparedness~~ strength. Pineau will arrive in Washington on June 18th, and stay for at least two days.

President Eisenhower addressed a meeting of advertising executives in Washington today... and said it would be a mistake to think that "only in armaments are we going to find a solution to our foreign problems." Every dollar spent in foreign aid, he said, is worth more to this country than five dollars spent for defense. The President stressed the importance of economic aid to underdeveloped countries.

In London today, the United Nations disarmament talks entered their third week... with the United States submitting a proposal to carry through the first phase of a world disarmament program. The proposal was offered in the form of a working paper. And it calls for a kind of nuclear census by all countries signing a disarmament agreement. In the census, the countries would have to tell what fissionable materials they possess, as well as give information relating to possession of nuclear weapons and plans for testing those weapons. At the same time, there would be a cutback in conventional armaments and the size of armies... and a system of inspection and control.

Communist Party Boss Khrushchev said today that it is possible - to visualize peace without the reunification of Germany. Khrushchev was talking to correspondents at a Kremlin banquet, honoring the visiting prime minister of Sweden. Khrushchev said German reunification is not absolutely necessary for world peace. "But if on the question of reunification we are spoken to in the language of positions of strength," he said, "then we, too, have strength."

There were new vigorous attacks on Stalin today in the Soviet press. The army newspaper Red Star attacked Stalin by name for saying Lenin was not a military expert. ~~The paper said Stalin's assertion did not correspond to the truth, and that it had hindered the study of Lenin's "very rich military heritage".~~ The Soviet magazine Kommunist added its powerful voice to the chorus of criticism of the late dictator, charging Stalin with ignoring the principles of collective leadership and destroying the principle of democracy within the Communist Party. ~~The magazine said, in a long editorial, that Stalin's violation of these principles had done "considerable harm" to the work of the party. It said rank-and-file members of the party must be free to play an increasingly active role in party activities.~~

Reports from Bulgaria tonight say that Communist leaders have denounced the Bulgarian premier, Vulko Chervenkov, for violating this same principle of collective leadership. And these reports (which are described as reliable) say it is assumed that Chervenkov, who was a good friend of Stalin's, will be forced to resign. Still other reports, from Czechoslovakia, say that three former officials who served with party boss Rudolf Slansky, have been released from prison. In 1952, they were tried... with Slansky... on charges of Titoism and treason. Slansky, who was secretary general of the Czech Communist Party, was sentenced to death.

Iran has sent a new note to Russia, defending its membership in the Baghdad Pact. The Russians insist that the pact, linking Britain, Pakistan, Turkey, Iran and Iraq, constitutes a military threat. Iran insists it's purely for defense.

India signed a new trade agreement today with Communist Poland. India will supply Poland with raw materials, such as manganese ore, cotton and spice, in return for heavy machinery. The two countries will also exchange technical missions and provide training facilities. The agreement runs until 1960.

Wisconsin was the scene today of the third presidential primary in this election year. Most of the polling places will be open for another hour, so we can't tell you how it turned out. ~~Senator Kefauver is unopposed for the state's 28 Democratic delegates, and President Eisenhower is virtually unopposed in the contest for 30 Republican delegates. In Wisconsin primaries, it's legal to vote either ticket, regardless of past party affiliation, and so today's voting has been referred to as a popularity contest between Senator Kefauver and the President. Although there was some rain in Wisconsin today, it was unseasonably warm. And the voting has been somewhat heavier than expected.~~ A tornado hit Central Wisconsin today, killing at least 7 persons. Too early to say whether storm affected voting, but indications are voting was heavy in cities + light in country ~~Hmm~~ In New York City, former President Truman had breakfast today with Governor Harriman, who classifies himself as "not an active candidate" for the Democratic nomination. They discussed politics; Mr. Truman said, "When a couple of old politicians get together, they're bound to." He also said that if he were in the same town with Senator Kefauver or Adlai Stevenson, he would be glad to see them, too.

Ten persons are reported dead... in the series of tornadoes that tore through Oklahoma, Kansas and Missouri. More than 50 persons were injured. South Dakota and Nebraska were hit by heavy snow. Valentine, Nebraska, was buried under two and a half feet of snow. Due to gale force winds and icing conditions, that knocked down utility poles, Valentine's only communication with the outside world is by radio. Other Midwestern states had a heat wave - Chicago registered 81 degrees.

In Michigan today, striking dairy farmers suddenly called off their boycott of milk deliveries to Detroit. Leaders of the nine-day-old strike said they were ending the tie-up, pending the outcome of a meeting with Detroit milk dealers and the state labor mediation board. A higher milk price, granted by the majority of Detroit dairies, and the limiting of pickets by a series of court injunctions, were factors in bringing about an end of the strike, which had been marked in several instances by violence.

Washington was scene of some unusual excitement today when a woman tried to start a fire in the bed Room of White House today & bypass she could be apprehended started 4 others in the Executive office building across the street. The woman who told Secret Service Agents her name was Mrs. Sula Chow was taken to a hospital for observation. The fires caused no appreciable damage -

Charles Collingwood
3 April 7:45 PM

THINK

This is the Spring of the year, and the voice of the turtle abroad in the land has to compete with that of the politician. The primary season is upon us, the champions have entered the lists, and hardly a Tuesday will go by from now until summer without some sort of vote being taken. Not all will be as dramatic as the Minnesota primary or the one coming up in Florida on May 29 and in California a week later, but every one has its special importance.

Take Wisconsin, where they have been voting today. Senator Kefauver is the only entry on the Democratic side, so there will be no significant renewal of his rivalry with Adlai Stevenson. On the Republican side, President Eisenhower is opposed only by John Chapple, a small town editor who heads a slate originally for Senator Knowland, but now running just as conservative Republicans, dedicated they say to the principles of General MacArthur, Senator McCarthy, and the late Senator Taft. There will be some interest in seeing how many votes they get, but they aren't expected to get so many they will embarrass President Eisenhower.

The main interest in the Wisconsin vote lies in how it splits between Republicans and Democrats. Wisconsin normally votes Republican. In the 1952 primary it voted Republican 3 to 1. But across the line in Minnesota observers thought they saw a big switch of Republican farmers over to the Democratic column when that state had its primary on March 13. Now, theres a line between them on the map, and a good many other differences between Minnesota and Wisconsin, but the agricultural character of the two states is very similar in many ways... So, if there really is a big farm revolt against the Republicans, it should show up in the figures that will be coming in tonight and tomorrow morning from Wisconsin. If Kefauver, the only candidate on the Democratic side, should even come close to President Eisenhower in Wisconsin, it would be pretty persuasive evidence after what happened in Minnesota that ~~Wisconsin~~ midwest farmers are of a temper to put aside their Republican allegiances and give the Democrats a tumble.

And if that should happen -- if Kefauver should run close to Eisenhower, or even ~~mx~~ more so if he should outrun him-- then Kefauver's stock for the Democratic nomination would go up a good couple of notches. Because here he wouldn't just have beaten another Democrat, he would have shown well against the Champ himself, President Eisenhower. With most of the party leaders instinctively opposed to him, Kefauver's best chance of getting the nomination is to convince them of his own thesis, that he is the only Democrat who stands a chance of beating Eisenhower. He could go some distance toward making that point if the total Democratic vote in Wisconsin came close to or exceeded the total Republican vote.

Senator Kefauver, who is aware of most things in politics, is aware of this -- as is shown by his election eve appeal to Wisconsin Republicans to vote for him as a protest against what he called "the sorry performance in office of the present administration."... The Republicans, meanwhile, have been spurred into unusual activity for a primary in which there is no real competition between candidates. They are working hard to get out a big "vote of appreciation for Ike." They don't expect as big a Republican vote as turned out in 1952 when, if you'll remember, Taft, Warren and Stassen were all in the race and a good deal of interest was thereby engendered. But they do think they'll get out enough so that invidious comparisons between Kefauver's and Eisenhower's vote-getting abilities in Wisconsin will not arise.

So, as the ballot boxes in Wisconsin are unlocked and the vote begins to be counted, there are matters of some moment which hinge on the outcome. The result will be an important clue toward estimating the extent of the midwest farmer's dissillusionment with administration agricultural policy. And it may offer a sort of yardstick, albeit a vague and uncertain one, for measuring Estes Kefauver's pulling power in relation to that of President Eisenhower.

Whatever the score in Wisconsin, it will provide grist for the mill of political analysis -- at least until the next primary m comes along-- which will be in Illinois next Tuesday -- to add another brushstroke to the 1956 political picture.

I'LL BE BACK IN A MOMENT WITH A FOOTNOTE TO THE DAYS NEWS BUT FIRST, HERE IS TED PEARSON

FOOTN OTE

Thi s br oadcast ~~ix~~ comes tonight fro m Station WPRB at Pr ince ton University where this reporter is making a small ta lk tonight. The lat est excitement around WPRB was a hamburger eating contest the station sponsored. The student who won was clocked at eight and a half hamburgers and rolls in ten minut es. They are now challenging hungry students at Yale and Harvard.

THIS IS CHARLES COLLINGWOOD.... SEE YOU TOMORROW

WPRB

princeton broadcasting service, inc.
PRINCETON, NEW JERSEY • PHONE 788

TIMING:

7:10 PM SEND OFFICIAL 85 TIME TONE AT ZERO FOR PEAK

7:30 PM BOTH LINES WILL OPEN

7:30 to 7:45 GIVE CBS NEW YORK PERIODIC PEAKS (TIME TONE AT ZERO, AND RECEIVE TIME CHECKS FROM THEM, AND PROCEED AS DIRECTED.

KILL ALL TESTS THIRTY (30) SECONDS PRIOR TO AIR TIME

7:45 NEW YORK OPENS SHOW

7:45:45 "SITTING IN FOR MR _____ HERE'S CHARLES COLLINGWOOD" INSTANTANEOUSLY PUT STUDIO "B" ON

7:57:10 " I'LL BE BACK IN A MOMENT WITH A FOOTNOTE TO THE DAY'S NEWS BUT FIRST HERE'S TED PIERSON" KILL STUDIO "B"

7:58:25 "HERE'S CHARLES COLLINGWOOD WITH HIS FOOTNOTE TO THE XXXX DAYS NEWS" BACK TO "B"

7:58:55 "SEE YOU TOMORROW" KILL "B"

NOTE: ALL TIMES ARE APPROXIMATE.....

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

TUESDAY, APRIL 3, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

CHARLES COLLINGWOOD REPORTING

Good Evening:

Secretary of State Dulles said today that there is no change in Administration policy against selling arms to Israel at this time. This, he said, is in keeping with our desire for peace and security for all countries of the Middle East. But the same consideration, he explained, does not necessarily apply to other Western powers. They're free to sell arms to Israel if they with. Mr. Dulles told reporters..at his weekly news conference..that President Eisenhower would not expect to use American armed forces in the Middle ast wihout prior Congressional approval, unless a sudden emergency made getting this prior approval impractical. But the Administration, he said, does not forsee any such emergency. Nor does it have any plan to ask Congress for standby authority to use American troops in the Middle East. He expressed confidence that if the U.N. Security Council approves the American resolution for lessening tesnions in Palestine, the danger of an Arab-Israeli war will be appreciably reduced.

U.N. observers say there's little likelihood that Russia will block the American plan, which calls...among other things..for sending Secretary General Hammarskjold on a special peace miss on to the Middle East. Primarily, Hammarskjold will be trying to secure compliance with armistice arrangements the Council alreac has endorsed. A vote is due tomorrow. In a speech in the Security Council today, Russian delegate Sobolev denounced what he called "a clear cut trend" on the part of some Western powers toward direct military intervention in Palestine. There was evidence, he claimed, that the United States, Britain and France are ready for quick intervention "on the pretext of preventing a war."

It was announced simultaneously today..In Washington and Paris..that French foreign minister Pineau will come to this country in June. Pineau is coming at the invitation of Secretary Dulles. The French foreign minister, and Premier Mollet, have both criticized American foreign policy..on grounds that too great emphasis is being placed on military strength. Pineau will arrive in Washington on June 18th, and stay for at least two days.

President Eisenhower addressed a meeting of advertising executives in Washington today..and said it would be a mistake to think that "only in armaments are we going to find a solution to our foreign problems." Every dollar spent in foreign aid, he said, is worth more to this country than five dollars spent for defense. The President stressed the importance of economic aid to underdeveloped countries.

In London today, the United Nations disarmement talks entered their third week..with the United States submitting a proposal to carry through the first phase of a world disarmement program. The propssal was offered in the form of a working paper. And it calls for a kind of nuclear census by all countries signing a disarmement agreement. In the census, the countries would have to tell what fissionable materials they possess, as well as give information relating to possession of nuclear weapons and plans for testing those weapons. At the same time, there wou d be a cutback in conventional aramaments and the size of armies..and a system of inspection and control.

Communist Party Boss Khrushchev said today that it is possible to visualize peace without the reunification of Germany. Khrushchev was talking to correspondents at a Kremlin banquet, honoring the visiting prime minister of Sweden. Khrushchev said German reunification is not absolutely necessary for world peace. "But if on the question of reunification we are spoken to in the language of positions of strength," he said, "then we, too, have strength."

There were new vigorous attacks on Stalin today in the Soviet press. The army newspaper Red Star attacked Stalin by name for saying Lenin was not a military expert. The Soviet magazine Kommunist added its powerful voice to the chorus of criticism of the late dictator, charging Stalin with ignoring the principles of collective leadership and destroying the principle of democracy within the Communist Party.

Reports from Bulgaria tonight say that Communist leaders have denounced the Bulgarian premier, Vulko Chervenkov, for violating this same principle of collective leadership. And there reports (which are described as reliable) say it is assumed that Chervenkov, who was a good friend of Stalin's, will be forced to resign. Stall other reports, from Czechoslovakia, say that three former officials who served with Party boss Rodolf Slansky, have been released from prison. In 1952, they were tried..with Slansky..on charges of Titoism and treason. Slansky, who was secretary general of the Czech Communist Party, was sentenced to death.

Iran has sent a new note to Russia, defending its membership in the Baghdad Pact. The Russians insist that the pact, linking Britain, Pakistan, Turkey, Iran and Iraq, constitutes a military threat. Iran insists it's purely for defense.

India signed a new trade agreement today with Communist Poland. India will supply Poland with raw materials, such as manganese ore, cotton ans spice, in return for heavy machinery. The two countries will also exchange technical missions and provide training facilities. The agreement runs until 1960.

Wisconsin was the scene today of the third presidential primary in this election year. Most of the polling places will be open for another hour, so we can't tell you how it turned out. A tornado hit central Wisconsin today, killing at least 7 persons. Too early to say whether the storm affected voting, but indications are voting wha heavy in the cities and lightish in the country.

In New York City, former President Truman had breakfast today with Governor Harriman, who classifies himself as "not an active candidate" for the Democratic nomination. They discussed politics; Mr. Truman said, "When a couple of old politicians get together, they're bound to." He also said that if he were in the same town with Senator Kefauver or Adlai Stevensin, he would be glad to seem them, too.

Ten persons are reported dead..in the series of tornadoes that tore through Oklahoma, Kansas and Missouri. More than 50 persons were injured. South Dakota and Nebraska were hit by heavy snow. Valentine, Nebraska, was buried under two and a half feet of snow. Due to galeforce winds and icing conditions, that knocked down utility poles, Valentine's only communication with the outside world is by radio. Other Midwestern states had a heatwave. Chicago registered 81 degress.

In Michigan today, striking dairy farmers suddenly called off their boycott of milk deliveries to Detroit. Leaders of the nine-day-old strike said they were ending the tie-up, pending the outcome of a meeting with Detroit milk dealers and the state labor mediation board.

Washington was the scene of some unusual excitement today when a woman tried to start a fire in the Red Room of the White House today and before she could be apprehended had started four others in the executive office building across the street. The woman who told Secret Service agents her name was Mrs. Julia Chase was taken to a hospital for observation. The fires caused no appreciable damage.

This is the Spring of the year, and the voice of the turtle is abroad in the land has to compete with that of the politician. The primary season is upon us, the champions have entered the lists, and hardly a Tuesday will go by from now until summer without some sort of vote being taken. Now all will be as dramatic as the Minnesota primary or the one coming up in Florida on May 28.

and in California a week later, but every one has its special importance.

Take Wisconsin, where they have been voting today. Senator Kefauver is the only entry on the Democratic side, so there will be no significant renewal of his rivalry with Adlai Stevenson. On the Republican side, President Eisenhower is opposed only by John Chapple, a small town editor who heads a slate originally for Senator Knowland, but now running just as conservative Republicans, dedicated they say to the principles of General MacArthur, Senator McCarthy, and the late Senator Taft. There will be some interest in seeing how many votes they get, but they aren't expected to get so many they will embarrass President Eisenhower.

The main interest in the Wisconsin vote lies in how it splits between Republicans and Democrats. Wisconsin normally votes Republican. In the 1952 primary it voted Republican 3 to 1. But across the line in Minnesota observers thought they saw a big switch of Republican farmers over o the Democratic column when that state had its primary on March 13. Now there is a line between them on the map, and a good many other differences between Minnssota and Wisconsin, but the agricultureal character of the two states is very similar in many ways..so, if there really is a big farm revolt against the Republicans, it should show up in the figures that will be coming in tonight and tomorrow morning from Wisonnsin. If Kefauver, the only candidate on the Democratic side, should even come close to President Eisenhower in Wisconsin, it would be pretty persuasive evidence after what happened in Minnesota that midwest farmers are of a temper to put aside their Republican allegiances and give the Democrats a tumble.

And if that should happen -- if Kefauver should run close to Eisenhower, or even more so if he should outrun him -- then Kefauver's stock for the Democratic nomination would go up a good couple of notches. Because here he wouldn't just have beaten another Democrat, he would have shown well against the Champ himself, President Eisenhower. With most of the party leaders instinctively opposed to him, Kefauver's best chance of getting the nomination is to convince them of his own thesis, that he is the only Democrat who stands a chance of beating Eisenhower. He could go some distance toward making that point if the total Democratic vote in Wisconsin came close to or exceeded the total Republican vote.

Senator Kefauver, who is aware of most things in politics, is aware of this -- as is shown by his election eve appeal to Wisconsin Republicans to vote for him as a protest against what he called "the sorry performance in office of the present administration." The Republicans, meanwhile, have been spurred into unusual activity for a primary in which there is no real competition between candidates. They are working hard to get out a big "vote of appreciation for Ike." They don't expect as big a Republican vote as turned out in 1952 when, if you'll remember, Taft, Warren and Stassen were all in the race and a good deal if interest thereby engendered. But they do think they'll get out enough so that individious comparisons between Kefauver's and Eisenhower's vote-getting abilities in Wisconsin will not arise.

So, as the ballot boxes in Wisconsin are unlocked and the vote begins to be counted, there are matters of some moment which hinge on the outcome. The result will be an important clue toward estimating the extend of the midwest farmer's dissillusionment with administration agricultural policy. And it may offer a sort of yardstick, albeit a vague and uncertain one, for measuring Estes Kefauver's pulling power in relation to that of President Eisenhower.

Whatever the score is in Wisconsin, it will provide grist for the mill of political analysis -- at least until the next primary comes along -- which will by in Illinois next Tuesday -- to add another brushstroke to the 1956 political picture.

I'll be back in a moment with a footnote to the day's news, but first, here is Ted Pearson.

PEARSON: COMMERCIAL

COLLINGWOOD: This broadcast comes tonight from station WPRB at Princeton University where this reporter is making a small talk tonight. The latest excitement around WPRB was a hamburger eating contest the station sponsored. The student who won was clocked at eight and a half hamburgers and rolls in ten minutes. They are now challenging hungrey students at Yale and Harvard.

This is Charles Collingwood. See you tomorrow.

Collingwood for Murrow Wed., April 4, 1956

Good evening:

The United Nations Security Council has unanimously approved the American plan for lessening tensions between Israel and the Arab states. The resolution was passed as originally presented---without the series of amendments proposed by Russia, which would have weakened the proposal. The resolution calls for, among other things, the withdrawal of opposing forces from the armistice demarcation lines and for more freedom of movement for U.N. truce observers. Approval of the resolution, which had the support of all parties concerned, also means that Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold will leave for the Middle East on Friday or Saturday, on a special peace mission in which he will negotiate directly with Arab and Israeli leaders. He has been directed by the Security Council to report back within a month on the progress of those negotiations.

President Eisenhower said very emphatically today that he will not order American troops into action in the Middle East... or anywhere else... without first getting the approval of Congress. The President was answering questions at his weekly news conference. He said: "I have announced time and time and time again that I will never be guilty of any kind of action that can be interpreted as war until the Congress, which has the constitutional authority, says so." But Mr. Eisenhower did not rule out possible military action in case of an emergency. He went on to say: "Now there are times when troops, to defend themselves, may have to undertake local war-like acts. But that is not the declaration of war... and that is not going to war... and I am not going to order any troops into anything that can be interpreted as war until Congress directs it."

Mr. Eisenhower was asked to comment on reports that British Prime Minister Eden has sent him a personal message, suggesting a get-tough policy toward Egyptian Premier Nasser... in fact, a tougher line toward the whole Middle East problem. The President said that, as far as he could remember, he has received no personal communication from Eden in the last two weeks. If the British are pressing for a firmer stand, he said, they haven't pressed him. In London today the Foreign Office denied that Britain has asked the United States for

INSERT

Saudi Arabia announced tonight that it is buying jet aircraft from Egypt and received its first squadron last month. It said "several" squadrons had been purchased. Egypt, as you know, has been buying jet aircraft from Communist Czechoslovakia.

"an anti-Nasser policy". However, the Foreign Office spokesman refused to confirm, or deny, that Britain has called for a clearer definition of American views. The London Evening News speculates that British Foreign Secretary Selwyn Lloyd may soon fly to Washington, to bridge what it calls "the gulf" between Britain and the United States on the Middle East.

INSERT

Egyptian and Israeli forces clashed again today in the Gaza Strip. The action involved troops and artillery, and lasted for four hours. Each side blames the other for starting the incident. Three Israeli soldiers were killed.

And there was renewed fighting today in North Africa. In Algeria and Tunisia, French troops killed 36 rebels in widely scattered actions. ~~All Arab shops were closed in Constantine, a city of 110-thousand, and there was a shortage of bread. The shopkeepers were afraid to do business, in face of rebel threats of reprisal if they remained open.~~ Three European motorists... two Italians and a Frenchman... were ambushed and killed by Tunisian extremists. And troop reinforcements continued to arrive from Dakar and Metropolitan France.

Sultan Mohammed ben Youssef arrived in Madrid today, to receive a grant of independence for Spanish Morocco. Ben Youssef already is the spiritual and temporal ruler of French Morocco, to which France recently granted independence. There are some "finishing touches" to be put to the agreement with Spain, and Ben Youssef will be in Madrid about a week. (They had a big parade for him there this afternoon).

This is the seventh anniversary of the establishment of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and there were ceremonies marking the occasion today in Paris. French Premier Mollet, in a speech, thanked the members of NATO for allowing France to transfer some of her NATO forces to North Africa. And he reiterated a recent French theme, by saying that NATO should now extend its operations in the political and economic field. ~~Opportunities in this field, he said, "go beyond the strictly territorial framework of our alliance."~~ The supreme commander of NATO... General Alfred Gruenther... also made a speech and seconded Mollet's suggestion, that the organization place greater emphasis on economic and social problems. NATO's forces, he said, "now constitute a major deterrent to aggression. NATO can now move with much greater confidence into other fields, in defense of our freedom."

In Washington... at his news conference... President Eisenhower said the North Atlantic Treaty Organization has proved its worth, particularly as a morale-builder among the Western allies. Because of this morale factor, he said, NATO is just as useful as ever in this atomic age. On domestic matters, the President said he would not insist on perfection in a farm bill, but that it was "problematical" whether the bill in its present form... with so many "clumsy" amendments... would help the nation's farmers. He said it's already too late for farmers to gain much practical benefit out of the soil bank program this year, but he feels sure there will be a good farm program in operation before next fall. The President said farmers have a right to be somewhat bewildered. On the other hand, he believes most of them realize the Administration is trying to do the best it can for the good of the whole country. The President declined to comment directly on the results of the Wisconsin primary. Senator Kefauver, who was unopposed, ran about 105-thousand votes behind Mr. Eisenhower in that popularity contest. Still, Kefauver got 42 percent of the popular vote. That compares with 24 percent polled by all Democratic candidates in the same primary four years ago. And Kefauver attributes the Democratic gain to farmer unrest. Late this afternoon, the Republican and Democratic national chairmen both hailed the outcome as a sure sign their party will come out on top in November. Republican Chairman Hall called the Wisconsin results "a spontaneous vote of confidence in President Eisenhower's administration." The Democratic chairman, Paul Butler, said the President will lose the election in November, if this ~~was~~ is the best he ~~could~~ can do.

An unofficial survey has now been made of the death and destruction wrought by those tornadoes in the past two days. And it makes a grim report. Thirteen states of the mid-continent were hit. Forty-four persons were killed, and more than 300 injured. The Red Cross says 320 homes were destroyed. Damage is estimated at close to 15-million dollars.

April 4

The charge is sometimes made that the Administration goes in too freely for the techniques of Madison Avenue, which, I suppose, means that it relies on catch-phrases and over-simplication, instead of lucid analysis. But this charge will not be levelled against the latest American disarmament proposal which Harold Stassen produced in London yesterday. This is an eleven-page working paper that defies simplification. No doubt disarmament is a complex subject and it can't be made understandable very easily. The correspondents in London, who were briefed on it -- presumably by Mr. Stassen -- quite obviously ~~don't grasp~~ had trouble digesting the plan. Everyone picked out a different aspect for emphasis.

It may throw some light on the United States disarmament plan to compare it broad~~ly~~ with the proposal the Soviet Union made last week. In this the Russians would cut the conventional forces of the United States, the Soviet Union and Red China to a million or a million-and-a-half men. And ~~Mr.~~ Gromyko did not offer any plan whatever for nuclear control, on the ground that this couldn't be negotiated at this time. Now, Mr. Stassen insists on conventional manpower for us and the Russians of two and a half million men. And on nuclear control he brings in an elaborate plan ending with census of nuclear weapons and materials, but not with abolition of nuclear weapons.

Mr. Gromyko accepted international inspection and even guardedly endorsed the open-skies inspection system advocated by President Eisenhower. Mr. Stassen spells out the inspection and control system, and repeats the proposal recently made for small test areas in this country and the Soviet Union where all kinds of inspection can be tried out, as a preliminary to a general inspection system. Both Mr. Gromyko and Mr. Stassen accept the idea of budgetary controls. Once disarmament is going well, Mr. Stassen is ready to freeze the military budget at the 1955 level. Mr. Gromyko wants it lower still, and would have military savings going in part to aid under-developed countries.

When the Russians brought in a proposal that didn't start off with prohibition of nuclear weapons, they made a sensational about-face. Also, it was sensational that they did not insist on the abolition of all overseas bases. And in agreeing, even guardedly, ~~in~~ to the open-skies inspection system advocated by President Eisenhower, they looked as though they might really want an agreement. They were saying, in effect, our nuclear power is our mutual guarantee against another world war, so let's keep our nuclear power. But, they said, let's go on from there and really disarm in other ways.

If this had been all the Russians had said they would deserve credit for really trying. But they went on to lay down conditions about the maintenance of armed forces in Germany and the use of nuclear weapons in that country, which they surely knew the West would not accept. So we might say they were safeguarded against any embarrassing success. Like other proposals, this one was made for its effect outside the conference room. It seems fair to conclude that Mr. Gromyko was trying to put the United States in the position of refusing to cut down its conventional forces to a million or a million and a half men. Then Soviet propaganda would be able to say that even though the Soviet Union had dropped its objection to the open skies inspection, and did not insist on the abolition of foreign bases, and the immediate outlawry of nuclear weapons, the United States didn't want real disarmament. That would assure quite a propaganda success among neutrals and uncommitted peoples.

Mr. Stassen wasn't trying to counter the Gromyko maneuver. He didn't pull his plan out of a hat, it had been in preparation for some time. Our allies on the disarmament subcommittee presumably saw it in advance and are reported to have liked it. Our plan has not cancelled out the Soviet plan, or even its distinct propaganda value. It does, however, have modest advantages. It has shown initiative. It has treated disarmament realistically without regard, it seems, to a propaganda victory. So the world still can believe we want disarmament in the only way we think it can be obtained, which is by slow and cautious progress.

So long as armaments are the result of international tension rather than the cause of it, Washington obviously thinks this is the best to be hoped for until the tensions are reduced.

FOOTNOTE

Grace Kelly and her wedding party sailed today for Monaco and her wedding to Prince Rainier. She said she felt "a little numb... very excited and very happy." So many reporters and sightseers surrounded her, an official of the line shouted to them to stand back and give the lady some air. A reporter, carried away by the solemnity of the occasion, asked Miss Kelly whether she felt her cup runneth over. She said she did.

THIS IS CHARLES COLLINGWOOD.... SEE YOU LATER

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 4, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

CHARLES COLLINGWOOD REPORTING:

Good Evening:

The United Nations Security Council has unanimously approved the American plan for lessening tensions between Israel and the Arab states. The resolution was passed as originally presented -- without the series of amendments proposed by Russia, which would have weakened the proposal. The resolution calls for, among other things, the withdrawal of opposing forces from the armistice demarcation lines and for more freedom of movement for U.N. truce observers. Approval of the resulution, which had the support of all parties concerned, also means that Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold will leave for the Middle East on Friday or Saturday, on a special peace mission in which he will negotiate directly with Arab and Israeli leaders. He has been directed by the Security Council to report back within a month on the progress of those negotiations.

President Eisenhower said very emphatically today that he will not order American troops into action in the Middle East...or anywhere else..without first getting the approval of Congress. The President was answering questions at his weekly news conference. He said: "I have announced time and time and time again that I will never be guilty of any kind of action that can be interpreted as war until the Congress, which has the constitutional authority says so." But Mr. Eisenhower did not rule out possible military action in case of an emergency. He went on to say:"Now there are times when troops, to defend themselves, may have to undertake local war-like acts. But that is not the declaration of war..and that is not going to war..and I am not going to order any troops into anything that can be interpreted as war until Congress directs it."

Mr. Eisenhower was asked to comment on reports that British Prime Minister Eden has sent him a personal message, suggesting a get-tough policy toward Egyptian Premier Nasser..in fact, a tougher line toward the whole Middle East problem. The President said that, as far as he could remember, he has received no personal communication from Eden in the last two weeks. If the British are pressing for a firmer stand, he said, they haven't pressed him. In London today the Foreign Office decied that Britain has asked the United States for "an anti-Nasser policy." However, the Foreign Office spokesman refused to confirm, or deny, that Britain has called for a clearer definition of American views. The London Evening News speculates that British Foreign Secretary Selwyn Lloyd may soon fly to Washington to bridge that it calls "the gulf" between Britain and the United States on the Middle East.

Saudi Arabia announced tonight that it is buying jet aircraft from Egypt and received its first squadron last month. It said "several" squadrons had been purchased. Egypt, as you know, has been buying jet aircraft from Communist Czechoslovakia.

Egyptian and Israeli forces clashed again today in the Gaza Strip. The action involved troops and artillery, and lasted for four hours. Each side blames the other for starting the incident. Three Israeli soldiers were killed.

And there was renewed fighting today in North Africa. In Algeria and Tunisia, French troops killed 36 rebels in widely scattered actions. Three European motorists ..two Italians and a Frenchman..were ambushed and killed by Tunisian extremists. And troop reinforcements continued to arrive from Dakar and Metropolitan France.

Sultan Mohammed ben Youssef arrived in Madrid today, to receive a grant of independence from Spanish Morocco. Ben Youssef already is the spiritual and temporal ruler of French Morocco, to which France recently granted in independence. There are some "finishing touches" to be put to the agreement with Spain, and Ben Youssef will be in Madrid about a week. They had a big parade for him there this afternoon.

This is the seventh anniversary of the establishment of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and there were ceremonies marking the occasion today in Paris. French Premier Mollet, in a speech, thanked the members of NATO for allowing France to transfer some of her NATO forces to North Africa And he reiterated a recent French theme, by saying that NATO should now extend its operations into the political and conommic field. The supreme commander of NATO..General Alfred Gruenther..also made a speech and seconded Mollet's suggestion, that the organization place greater emphasis on economic and social problems. NATO's forces, he said, "now constitute a major deterrent to aggression. NATO can now move with much greater confidence into other fields, in defense of our freedom."

In Washington..at his news conference..Presidnet Eisenhower said the North Atlantic Treaty Organization has proved its worth, particularly as a moral factor, he said, NATO is just as useful as ever in this atomic age. On domestic matters, the President said he would not insist on perfection in a farm bill, but that it as "problematical" whether the bill in its present form..with so many "clumsy" amemdments..would help the nation's farmers. He said it's already too late for farmers to gain much practical benefit out of the soil bank program this year, but he feels sure there will be a good farm program in operation before next fall. The President said farmers have a right to be somewhat bewildered. On the other hand, he believes most of them realize the Aeministration is trying to do the best it can for the good of the whole country. The President declined to comment directly on the results of the Wisconsin primary. Senator Kefauver, who was upopposed, ran about 105-thousand votes behind Mr. Fisenhower in that popularity contest. Still,

Kefauver got 42 percent of the popular vote. That compares with 24 percent polled by all Democratic candidates in the same primary four years ago. And Kefauver attributes the Democratic gain to farmer unrest. Late this afternoon, the Republican and Democratic national chairmen both hailed the outcome as a sure sign their party will come out on top in November. Republican Chairman Hall called the Wisconsin results "a spontanious vote of confidence in President Eisenhower's administration." The Democratic chairman, Paul Butler, said the President will lose the election in November, if this is the best he can do.

An unofficial survey has now been made of the death and destruction wroght by those tornadoes in the past two days. And it makes a grim report. Thirteen states of the mid-continent were hit. Forty-four persons were killed, and more than 300 injured. The Red Cross says 320 homes were destroyed. Damage is estimated at close to 15-million dollars.

The charge is sometimes made that the Administration goes in too freely fot the techniques of Madison Avenue, which, I suppose, means that it relies on catch phrases and and over-simplification, instead of lucid analysis. But this charge will not be levelled against the latest American disarmament proposal which Harold Stassen produced in London yesterday. This is an eleven page working paper that defies simplification. No doubt disarmament is a complex subject and it can't be made understandable very easily. The correspondents in London, who were briefed on it -- presumably Mr. Stassen -- quite obviously had trouble digesting the plan. Every one picked out a different aspect for emphasis.

It may throw some light on the United States disarmament plan to compare it broadly with the proposal the Soviet Union made last week. In this the Russians would cut the conventional forces of the United States, the Soviet Union and Red China to a million or a million - and - a - half men. And Mr.

Gromyko did not offer any plan whatever for nuclear control, on the ground that this couldn't be negotiated at this time. Now, Mr. Stassen insists on conventional manpower for us and the Russians of two and a half million men. And on nuclear control he brings in an elaborate plan ending with census of nuclear weapons and materials, but not with abolition of nuclear weapons.

Mr. Gromyko accepted international inspection and even guardedly endorsed the the open-skies inspection system advoteted by President Eisenhower. Mr. Stassen spells out the inspection and control system, and repeats the proposal recently made for small test areas in this country and the Soviet Union where all kinds of inspection can be tried out, as a preliminary to a general inspection system. Both Mr. Gromyko and Mr. Stassen accept the idea of budgetry controls. Once disarmement is going well, Mr. Stassen is ready to freeze the military budget at the 1955 level. Mr. Gromyko wants it lower still, and would have military savings going in part to aid under-devveloped countries.

When the Russians brought in a proposal that didn't start off with prohibition of nuclear weapons, they made a sensational about - face.Also, it was sensational that they did not insist on the abolition of all overseas bases. And in agreeing, even guardedly, the the open - skies inspection system advocated by President Eisenhower, they looked as though they might really want an agreement. They are saying, in effect, our nuclear power is our mutual guarantee against another world war, so let's keep our nuclear power. But, they said, let's go on from there and really disarm in other ways.

If this had been all the Russians had said they would deserve credit for really trying. But they went on to lay down conditions about the maintenance of armed forces in Germany and the use of nuclear weapons in that country. which they surely knew the West would not accept. So we might say they were safeguarded against any embarrassing success. Loke other proposals, this one was made for its effect outside the conference room. It seems fair to conclude that Mr. Gromyko was trying to put the United States in the position of refusing to cut down its conventional forces to a million or a million and a half men. Then Soviet propaganda would be able to say that even though the Soviet Union had dropped its objection to the open skies inspection, and did not issist on the abolition of foreign bases, and the immediate outlawry of nuclear weapons, the United States didn't want real disarmement. That would assure quite a propaganda success among neautrals and uncommitted peoples. Mr. Stassen wasn't trying to counter the Gromyko maneuver. He didn't pull his plan out of a hat, it had been in preparation for some time. Our allies on the disarmement subcommittee presumably saw it in advance and are reported to have liked it. Our plan had not cancelled out the Soviet plan, or even its discinct propaganda value. It does, however, have modest advantages. It has shown initiative. It has treated disarmement realistically without regard it seems, to a propaganda victory. So the world still can believe we want disarmament in the only way we think it can be obtained, which is by slow and cautious progress. So long as armaments are the result of international tension rather than the cause of it, Washington obviously thinks this is the best way to be hoped for until the tensions are reduced.

I'll be back in a moment with a Footnote to the News. First, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

COLLINGOOOD: Grace Kelly and her wedding party sailed today for Monaco and her wedding to Prince Rainier. She said she felt "a little numb..very excited and very happy." Son many reporters and sightseers surrounded her, an official of the line shouted to them to stand back and give the lady some air. A reporter, carried away by the solemnity of the occasion, asked Miss Kelly whether she felt her cup runneth over. She said she did. This is Charles Collingwood. See you tomorrow.

Collingwood for Murrow Thurs., April 5, 1956

Good evening:

A series of new, bloody incidents erupted along the Egypt-Israel border today, threatening the uneasy peace in the Middle East. At United Nations headquarters this afternoon, Egypt accused Israel of shelling four Egyptian towns in the Gaza Strip. The Egyptians say 42 Arab civilians were killed and 103 wounded. The Egyptian delegate to ~~ambassador said 33 civilians and seven Egyptian soldiers were killed, and 92 civilians wounded. He said~~ the U.N. called the attack ~~condemned~~ aggression — but did not request a special meeting of the Security Council to deal with the situation. He said he would continue to inform the council of developments. ~~In Cairo, the Egyptian Army~~ said 42 ~~Arab civilians were killed and 103 wounded~~. In Tel Aviv, an Israeli military spokesman charged that the ~~incidents~~ action started with two early morning attacks on an Israeli patrol, inside Israeli territory. Later, he said, the Egyptians bombarded three Israeli settlements. In retaliation, Israeli artillery shelled Egyptian positions. Israeli Foreign Minister Sharett asked the chief United Nations truce suprevisior, General Burns, to stop what Sharett called "the Egyptian acts of provocation". And Burns called on both sides to cease fire, with midnight as the deadline for compliance. Late reports say the artillery duel ended at dusk. Only yesterday, the Security Council authorized United Nations Secretary General Hammarskjold to make a personal, on-the-spot survey of the Palestine situation. Hammarskjold held a news conference this morning... before word was received of the new border incidents... and told reporters he would "take all the time necessary" to appraise the situation. He will leave New York tomorrow, and stop over in Rome for a conference with U.N. Palestine experts. Hammarskjold said the first Middle East country he will visit will be Lebanon. From there he will go to Egypt, and from there on, he said, he would improvise. In light of today's developments, this itinerany may be revised. Hammarskjold cautioned against expecting "miracles" as a result of his peace mission, but said he is hopeful of good results. "If we can get compliance with the armistice agreements," he said, "we should be quite happy."

Former Soviet Premier Georgi Malenkov, who has been touring Britain, faced a western-style news conference with 250 reporters in London today. They asked him all the tough questions and most of them he answered. Malenkov denounced the Stalin cult of personality, as the Russians like to call it, on the grounds that it raised its heroes to supernatural proportions. Then a reporter asked whether Malnekov himself didn't have feelings of guilt for the work he carried out for Stalin during the great purges of the 1930s. Malenkov replied: "We collectively always feel responsible for such errors as we have made, and we openly admit them to our people."..... CBS News Correspondent Alexander Kendrick covered Malenkov's long give and take with western reporters. At the end of his report to us, Kendrick cabled: "I never thought I would live to see the day."

The British Foreign Office said today that Russia has agreed in principle to a meeting with Britain to discuss the partition of Vietnam. Britain proposed such a meeting a month ago.

At the disarmament talks in London, the United States reportedly has told Russia that President Eisenhower's plan for mutual aerial inspection must go into operation at the start of any control program. Soviet Delegate Gromyko had raised questions as to when the "open sky" plan would go into effect, as well as the timing of other American disarmament proposals. As for the timing of the entire American "package plan", we reportedly have told Russia the sooner the better.

The Prague Radio today announced the arrival in Czechoslovakia of a military mission from Afghanistan. The mission is expected to place an order for Czech arms.

And for the first time since Marshal Tito was kicked out of the Cominform, in 1948, an official Yugoslav delegation arrived today in Bulgaria, after at loggerheads with Yugoslavia

The American ambassadors to Russia and Saudi Arabia have been summoned home for consultations. Chip Bohlen, our ambassador to Moscow, is expected in Washington this week-end, and will remain a week or ten days. Ambassador George Wadsworth is due in tomorrow from his post in Saudi Arabia. A State Department spokesman says the consultations will be "routine".

Here in New York, doctors say that labor columnist Victor Riesel may lose his sight, as a result of the attack on him early today by an unknown assailant. The assailant threw sulphuric acid into Riesel's face, and escaped. Last night, in a radio broadcast, Riesel attacked what he referred to as the "mob" running the International Union of Operating Engineers. And earlier, in his syndicated column, he had written stories about "convicted extortionists" in the union. Also, Riesel testified recently before a Federal grand jury inquiring into labor racketeering in the New York area. The FBI has joined New York police in investigating the assault. And President George Meany, of the AFL-CIO, has denounced the attack as "a nefarious crime... a challenge to all decent elements in our society."

The leaders of Syria's political parties urged the Arab League today to boycott France in protest against France's policy in Algeria. The Syrian party leaders said the boycott should be political and economic, and that the Algerian question should be raised before the U.N.

The French resident minister for Algeria... Robert LaCoste.. flew into Paris today to ask the government to call up reservists, so that a hundred thousand more troops will be available to cope with the Algerian situation.

Several days ago, a West German paper quoted General Gruenther, the supreme commander of NATO, as saying that NATO would have to give up West Germany in case of a Soviet attack. Gruenther's headquarters said the general had been misquoted, and today he went about setting the record straight. Speaking in Paris, Gruenther said: "The question is frequently asked 'Are we yet strong enough to give a guarantee that we could resist successfully an all-out act of aggression?' I think," Gruenther went on, "that in all frankness we must admit that in spite of our great progress during the past five years, we are still not that strong. However, we will have that strength when the German contribution is effective, and we estimate that this will be in about three to four years." This may not be an entirely reassuring statement, but, as the general said, it is frank.

April 5

The announcement that a British-Soviet conference is to be held on Vietnam is a timely reminder that the Middle East is not the only spot in the world where a local war is possible. In July, elections are supposed to be held through Vietnam and Vietminh on unification. That was decided at the Geneva conference which ended the fighting in Indochina. But the elections will not be held, at least not in July. Premier Diem of Vietnam was not a party to the Geneva conference. At that time he had not overthrown the regime of Emperor Bao Dai. As head of the government that succeeded Bao Dai he does not consider himself bound by the terms of the Geneva armistice.

Diem is not against elections, but he will agree to them only if they are genuinely free. He wants international supervision and he will not accept supervision by the present armistice committee, of which Poland is a member.

The communist government of Vietminh holds to the letter of the armistice, and if, by July, elections have not been arranged, might sweep into Vietnam and try to overwhelm the Diem regime with a combination of outside forces and an internal uprising.

The great powers -- the Soviet Union, the United States, Communist China,

France, and Britain -- are up to their necks in this crisis. A local war would at once draw the SEATO states into the conflict. Communist China, as the main sponsor of Vietminh, might be involved. Such a war could ~~not~~ hardly continue to be local. So it is one the powers want to avert. That makes the British announcement of a conference welcome news today in many capitals.

A big factor in the crisis is the unexpected success of Premier Diem in winning home support for his democratic government. When the fighting ended, he was left with a large residue of communists, as well as the remnants of the private armies of the religious sects that had administered parts of the country. He went resolutely to work to establish his authority. His government says it found nearly two thousand Vietminh organizations set up in central Vietnam. It has arrested 14,000 northern agitators. It can boast that 2,000 former communist officials recently took the oath of allegiance at a single ceremony in Saigon. And 55,000 members of communist bands have gone over to the government with their arms.

These figures may be exaggerated, but they show the size of Diem's ~~tasks~~ TASK. There is some danger that the newly converted communists may not be genuine converts, that they went over to Diem on party orders to be ready to rise if Vietminh should invade. That is, Diem's position may not be completely secure. But on any test he has done an astonishing job. Just after the armistice it looked almost inevitable that the northern communists would take over the south with hardly a struggle.

So far as the powers and their influence is involved, it appears that the war is one that will be averted. The Soviet official line on divided territories is that military action is to be avoided at all cost, and efforts should focus on working for negotiations.

The Russians are expected to press for a new Geneva conference, but Premier Diem probably would refuse to attend, and the United States would be equally reluctant.

Communist China is more deeply involved in Vietnam than the Soviet Union, but it also is expected to discourage a communist invasion of the south. It has reason to prefer the status quo. If Communist Vietminh, with its industries, takes over Vietnam, with its rice, the new state could become the most powerful nation in Southeast Asia. But in its present condition Vietminh is dependent on Red China, and Peking may prefer a subservient satellite to a self-sufficient and independent neighbor.

So the possibility of war in Vietnam would appear to depend on the communists of Vietminh itself. They are unhappy, because they feel they were cheated out of Vietnam at Geneva. General Giap, the Vietminh commander-in-chief, may think he could take over the South so swiftly that there would be no time for Soviet and Chinese restraint, or for SEATO to organize a counter-blow. If he is fanatical enough, there still could be a war. But now that the powers are to confer on the danger, the chances of a surprise invasion are, at least, lessened. This is one powder keg none of the great powers are anxious to set a match to.

I'll be back in a moment with a footnote to the day's news.

But first, Barry Bennett

FOOTNOTE

An American farm delegation's visit to Russia may have started to bear fruit. At least Tass, the Soviet news agency, reports that the Rostovski State Dairy Farm has managed to cut its labor force in half without any drop in production. This was achieved by a better division of labor and only two milkings a day, instead of four or five. Tass didn't say so, but this is just what the visiting American farmers had recommended.

THIS IS CHARLES COLLINGWOOD.... SEE YOU LATER

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

THURSDAY, APRIL 5, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

CHARLES COLLINGWOOD REPORTING

Good Evening:

A series of new, bloody incidents erupted along the Egypt-Israel border today, threatening the uneasy peace in the Middle East. At the United Nations headquarters this afternoon, Egypt accused Israel of shelling four Egyptian towns in the Gaza strip. The Egyptians say 42 Arab civilians were killed and 103 wounded. The Egyptian delegate to the U.N. called the attack aggression but did not request a special meeting of the Security Council to deal with the situation. He said he would continue to inform the council of developments. In Tel Aviv, an Israeli military spokesman charged that the action started with the early morning attacks on an Israeli patrol, inside the Israeli territory. Later, he said, the Egyptians bombarded three Israeli settlements In retaliation, Israeli artillery shelled Egyptian positions. Israeli Foreign Minister Sharett asked the chief United Nations truce supervisor, General Burns, to stop what Sharett called "the Egyptian acts of provocation." And Burns called on both sides to cease fire, with midnight as the deadline for compliance. Late reports say the artillery duel anded at dusk. Only yesterday, the Security Council authorized United Nations Secretary General Hammarskjold to make a personal, on-the-spot survey of the Palestine situation. Hammarskjold hald a news conference this morning..before news was received of the new border incidents..and told reporters he would "take all the time necessary" to appraise the situation. He will leave New York tomorrow, and stop over in Rome for a conference with U.N. Palestine experts. Hammarskjold said the first Middle East country he will visit will be Lebanon. From there he will go to Egypt, and from there on, he said, he would improvise. In light of today's developments, this itinerary may be revised. Hammarskjold cautioned against expecting "miracles" as a result of his peace mission, but said he is hopeful of good results. "If we can get compliance with the armistice agreements, " he said, "we should be quite happy."

Former Soviet Premier Georgi Malenkov, who has been touring Britain, faced a western-style news conference with 250 reporters in London today. They asked him all the tough questions and most of them he answered. Malenkov denounced the Stalin cult of personality, as the Russians like to call it, on the grounds that it raised its heroes to supernatural proportions. Then a reporter asked whether Malenkov himself didn't have feelings of guilt for the work he carried out for Stalin during the great pruges of the 1930's. Malenkov replied: "We collectively always feel responsible for such errors as we have made, and we openly admit them to our people." CBS News Correspondent Alexander Kendrick covered Malenkov's long give and take with western reporters. At the end of his report to us, Kendrick cabled: "I never thought I would live to see the day."

The British Foreign Office said today that Russia has agreed in principle to a meeting with Britain to discuss the partition of Vietnam. Britain proposed such a meeting a month ago.

At the disarmement talks in London, the United States reportedly has told Russia that President Eisenhower's plan for mutual aerial inspection must go into operation at the start of any control program. Soviet Delegate Grymyko had raised questions as to when the "open sky" plan would go into effect, as well as the timing of thher American disarmament proposals. As for the timing of the entire American "package plan", we reportedly have told Russia the sooner the better.

The Prague Radio today announced the arrival in Czechoslovakia of a military mission from Afghanistan. The mission is expected to place an order for Czech arms.

And for the first time since Marshal Tito was kicked out of the Cominform in 1948, an official Yugoslav delegation arrived today in Bulgaria, often at loggerheads with Yugoslavia.

The American ambassadors to Russia and Saudi Arabia have been summoned home for consultations. Chip Bohlen, our ambassador to Moscow, is expected in Washington this week-end, and will remain a week or ten days. Ambassador George Wadsworth is due in tomorrow from his post in Saudi Arabia. A State Department spokesman says the consultations will be "routine."

Here in New York, doctors say that labor communist Victor Riesel may lose his sight, as a result of the attack on him early today by an unknown assailent. The assailant threw sulphuric acid into Reisel's face, and escaped. Last night, in a radio broadcast, Riesel attacked what he referred to as the "mob" running the International Union of Operating Engineers. And earlier, in his syndicated column, he had written stories about "convicted extortionists" in the union. Also, Riesel testified recently before a Federal grand jury inquiring into labor racketeering in the New York area. The FBI has joined New York police in investigating the assault. And President George Meany, of the AFL-CIO, has denounced the attack as "a nefarious crime..a challenge to all decent elements in our society."

The leaders of Syria's political parties urged the Arab League today to boycott France in protest against France's policy in Algeria. The Syrian party leaders said the boycott should be political and economic, and that the Algerian question should be raised before the U.N..

The French resident minister for Algeria..Robert LaCoste..flew into Paris today to ask the government to call up reservists, so that a hundred thousand more troops will be available to cope with the Algerian situation.

Several days ago, a West German paper quoted General Gruenther, the supreme commander of NATO, as saying that NATO would have to give up West Germany in case of a Soviet attack. Gruenther's headquarters said the general had been misquoted, and today he went about setting the record straight. Speaking in Paris, Gruenther said; "The question is frequently asked "'Are we yet strong enough to give a guarantee that we coundresist successfully an all out act of aggression?' I think", Gruenther went on, "that in all frankness we must admit that in spite of our great progress during the past five years, we are still not that strong. However, we will have that strength when the German contribution is effective, and we estimate that this will be in about three to four years." This may not be an entirely reassuring statement, but, as the general said, it is frank.

The announcement that a British - Soviet conference is to be held in Vietnam is a timely reminder that the Middle East is not the only spot in the world where a local war is possible. In July, elections are supposed to be held through Vietnam and Vietminh on unification. That was decided at the Geneva conference whichended the fighting in Indochina. But the elections will not be held, at least not in July. Premier Diem of Vietnam was not a party to the Geneva conference. At that time he had not overthrown the regime of Emperor Bao Dai. As head of the government that succeeded Bao Dai he does not consider himself bound by terms of the Geneva armistice.

Diem is not against elections,but he will agree to them only if they are genuinely free. He wants international supervision and he will not accept supervision by the present armistice committee, of which Poland is a member.

The communist government of Vietminh holds to the letter of the armistice and if, by July, elections have not been arranged, might sweep into Vietnam and try to overwhelm the Diem regime with a combination of outside forces and internal uprising.

The great powers -- the Soviet Union, the United States, Communist China, France and Britain -- are up to their necks in this crisis. A local war would at once draw the SEATO states into the conflict. Communist China, as the main sponsor of Vietminh, might be involved. Such a war could hardly continue to be local. So it is one the powers want to avert. That makes the British announcement of a conference welcome news today in many capitals.

A big factor in the crisis is the unexpected success of Premier Diem in winning home support for his democratic government. When the fighting ended he was left with a large residue of communists, as well as the remnants of the private armies of the religious sects that he administered parts of the country. He went resolutely to work to establish his authority. His government says it found nearly two thousand Vietminh organizations set up in central Vietnam. It has arrested 14,000 northern agitators. It can boast that 2,000 former communist officials recently took the oath of allegiance at a single ceremony in Saigon. And 5[illegible],000 members of communist bands have gone over to the government with their arms.

These figures may be exaggerated, but they show the size of Diem's task. There is some danger that the newly converted communists may not be genuine converts, that they went over to Diem on party orders to be ready to rise if Vietminh should invade. That is, Diem's position may not be completely secure. But by any test he has done an astonishing job. Just after the armistice it lookes almost inevitable that the northern communists would take over the south with hardly a struggle.

So far as the powers and their influence is involved, it appears that the war is one that will be averted. The Soviet official line on divided territories is that military action is to be avoided at all cost, and efforts should focus on working for negotiations.

The Russians are expected to press for a new Geneva conference, but Premier Diem prpbably would refuse to attend, and the United States would be equally reluctant.

Communist China is more deeply involved in Vietnam than the Soviet Union, but it also is expected to discourage a communist invasion of the south. It has reason to prefer the status quo. If Communist Vietminh, with its industries, takes over Vietnam, with its rice, the new state could become the most powerful nation in Southeast Asia. But in its present condition Vietminh is dependent on Red China, and Peking may prefer a subservient satellite to a self-sufficinet and independent neighbor.

So the possibility of war in Vietnam would appear to depend on the communists of Vietminh itself. They are unhappy, because they feel they were cheated out of Vietnam at Geneva. General Giap, the Vietminh commander - in-chief, may think he could take over the South so swiftly that there would be no time for Soviet and Chinese restraint, or for SEATO to organize a counter-blow. If he is fanatical enough, there still could be a war. But now that the powers are to confer on the danger, the chances of a surprise invasion are, at least, lessened. This is one powder keg none of the great powers are anxious to set a match to.

I'll be back in a moment with a footnote to the day's news. But first, Bern Bernett.

BERNETT: COMMERCIAL

COLLINGWOOD: An American farm delegation's visit to Russia may have started to bear fruit. At least Tass, the Soviet news agency, reports that the Rostovski State Dairy Farm has managed to cut its labor force in half without any drop in production. This was achieved by a better division of labor and only two milkings a day, instead of four or five. Tass didn't say so but this is just what the visiting American farmers had recommended.

This is Charles Collingwood. See you tomorrow.

Collingwood-for Murrow Fri., April 6, 1956

Good evening:

United Nations Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold took off this evening on his peace mission to the Middle East. His first stop will be London, where British Foreign Secretary Selwyn Lloyd will confer with him at the airport. Lloyd reportedly will urge that the size of U.N. truce teams be increased, as one means of preventing incidents between Israel and the Arab states. Hammarskjold's stop-over in London will be brief. He's due in Rome this week-end for a meeting with United Nations experts on the Middle East, including the head of the U.N. relief agency for Arab refugees, before flying on to Lebanon and the other countries involved in the tense Palestine situation. Egypt accused Israel today of deliberately planning yesterday's incidents... in which more than 60 lives reportedly were lost... to coincide with Hammarskjold's departure. Israel, on the other hand, accuses Egypt of starting the action, and of continual deliberate provocations in the Gaza area for a period of months. In London today, the Israeli ambassador urged Britain not to wait... but to fulfill arms orders placed by Israel as long as two years ago. The arms requested include anti-aircraft guns, jet fighter planes and tanks. In Washington, a State Department spokesman said the new incidents "highlight the urgency of the Hammarskjold mission." And President Eisenhower and Secretary of State Dulles met for a half-hour today, before the regular meeting of the cabinet, to review the worsening situation. White House News Secretary Hagerty says as far as he knows, the conference between the President and Mr. Dulles did not produce any new American policy or course of action.

A new artillery duel broke out early today on the Gaza Strip, but ended after an hour. A tentative report... based on the findings of U.N. truce observers... lists 55 Egyptians, all but four of them civilians, and four Israelis killed in yesterday's bombardment. Cairo places its losses at 63 dead, and says ~~Cairo says~~ ~~an~~ one Egyptian soldier died in today's action. Israel claims six dead.

The United States is sending Loy W. Henderson, the deputy undersecretary of state, to the Baghdad Pact meeting at Tehran on April 16th. Henderson is one of this country's top experts on the Middle East. And though he will attend the meeting as an observer, it is hoped the sending of so high an official will demonstrate American interest in the alliance, even though the United States is not a member. Present members of the Baghdad Pact are Britain, Turkey, Pakistan, Iran and Iraq. Britain has been trying hard to get the United States to join.

In Algeria, the French are battling a strong rebel force, 100 miles south of Constantine. The action has been going on for two days, and French reinforcements are being flown in by helicopter. The French say they can't tell what losses they have inflicted, because the rebels stay hidden among the rocks.

Last winter, President Eisenhower appointed a committee of prominent citizens to make a thorough study of the nation's school system, and its needs. And today the 34-member committee made its report. Or rather, we should say three reports, because there was a majority report...signed by 28 members of the committee... and two minority reports. The majority report said, "It seems obvious that within the next decade, the money spent on education should be approximately doubled." Classroom construction, it reported, is lagging behind the foreseeable need by some 15-hundred units a year. And the annual recruitment of teachers, it said, is only about a third of what is needed.

→

"This committee," the majority report continued, "believes that Federal aid for school construction should be made available on a limited basis to all states and territories and the District of Columbia, to help overcome the present school-building emergency." (Nothing about withholding money from states that would continue segregation in their public schools). One of the minority reports opposed the whole idea of Federal grants. Assistance, it said, should be in the form of loans, extended for the minimum length of time necessary on a no-interest basis. The other minority report noted that nothing had been said about money for teachers' salaries and observed, "The need for Federal aid is not limited to school construction alone." It also said the program should not be a short-term proposition. One point on which there was unanimous agreement concerned desegregation. Desegregation of the public schools, the committee said, is a problem which "must be worked out by each community, within the intent of the relevant Supreme Court decisions."

A Senate-House committee agreed tonight on a compromise farm bill. The measure calls for the soil bank program the Administration wanted, plus the high rigid price supports the Administration does not want. The language of the bill provides for supports at 90 percent of parity for one year. Chairman Ellender of the Senate Agriculture Committee said flatly tonight that President Eisenhower either takes this bill, "or there is no farm bill this session." Chairman Cooley of the House Agriculture Committee agreed. If the President vetoes the measure, he said, it is highly doubtful Congress would go through the whole rigmarole again this year. Of course, the full House and Senate still have to act on the compromise, and that action is scheduled for next week. Democratic leaders predict the bill will be on the President's desk by Friday.

While campaigning in Florida today, Adlai Stevenson accused Senator Kefauver of neglecting his Senate duties... by traveling around the country making political speeches. Stevenson charged Kefauver with "wanting to be President too badly", and said the Tennessee senator shares "the Republican enthusiasm for my political extinction." When Stevenson was making these remarks, Kefauver was opening his primary campaign in New Jersey, and Kefauver said his opponent for the Democratic presidential nomination was talking "like a man who is desperate". He said he was "surprised and disappointed".

Russia bowed today to British hostility against the head of its dreaded secret police, and decided to drop General Serov from the party of Kremlin leaders arriving in Britain on April 18th. When Serov arrived in London two weeks ago, to make security arrangements for Premier Bulganin and Communist Party boss Khruschev, the London press greeted him with headlines calling him "thug" and a new "Ivan the Terrible". Now he has gone back to Moscow and it appears that he will not be back... at least, not right away.

The Warsaw Radio said tonight that Vladyslaw Gomulka, the ex-deputy premier of Poland, has been released from prison and "rehabilitated". Gomulka, who was also [redacted] secretary of the Polish party central committee, had been convicted of Titoism. The Warsaw Radio says that "dozens" of other members of the central committee have also been set free.

Charles Collingwood
6 April 7:45 PM

THINK

The impact upon the Russian people of the devaluation of Josef Stalin is still the subject of intense speculation all over the world. We hear stories of demonstrations in Georgia, mass meetings of indoctrination in Moscow, and there are cryptic passages from Pravda.... but we are so far away, and the psychology of the Russian people is so enigmatic to us, that its difficult to form any convincing picture of just how the Russians themselves are taking it. Its in a situation like this that a good reporter can be immensely helpful. Therefore, I want to read you from a long cable we received from CBS New Correspondent Dan Schorr in Moscow. Schorr has just made a trip to the Provincial center of Vladimir, a town of 100 thousand population about a hundred and ten miles East of Moscow. Vladimir is somewhat off the beaten track and is not accustomed to foreigners. Schorr says he had the feeling of being something a a problem. But, he says, "I was also a curiosity -- followed through the streets by children and finally engaged in conversation by an adult -- a railway mechanic -- who wanted to know my impressions of his home town. Within minutes a crowd of fifty had gathered -- three talking, the rest listening intently. There were the usual questions about America -- whether negroes are allowed to work (with some sceptical looks, Schorr says, when I said yes) ... about American insistence on continuing nuclear tests, about balloons... My inquisitors were pointed but not hostile, though the discussion didn't get very far because they rejected any suggestion Soviet papers might not be giving them all the facts -- my mechanic friend said, "Everything in our papers is true."

When I turned the conversation to the "cult of personality," though, Schorr says, it became considerably less animated. One confined himself to saying Pravda's attack on Stalin was "very interesting." Another said: " We know Marx, Engels, and Lenin were humble people. Stalin was not humble. He made every effort to build himself up."... Schorr asked why all these revelations had come so late and someone replied "Better late than never." I asked "Do you feel confident such things won't happen again?"... A young worker answered "Yes, I feel sure. I believe in the government." Then, after a pause, he added "at least that's my opinion at the moment."

During all this, our correspondent reports, a young man who had previously been speaking with fluent ease began stammering. Another fell silent. Another slipped away. There was almost a tangible feeling of discomfort and the street corner session quickly ended.

If I can be forgiven for generalizing where a reporter should ordinarily be specific, Schorr says, here are my conclusions about Vladimir, USSR, after a two day visit: Economically, the people feel better times are coming -- more goods, more housing. They believe Vladimir's water supply, damaged during the war, will finally be repaired so they'll no longer have to get water from street pumps... The two hour reduction in the work week has caused great enthusiasm. But people are confused, uncertain what to think. Old symbols have crashed and new ones have not been fully fixed in place. Local echelons of authority seem to react to this public agitation by increased surveillance.

Schorr talked to the local Communist Party secretary in Vladimir. The official told him the campaign to destroy the personailty cult naturally "agitated the people here." He declined to specify how the agitation expressed itself.... Though the Secretary said he, like others, had believed in Stalin because "we saw his good works," he expressed conviction that destalinisation is presently necessary because of the consequences of the personality cult... He was thus intentionally or not paraphrasing the title of a recent Prvda article "The culr of personality" and its consequences....

Schorr says he returned to Moscow from his trip to Vladimir to find Pravda debouncing "rotten elements" who challenge the foundations of Communist party p licy instead of only discussing the errors of the cult of personality.... The average man in Vladimir, he says, doesn't challenge anything. He only wonders.

~~Thisxix~~

I'LL BE BACK IN A MOMENT WITH A FOOTNOTE TO THE DAYS NEWS

BUT FIRST BOB DIXON

That Oklahoma University professor I mentioned the other night ... the professor seeking to carry out some reasearch with bedbugs but unable to find any ... has a partial [redacted] answer to his problem. A woman came to his office today carrying a small green bottle at arms length. "These are for you," she said and then fled. The professor has his bedbugs and can now carry on his experiment.

THIS IS CHARLES COLLINGWOOD ..... SEE YOU MONDAY

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

FRIDAY, APRIL 6, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

CHARLES COLLINGWOOD REPORTING

Good Evening:

United Nations Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold took off this evening on his peace mission to the Middle East. His first stop will be London, where British Foreign Secretary Selwyn Lloyd will confer with him at the airport. Lloyd reportedly will urge that the size of the U.N. truce teams be increased, as one means of preventing incidents between Israel and the Arab states. Hammaraskjold's stop-over in London will be brief. He's due in Rome this week-end for a meeting with United Nations experts on the Middle East, including the head of the U.N. relief agency for Arab refugess, before flying on to Lebanon and the other countries involved in the tense Palestine situation. Egypt accused Israel today of deliberately planning yesterday's incidents..in which more than 60 lives reportedly were lost..to coincide with Hammarskjold's departure. Israel, on the other hand, accuses Egypt of starting the action, and of continual deliberate provocations in the Gaza area for a period of months. In London today, the Israeli ambassador urged Britain not to wait.. but to fulfill arms orders placed by Israel as long as two years ago. The aras requested include anti-aircraft guns, jet fighters planes and tanks. In Washington, a state Department spokesman said to new incidents "highlight the urgency of the Hammarskjold mission." And President Eisenhower and Secretary of State Dulles met for a half- hour today, before the regular meeting of the cabinet, to review the worsening situation. White House News Secretary Hagerty says as far as he knows, the conference between the President and Mr. Dulles did not produce any new American policy or course of action.

A new artillery duel broke out early today on the Gaza Strip, but ended after an hour. A tentative report..based on the findings of U.N. truce observers..lists 55 Egyptians, all but four of them civilians, and four Israelis killed in yesterday's bombardment Cairo places its losses at 63 dead,and says one Egyptian soldier died in today's action. Israel claims six dead.

The United States is sending Loy W. Henderson, the deputy undersecretary of state, to the Baghdad Pact meeting at Teheran on April 16th. Henderson is one of this country's top experts on the Middle East. And though he will attend the meeting as an observer, it is hoped the sending of so high an official will demonstrate American interest in the alliance, even though the the United States is not a member. Present members of the Baghdad Pact are Britain, Turkey, Pakistan, Iran and Iraq. Britain has been trying hard to get the United States. to join.

In Algeria, the French are battling a strong rebel force, 100 miles south of Constantine. The action has been going on for two days and French reinforcements are being flown in by helicopter. The French say they cannot tell what losses they have inflicted, because the rebels have hidden among the rocks.

Last winter, President Eisenhowe appointed a committee of prominent citizens to make a thorough study of the nation's school system, and its needs. And today the 34-member committee made its report. Or rather, we should say three reports, because there was a majority report..signed by 28 members of the committee..and two minority reports. The majority report said, "It seems obvious that within the next decade, the money spent on educations should be approximately doubled." Classroom construction, it reported, is lagging behind the forseeable need by some 15-hundred units a year. And the annual recruitment of teachers, is this, is only about a third of what is needed.

"This committee", the majority report continued, "believes that Federal aid for school construction should be made available on a limited basis to all states and territories and the District of Columbia, to help overcome the present school-building emergency." (Nothing about withholding money from states what would continue segregation in their public schools.(One of the minority reports opposed the whole idea of Federal grants. Assistance, if said, should be in the form of loans, extended for the minimum length of time necessary on a no-interest basis, The other minority report noted that nothing had been said about money for teachers' salaries and observed "The need for Federal aid is not limited to school construction alone." It also said the program should not be a short-term proposition. One point on which there was unanimous agreement concerned desegregation. Desegregation of the public schools, the committee said, is a problem which "must be worked out by each community, within the intent of the relevant Supreme Court decisions."

A White House committee agreed tonight on a compromise farm bill. The measure calls for the soil bank program the Administration wanted, plus the rigid price supports the Administration does not want. The language of the bill provides for supports at 90 percent of parity for one year. Chairman Ellender of the Senate Agriculture Committee said flatly tonight that President Eisenhower either takes this bill, "or there is no farm bill this session." Chairman Cooley of the House Agricultrue Committee agreed. If the President vetoes the measure, he said, it is highly doubtful Congress would go through the whole rigamarole again this year. Of course, the full House and Senate still have to act on the compromise, and the action is scheduled for next week. Democratic leaders predict the bill will be on the President's desk by Friday.

While campaigning in Florida today, Adlai Stevenson accused Senator Kefauver of neglecting his Senate duties..by traveling around the country making political speeches. Stevenson charged Kefauver with "wanting to be President too badly," and said the Tennessee senator shares "the Republican enthusiasm for my political extinction." When Stevenson was making these remarks, Kefauver was opening his primary campaign in New Jersey, and Kefauver said his opponent for the Democratic presidential nomination was talking "like a man who is desperate." He said he was "surprised and disappointed."

Russia bowed today to British hostility against the head of its dreaded secret police, and decided to drop General Serov from the party of Kremlin leaders arriving in Britain on April 18th. When Serov arived in London two weeks ago, to make security arrangements for Premier Bulganin and Communist Party boss Khrushchev, the London press greeted him with headlines calling him "thug" and a new "Ivan the Terrible." Now he has gone back to Moscow and it appears that he wlll not be back..at least, not right away.

The Warsaw Radio said tonight that Vladyslaw Gomulka, the ex-deputy premier of Poland, has been released from prison and "rehabilitated". Gomulka, who was also secretary of the Polish party central committee, had been convicted of Titoism. The Warsaw Radio says that "dozens" of other members of the central committee have also been set free.

The impact upon the Russian people of the devaluation of Joseph Stalin is still the subject of intense speculation all over the world. We hear stories of demonstrations in Georgia, mass meetings of indoctrination in Moscow, and there are cryptic passages from Pravda..but we are so far away, and the psychology of the Russian people is so enigmatic to us, that its difficult to form any convincing picture of just how the Russians themselves are taking

it. Its in a situation like this that a good reporter can be immensely helpful. Therefore, I want to read you from a long cable we received from CBS Correspondent Dan Schorr in Moscow. Schorr has just made a trip to the Provincial center of Vladimir, a town of 100 thousand population about a hundred and ten miles East of Moscow. Vladimir is somewhat off the beaten track and is not accustomed to foreigners. Schorr sayd he had the feeling of being something of a problem. But, he says, "I was also a curiosity -- followed through the streets by children and finally engaged in conversation by an adult -- a railway mechanic -- who wanted to know my impressions of his home town. Within minutes a crowd of fifty had gathered -- three talking, and rest listenting intently. There were the usual questions about America -- whether negroes are allowed to work (with some sceptical looks, Schorr says, when I said yes) ..about American insistence on continuimg nuclear tests, about balloons..My inquisitors were pointed but not hostile, though the discussion didn't get very far because they rejected any suggestion Soviet papers might not be giving them all the facts -- my mechanic friend said, "Everything in our papers is true."

When I turned the conversation to the "cult of personality", though, Schorr says, it became considerably less animated. One confined himself to saying Pravda's attack on Stalin was "very interesting". Another said: "We know Marx, Engels, and Lenin were humble people. Stalin was not humble. He made every effort to build himself up." Schorr ssked why all these revelations had come so late and someone replied "Better late than never." I asked "Do you feel confident such things won't happen again ?" A young worker answered "Yes, I feel sure. I believe in the government." Then, after a pause, he added "at least that's my opinion at the moment."

During all this, our correspondent reports, a young man who had previously been speaking with fluent ease began stammering. Another fell silent. Another slipped away. There was almost a tangible feeling of discomfort and the street corner session quickly ended.

If I can be forgiven for generalizing where a reporter should ordinarily be specific, Schorr says, here are my conclusions about Vladimir, USSR, after a two day visit: Economicaly, the people feel better times are coming -- more goods, more housing. They believe Vladimir's water supply, damaged druing the war, will finally be repaired so they'll no longer have to get water from street pumps.. The two hour reduction in the work week has caused great enthusiasm. But people are confused, uncertain what to think. Old symbols have crashed and new ones have not been fully fixed in place. Local echelons of authority seem to react to this public agitation by increased surveillance.

Schorr talked to the local Communist Party secretary in Vladimir. The officials told him the campaign to destroy the personality cult naturally "agitated the people here." He declined to specify how the agitation expressed itself. Though the Secretary said he, like others, had believed in Stalin because "we saw his good works," he expressed conviction that destalinisation is presently nec ssary because of the consequences of the personality cult. He was thus intentionally or not paraphrasing the title of a recent Pravda article "The cult of personality" and its consequences.

Schorr says he returned to Moscow from his trip to Vladimir to find Pravda denouncing "rottnn elements" who challenged the foundations of Communist party policy instead of only discussing the errors of the cult of personality. The average man in Vladimir, he says, doesn't challenge anything. He only wonders.

I'll be back in a moment with a Footnote to the days news. But first, Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

COLLINGWOOD: That Oklahoma University professor I mentioned the other night.. the professor seeking to carry out some research with bedbugs but unable to find any.has a partial answer to his problem. A woman came to his office today carrying a small green bottle at arms length. "These are for you," she said, and then fled. The professor has hed bedbugs and can now carry on his experiment.

This is Charles Collingwood. See you Monday.

Collingwood for Murrow Mon., April 9, 1956

Good evening:

The White House has issued a formal warning that the United States will go to the assistance of any nation which is the victim of aggression in the Middle East. The warning was in the form of a statement, given to reporters at Augusta, Georgia, where President Eisenhower flew today for a week's vacation. ~~And it was issued by White House News Secretary Hagerty "with the full approval of the President and the Secretary of State."~~ The statement said: "The United States will support in fullest measure the mission of the secretary general of the United Nations to the area (that is, to the Middle East), pursuant to the unanimous action of the Security Council. The United States trusts that all United Nations member countries, including particularly the states directly involved, will similarly support that mission of peace. The United States," the statement continues, "in accordance with its responsibilities under the charter of the United Nations, will observe its commitments within constitutional means to oppose any aggression in the area. The United States is likewise determined to support and assist any nation which might be subjected to such aggression. And the United States," the statement concludes, "is confident that other nations will act similarly in the cause of peace." It was immediately noted, by members of Congress, that the statement said the United States would observe its commitments "within constitutional means." They interpret this to mean that the President would seek congressional approval before intervening with American troops. Before Mr. Eisenhower left Washington for Augusta, he discussed the Middle East situation with Secretary of State Dulles, and together they drew up the draft of tonight's statement. The President himself put the statement in its final form. Tomorrow, Mr. Dulles will meet congressional leaders of both parties to discuss the Middle East problem.

United Nations Secretary Dag Hammarskjold took off from Rome a few hours ago, on the last leg of his flight to the Middle East to alleviate the tensions in the area. While in Rome, Hammarskjold had a private audience with Pope Pius, who expressed his "fervid wishes" for the success of Hammarskjold's mission. He also talked to President Gronchi of Italy, who offered Hammarskjold the assistance of the Italian diplomatic missions in the Middle East. The secretary-general's first stop will be Lebanon. Frpm there he will go to Egypt and the other countries directly involved.

Israel charged tonight that Egyptian commandos have raided inside [redacted] Israeli territory for the third night in a row. An Israeli military [redacted] spokesman says one of the Egyptian raiders was killed. That makes 10 [redacted] of the commandos the Israelis say they have slain in the last 2 days. The State Department said today that the American ambassadors in both Israel and Egypt have [redacted] appealed to both those countries to observe a strict cease-fire. A dispatch from Tel Aviv says our ambassador to Israel... Edward Lawson... has been recalled for consultations in Washington.

President Eisenhower asked Congress today for an additional 547-million dollars for defense in the next fiscal year. More than half of this extra money would be used to speed up the production of long-range B-52 bombers and the building of bases to handle these bombers. Fifty million dollars would go "to meet unforeseen developments in the ballistic missile program." There was no elaboration of just what these "unforeseen developments" might be.

The Administration sent Congress its civil rights program today. Attorney General Brownell, who submitted the program, asked Congress to create a federal civil rights commission. It would be a bipartisan commission of six members... named by the President and confirmed by the Senate... and it would have subpoena powers. Its business would be to investigate any denial of voting rights, or unwarranted economic pressures brought to bear on persons because of color, race, religion or national origin. Congress also was asked to create a new civil rights division within the Justice Department, to handle civil rights cases. Brownell asked Congress to tighten existing laws against intimidation of voters in federal elections, and to ~~improve laws governing conspiracies to interfere with civil rights. These revisions~~ would make it a federal offense for any individual to try to deprive anyone of his voting rights... or, by intimidation or other means, to "conspire" to interfere with any person's civil liberties. They would allow the government to step in on its own, without waiting for the injured party to bring suit, OR to exhaust all remedies available in state courts.

The Supreme Court ruled today that pleading the Fifth Amendment is not, in itself, sufficient cause for firing a college professor. The court held... by a 5-to-4 decision... that New York City violated the constitutional rights of Dr. Harry Slochower, an associate professor at Brooklyn College, when it discharged him solely for refusing to answer questions on grounds of possible self-incrimination. At a hearing... four years ago... Slochower told the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee he had not been a Communist since 1941, but refused on the basis of the Fifth Amendment to answer questions relating to prior years. The majority of the Supreme Court held that, in dismissing Slochower for this reason, the city violated the teacher's right to due process of law. Justice Harlan wrote, in the dissenting opinion, that the court was "unduly circumscribing the power of the state to ensure the qualifications of its teachers." Speaking for the majority, Justice Clark said: "We must condemn the practice of imputing a sinister meaning to the exercise of a person's constitutional right under the Fifth Amendment. The privilege against self-incrimination," Justice Clark explained, "would be reduced to a hollow mockery if its exercise could be taken as equivalent either to a confession of guilt, or a conclusive presumption of perjury." President Harry Gideonse of Brooklyn College says Professor Slochower will be reinstated in compliance with the Supreme Court decision. Then, Dr. Gideonse says, Slochower will be suspended on charges that will be "professionally appropriate."

Before he took off for Augusta today, President Eisenhower conferred with Republican leaders of Congress on the farm bill approved last week by a Senate-House conference committee. House Republican Leader Martin said after the meeting that Mr. Eisemhower feels the measure "does not meet the test of a good bill". And Martin said House Republican leaders will try to send the bill back to conference committee when it comes to the House floor on Wednesday. The measure contains the soil bank plan requested by the Administration, but it also calls for the continuation of high rigid price supports...something the Administration, all along, has bitterly opposed.

Senator Kefauver offered today to met Adlai Stevenson in a public debate on the night of April 14th, when he will be in Miami to address a meeting at the electricians hall, or anytime during the week of May 21st. Stevenson had told CBS News' Campaign Cavalcade yesterday that he would be "very happy" to join in a debate with the Tennessee senator, who is his arch rival... at the moment... for the Democratic presidential nomination. Stevenson says he won't be able to meet Kefauver for that debate on April 14th... he'll be campaigning in northern Florida on that date... but he says a face-to-face debate can probably be arranged for sometime in May.

Charles Collingwood
9 April 7:45 PM

THINK

A New York Times reporter used a bright metaphor this morning to describe Senator Estes Kefauver's unremitting quest for the Presidential nomination. "Science," he said "need not work too hard on that earth satellite. There's one already and his name is Estes Kefauver. The Senior Senator from Tennessee is whizzing about the political horizon like an artificial moon run amuck."

In all truth, Kefauver's campaign schedule does seem to stretch the laws of earthbound motion. For instance, he speaks in Maryland tonight, then flies to New Jersey. He has a political breakfast in Jersey City tomorrow, then goes on tour until 4 when he meets the commuters trains coming in from New York to grasp the commuters' hands. At 7:30 he speaks at a dinner in Freehold, at 8 he addresses a club in Sayreville, at 9 he talks to a labor meeting somewhere else and at 10 he is due to make a speech on Middle East policy at a Jewish temple in New York City... At 8 o'clock the next morning he flies to North Carolina for more appearances and then leaves that afternoon for Florida to begin three days of campaigning there.

Its a schedule to make the hardiest travelling salesman blanch. But the Kefauver people think their peripatetic candidate is having success in selling his wares. Their plan is a simple one. It is to have Kefauver come to the Democratic Convention with such a record behind him that he cannot be denied the nomination. Of course, that's asking a good deal more of the candidate than it is of the people who help make his strategy, but so far Kefauver is making them look pretty good. He won as he was expected to do in New Hampshire. He won against odds in Minnesota. In Wisconsin he held Eisenhower himself to 55 percent of the total vote, ~~a feat which is pretty remarkable in itself.~~

The Kefauver tactic now is to maintain the momentum -- to keep the pressure on. That's why he's turning up all over the country. And that's why every Democratic primary from now on will have a special interest.

Take the one tomorrow... Its in Illinois. That's Adlai Stevenson's home state and Kefauver isn't even entered. But he's got a stake there, too. Illinois is one of those states whose primary ballots have room for write-in candidates. Write-ins, as Vice President Nixon discovered in New Hampshire, can be very beneficial. The Kefauver people in Illinois have been busily organising a write-in campaign in his behalf. Governor Stevenson's supporters are reported to be concerned about the move, which has apparently gained some headway. At least, Senator Kefauver's supporters think its gained so much that they say that if he gets 10% of the vote they will regard it as a victory. The estimates from the Kefauver camp of what their man is likely to do have been consistently low, so if they think he'll be doing well with 10% of the vote on a write-in basis, the chances are that they privately think he'll do even better. If he does, that will be a lot of write-ins. Any really large number of Kefauver votes when he wasn't even on the ballot and in Stevenson's home state would add support to the argument which Kefauver's supporters are already making, that he's a more effective vote-getter than his principal opponent,... So, even a primary like tomorrow's in Illinois, where he isn't even entered, will have a bearing on Kefauver's fortunes. ~~One way or another~~ ~~XXXXX~~ Of course, the danger of this is that the Kefauver balloon could be pricked awfully easily. If Stevenson were to beat him in Florida next month, or if Kefauver were to run badly in California in June, the powerful forces in the Democratic party who don't want to see him nominated would need no further argument. Senator Kefauver's positionis very vulnerable. He can't afford any real setbacks.

Meanwhile, as Stevenson and Kefauver fight it out in the primaries, the other Democratic hopefuls are waiting on the sidelines. The names mentioned most often are Governor Harriman of New York and Senator Symington of Missouri. If, by their primary efforts, Stevenson and Kefauver should cancel each other out, either one and probably both at once, could step in to fill the vacuum. But that won't be easy, either. There's a theory among political observers that the Democrats are never happy unless they have a good, rousing fight on their hands. That theory probably does not deserve the status of a law of nature, but its nevertheless clear that the Democrats aren't going to pick a candidate this year without distributing a few bruises in the process.

I'LL BE BACK IN A MOMENT WITH A FOOTNOTE TO THE DAYS NEWS

BUT FIRST BOB DIXON

FOOTNOTE

A conference on Shakespeare opened in Moscow today. It consisted of theatrical figures from all over the Soviet Union. According to Moscow Radio "Peoples Actor Astangov said that the Soviet Union has become Shakespeare's second motherland."..... Well, as the Bard himself said (Hamlet, Scene 5, Line 43) " We know what we are, but know not what we may be."

THIS IS CHARLES COLLINGWOOD.... SEE YOU TOMORROW

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

MONDAY, APRIL 9, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

CHARLES COLLINGWOOD REPORTING

The White House has issued a formal warning that the United States will go to the assistance of any nation which is the victim of aggression in the Middle East. The warning was in the form of a statement, given to reporters at Augusta, Georgia, where President Eisenhower flew today for a week's vacation. The statement said: "The United States will support in fullest measure the mission of the secretary general of the United Nations to the area (that is, to the Middle East), pursuant to the unanimous action of the Security Council. The United States trusts that all United Nations member countries, including particularly the states directly involved, will similarly support that mission of peace. The United States," the statement continues, "in accordance with its responsibilities under the charter of the United Nations, will ovserve its commitments within constitutional means to oppose any aggression in the area. The United States is likewise determined to support and assist any nation which might be subjected to such aggression. And the United States, "the statement concludes, "is confident that other nations will act similarly in the cause of peace." It was immediately noted, by members of Congress, that the statement said the United States would observe its commitments "within constitutional means." They interpret this to mean that the President would seek congressional approval before intervening with American troops. Before Mr. Eisenhower left Washington for Augusta, he discussed the Middle East situation with Secretary of State Dulles, and together they drew up the draft of tonight's statement. The President himself put the statement in its final form. Tomorrow, Mr. Dulles will meet congressional leaders of both parties to discuss the Middle East problem.

United Nations Secretary Dag Hammarskjold took off from Rome a few hours ago, on the last leg of his flight to the Middle East to alleviate the tensions in the area. While in Rome, Hammarskjold had a private audience with Pope Pius, who expressed his "fervid wishes" for the success of Hammarskjold's mission. He also talked to President Gronchi of Italy, who offered Hammarskjold the assistance of the Italian diplomatic missions in the Middle East. The secretary -general's first stop will be Lebanon. From there he will go to Egypt add the other countries directly involved.

Israel charged tonight that Egyptian commandos have raided inside Israeli territory for the third night in a row. An Israeli military spokesman says one of the Egyptian raiders was killed. That makes 10 of the commandos the Israelis say thay have slain in the last 2 days. The State Department said today that the American ambassadors in both Israel and Egypt have appealed to both those countries to observe a strict cease-fire. A dispatch from Tel Aviv says our ambassador to Israel..Edward Lawson..has been recalled for consultations in Washington.

President Eisenhower asked Congress today for an additional 547 million dollars for defense in the next fiscal year. More than half of this extra money would be used to speed up the production of long-range B-52 bombers and the building of bases to handle these bombers. Fifty million dollars would go " to meet unforseen developments in the ballistic missile program." There was no elaboration of just what these "unforseen developments" might be.

The Administration sent Congress its civil rights program today. Attorney Genrall Brownell, who submitted the program, asked Congress to create a federal civil rights commitsion. It would be a bi-partisan commission of six members..named by the President and confirmed by the Senate ..and it would have subpoena powers. Its business would be to investigate any denial of rights, or unwarranted economic pressures brought to bear on persons because of color, race, religion or national origin. Congress also was asked to create a new civil rights division within the Justice Department, to handle civil rights cases. Brownell asked Congress to tighten existing laws against intimidation of voters in federal elections, and to make it a federal offense for any indivisual to try to deprive anyone of his voting rights..or, by intimidation or other means, to "conspire" to interfere with any person's civil liberties. They would allow the government to step in on its own, without waiting for the injured party to bring suit or to exhaust all remedies available in state courts.

The Supreme Court ruled today that pleading the Fifth Amendment is not, in itself, sufficient cause for firing a college professor. The court held ..by a 5 to 4 decision..that New York City violated the constitutional rights of Dr. Harry Slochower, an associate professor at Brooklyn College, when it discharged him solely for refusing to answer questions on grounds of possible self-incrimination. At a hearing..four years ago..Slochower told the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee he had not been a Communist since 1941, but refused tn the basis of the Fifth Amendment to answer questions relating to prior years. The majority of the S preme Court held that, in dismissing Slochower for this reason, the city violated the teacher's right to due process of law. Justice Harlan wrote, in the dissenting opinion, that the court was "unduly circomscribing the power of the state to ensure the qualifications of its teachers." Speaking for the Majority, Justice Clark said: "We must condemn the practice of imputing a sinsiter meaning to the exercise of a person's constitutional right under the Fifth Amendment. The privilege against self-incrimination", Justice Calrk expalined,"would be reduced to a hollow mockery if its exercise could be taken as equivalent either of a confession of guilt, or a conclusive presumption of perjury." President Harry Gideonse of Brooklyn College says Professor Slochower will be reinstated in compliance with the Supreme Court decision. The, Dr. Gideonse says, Slochower will be suspended on charges that will be "professionally appropriate."

Before he took off for Augusta today, President Eiswnhower conferred with Republican leaders of Congress on the farm bill approved last week by a Senate-House conference committee. House Republican Leader Martin said after the meeting that Mr. Eisenhower feels the measure "does not meet the test of a good bill." And Martin said House Republican leaders will try to send the bill back to conference committee when it comes to the House floor on Wednesday. The measure contains the soil bank plan requested by the Administration, but it also calls for the continuarion of high rigid price supports..something the Administration, all along, has bitterly opposed.

Senator Kefauver offered today to meet Adlai Stevenson in a public debate on the night of April 14th, when we will be in Miami to address a meeting at the electircians hall, or anytime during the week of May 21st. Stevenson had told CBS New' Campaign Cavalcade yesterday that he would be "very happy" to join in a debate with the Tennessee senator, who is his arch rival..at the moment..for the Democratic presidential nonimation. Stevenson says he won't be able to meet Kefauver for that debate on April 14th..he'll be campaigning in northern Florida on that date..but he said a face-to-face debate can probably be arranged for sometime in May.

A New York Times reporter used a bright metaphor this morning to describe Senator Estes Kefauver's unremitting quest for the Presidential nomination. "Science", he said "need not work too hard on that earth satellite. There's one already and his name is Estes Kefauver. The senior Senator from Tennessee is whizzin' about the political horizon like an artificial moon run amuck."

In all truth, Kefauver's campaign schedule does seem to stretch the laws of earthbound motion. For instance, he speaks in Maryland tonight, then flies to New Jersey. He has a political breakfast in Jersey City tomorrow, then goes on tour until 4 when he meets the commuters trains coming in from New York to grasp the commuters' hands. At 7:30 he speaks at a dinner in Freehold, at 8 he addresses a club in Saybrooville, at 9 he talks to a labor meeting somewhere else and at 10 he is due to make a speech on Middle East policy at a Jewish temple in New York City. At 8 o'clock the next morning he flies to North Caroline for more appearances and then leaves that afternoon for Florida to begin three days of campaigning there.

It is a schedule to make the hardiest travelling salesman blanch. But the Kefauver people think their peripatetic candidate is having success in selling his wares. Their plan is a simple one. It is to have Kefauver come to the Democratic Convention with such a record behind him that he cannot be denied the nomination. Of course, that's asking a good deal more of the candidate than it is of the people who help make his strategy, but so far Kefauver is making them look pretty good. He won as he was expected to do in New Hampshire. He won against odds in Minnesota. In Wisconsin he held Eisenhower himself to 55 percent of the total vote.

The Kefauver tactic now is to maintain the momentum -- to keep the pressure on. That's why he's turning p all over the country. And that's why every Democratic primary from now on will have a special interest.

Take the one tomorrow. It is in Illinois. That is Adlai Stevenson's home state and Kefauver isn't even entered. But he's got a stake there, too. Illinois is one of those states whose primary ballots have room for write-in candidates. Write-ins, as Vice President Nixon discovered in New Hampshire, can be very beneficial. The Kefauver people in Illinois have been busily organising a write-in campaign in his behalf. Governor Stevenson's supporters are reported to be concerned about the move, which has apparently gained some headway. At least, Senator Kefauver's supporters think it has gained so much that they say that if he gets 10% of the vote they will regard it as a victory. The estimates from the Kefauver camp of what their man is likely to do have been consistently low, so if they think he'll be doing well with 10% of the vote on a write-in basis, the chances are that they privately think he'll do even better. If he does, that will be a lot of write - ins. Any really large number of Kefauver votes when he wasn't even ot the ballot and in Stevenson's home state would add support to the argument which Kefauver's supporters are already making, that he's a more effective vote-getter than his principal opponent. So, even a primary like tomorrow's in Illinois, where he isn't even entered, will have a bearing on Kefauver's furtunes.

Of course, the danger of this is that the Kefauver balloon could be pricked awfully easily. If Stevenson were to beat him in Florida next month, or if Kefauver were to run badly in California in June, the powerful forces in the Democratic party who don't want to see him nominated would need no further argument. Senator Kefauver's position is very vulnerable. He can't afford any real setbacks.

Meanwhile, as Stevenson and Kefauver fight it out in the primaries, the other Democratic hopefuls are waiting on the sidelines. The names mentioned most ofter are Governor Harriman of New York and Senator Symington of Missouri. If, by their primary efforts, Stevenson and Kefauver should cancel each other out, either one and probably both at once, could step in to fill the vaccuum. But that won't be easy, either. There's a theory among political observers that the Democrats are never happy unless they have a good, rousing fight on their hands. That theory probably does not deserve the status of a law of nature, but it is nevertheless clear that the Democrats aren's going to pick a candidate this year without distributing a few bruises in the process.

I'll be back in a moment with a footnote to the day's news, but first, Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

COLLINGWOOD: A conference on Shakespeare opened in Moscow today. It consisted of theatrical figures from all over the Soviet Union. According to Moscow Radio "Peoples Actor Astangov said that the Soviet Union has become Shakespeare's second motherland.".....Well, as the Bard himself said (Hamlet, Scene 5, Line 43) "We know what we are, but know not what we may be."

This is Charles Collingwood. See you tomorrow.

Collingwood for Murrow Tues., April 10, 1956

Good evening:

The polls in the Illinois primary have been closed for nearly two hours, and most of the early returns are from strongly Democratic Cook County. Adlai Stevenson was unopposed on the Democratic presidential slate, but supporters of Senator Kefauver called for a write-in vote for their candidate. With 451 out of 9-thousand, 511 precincts reporting, Stevenson has 46,512 votes. (So far, no report of write-in votes for Kefauver.) Kefauver's supporters had said they hoped he would get 10 percent of the vote. Over on the Republican slate, President Eisenhower had only token opposition. So far, in 354 precincts, Eisenhower has garnered 12,691 votes. A complete, up-to-the-minute report on the Illinois primary will be presented over most of these stations on Campaign '56, at 9:30 tonight, Eastern Time.

Secretary of State Dulles discussed the Middle East situation today with congressional leaders. The meeting... at the State Department... lasted an hour and a half, and Senate Majority Leader Johnson said it was a "thorough briefing". He also said it wasn't very encouraging. The question of asking Congress for authority to use American troops, if necessary, was discussed. But congressional leaders emphasized that the Administration is not asking for such authority at this time. There was no request for any legislative action.

Mr. Dulles discussed the Middle East situation again today with President Eisenhower, this time by telephone since the President is in Augusta. Mr. Eisenhower's statement yesterday that the United States is "determined to support and assist" any nation subjected to aggression was warmly endorsed today by Britain and France. But there was no comment from either Israel or the Arab states. In Augusta today, White House News Secretary Jim Hagerty announced that the President will make a major foreign policy address in Washington on April 21st. The occasion will be the annual meeting of the American Society of Newspaper Editors. Hagerty refused to give any details about the contents of the President's speech. United Nations Secretary-General Hammarskjold talked informally with Israeli officials in Tel Aviv today, then flew to Cairo. He was accompanied to Cairo by the head of the United Nations truce commission, General Burns. Tomorrow, they will confer with Egyptian Premier Nasser.

And there was other diplomatic activity. Italy called its diplomats in the Middle East home for urgent consultations. And... in Paris... French Foreign Minister Pineau instructed the French ambassadors in Cairo and Tel Aviv to express France's "grave concern" over the continuing border incidents... also, to express the hope that nothing will be done by Egypt or Israel to hamper Hammarskjold's efforts to lessen tension.

Israel reported tonight that it had killed two more Arab commandos, operating inside Israeli lines near the Jordanian frontier. The Israeli foreign office charges that Egypt is responsible for the commando raids which Israel says have cost at least six Israeli lives in the past few days. The foreign office says it monitored an Egyptian broadcast today which boasted that one of the commando bands had struck deep in Israeli territory, leaving an Israeli settlement on fire. Israel calls the broadcast an open admission of Egypt's "aggressive designs".

→

Syria charged today that an Israeli patrol violated Syrian territory during the night. Syria said its troops fired on the patrol, which then withdrew to its own lines. The Syrian announcement made no mention of casualties.

The general election has ended in Ceylon, with a defeat for the West. The election was held in three stages. It was the voters of northern and eastern Ceylon who went to the polls in the last stage today. The results are not all in. But a late dispatch says the Peoples' United Front... the neutralist party... is assured of an absolute majority in the next legislature. The pro-Western premier is out. This was apparent in the first two days of balloting. Today's balloting merely confirmed the trend.

President Eisenhower prodded Congress today to approve a series of measures designed to make military careers more attractive. Some of the bills have been pending in Congress for months. And the President said no time should be lost in stopping the manpower waste... resulting from the failure of many servicemen to re-enlist. One measure already passed by the House would assure free medical care for the dependents of all military personnel. Other measures would provide better housing and extend the law permitting officers to retire on the basis of their highest temporary rank.

The Air Force announced plans today for building a nuclear reactor at the Wright Air Development Center in Dayton, to be used in testing parts for an airplane powered by atomic energy. The reactor will cost seven and a half million dollars, and construction will start in June. Only yesterday, the Government awarded contracts to the Lockheed Aircraft Company, and to Convair, for development of an airframe to carry an atomic engine for the plane. Activity in this field is picking up.

The Office of Defense Mobilization has announced a nationwide air raid test for the week starting July 20th. Seventy-six areas in the United States and its territories will be targets in a simulated nuclear attack involving the armed forces and the civil defense organization at all levels. Local officials will decide... in each area... if there is to be an actual evacuation. But President Eisenhower and members of his cabinet will evacuate Washington, if they are in the capital at the time of the alert. More than 30 federal agencies will test their ability to operate in emergency quarters. The mock attack will last five hours. In that time, a total of 125 nuclear devices will be assumed to have been dropped.

At Parris Island, South Carolina, a Marine Corps court of inquiry began hearing testimony today in the tragic drowning of six Marines during a forced march in a tidal stream Sunday night. The body of the sixth Marine was recovered today. The victims were in a platoon of 75 recruits, under the command of Staff Sergeant Matthew McKeon of Worchester, Massachusetts. Through his counsel, McKeon has issued a statement saying he took the platoon to the river to teach them discipline... and that he was the first to go into the water and the last out. "It is no excuse," the statement said, "that I had not been in the area before and did not realize the stream we entered was a tidal stream, or that it was unusually deep." Survivors told how McKeon struggled to rescue men from the stream in pitch darkness. The commandant of the Marine Corps... General Pate... said McKeon lacked authority to schedule such a maneuver.

Swing 6 min April 9.

So much is happening abroad that has to be reported, that not all of it is receiving the interpretation it deserves. And I'm not thinking of the marriage in Monaco. Time has to be found for the crisis in the Middle East, the news of the anti-Stalin somersault in the Soviet Union, for the fighting in Algeria, the disarmament talks in London, just to mention some of the stories. A fact that is lost in the flood of news is that NATO--the North Atlantic Treaty Organization which is the pillar of Western Union and security--is going through very serious times.

This past week both the Netherlands and West Geramny officially expressed their consternation over the admission of General Grunther that NATO forces are not sufficient to assure full protection of their territories. The power of NATO to serve its primary function of defense has been greatly weakened by the withdrawal of a great part of France's divisions to Algeria. West Germany also was shocked, and said as much officially, that Premier Mollet had gone back on the Western policy that has ranked German unification ahead of disarmament.

This comes on top of still more serious trouble.

The biggest threat from within NATO is the rift between Turkey and Greece. This is not new, but by now has grown so wide that early reconciliation seems to be out of the question. The two countries are the mainstays of NATO's ground defense in the Middle East. Their present difference is over Cyprus. But NATO shook as from an earthquake when the recent Greek elections came close to voting a communist-controlled coalition into power. It was this election that clinched Turkey's opposition to any compromise that might end with Cyprus becoming Greek. For a communist-controlled Cyprus just off Turkey's coast was something that country would seek to prevent at any cost, not excluding war. The real Cyprus issue has been clouded over by Britain's troubles on the island. But in terms of power the danger is the solidarity of NATO. And nothing is being done, and perhaps can be done at this time, to maintain a sense of solidarity between Greece and Turkey.

4 The ardor of Greece to annex Cyprus, even at the cost of a breach with Britain and Turkey, is an instance of the growing strength of neutralism in Europe. That is, the Greek government, which is advocating the annexation of Cyprus, feels it must do so to keep ahead of its opposition, which accepts without question the Kremlin's slogans of anti-colonialism and peace. This neutralist pressure is affecting the Socialists of the Mollet government in France, and has led to unbridled criticisms of American emphasis on military power. Premier Mollet himself went on record last week as never having believed the Soviet Union would attack the West in Europe. And though he later qualified this by saying it was the result of Western strength and powers of retaliation, he also said that disarmament might make it unnecessary for West Germany ever to become one of the strongly armed members of NATO. And he stressed his desire to have NATO transformed into an economic alliance more than a military one.

This trend to neutralism unexpectedly cropped up in Iceland, with a resolution by the Iceland parliament calling for the withdrawal of United States forces from that country. That made it look as though Iceland were preparing to become the first NATO deserter to the neutralist camp. With its total population o a quarter of a million, Icleand probably should never have been elevated to the rank of full membership in NATO in the first place. But at the time when the United States had the monopoly of atomic power, the air base in Iceland was important.

It is less so today, though it still has considerable value. But Iceland, tiny though it is, would advertise a defeat of the West and a triumph for Communist influence if it expelled the American forces and turned neutralist.

¶ Since the resolution was passed, spokesmen in Iceland have been busy explaining that it didn't really mean what it said. They suggested that the non-communist majority in parliament passed it to stave off a communist victory in the coming election, and once the communists were beaten , the resolution would be allowed to become a dead-letter. They also suggested that Icleanders might themselves man the NATO base. And government leaders have staunchly asserted that Iceland will never walk out of NATO. But it is not to be denied that neutralism in Iceland is more of a factor today than ever before. And the same must be said about far more important NATO countries, notably France.

¶ Ever since the West authorized the rearmament of West Germany, the avowed Soviet policy has been to undermine and wreck the Western alliance. That is the motive of the Kremlin's switch to a soft policy. Today the Alliance still holds, but nobody would say it has the unity and spirit it had before the Kremlin changed its course.

Whether the Soviet gains greatly alarm Washington is hard to say. The Washington strategy seems to be to greet rising perils with silence, or optimism, or even [redacted] denials. This may be election-year caution. But the result is that the public isn't well aware of the dangers to one of the central structures of American power. And that, one might say, is of itself one of the dangers.

6.

FOOTNOTE

Former President and Mrs. Harry S. Truman are going to take a European vacation after their daughter's wedding on April 21. ~~Mrs Truman will [illegible] from Oxford.~~ A reporter asked Mr. Truman whether he would be going to Europe as an elder statesman. ~~This~~ He took exception to this at once. " I am not an elder statesman," said Mr. Truman. "I hate elder statesmen. I am a Democrat and a live politician and proud of it."

THIS IS C.C.... SEE YOU TOMORROW

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

TUESDAY, APRIL 10, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

CHARLES COLLINGWOOD REPORTING

Good Evening:

The polls in Illinois primary have veen closed for nearly two hours, and most of the early returns are fromstrongly Democratic Cook County. Adlai Stevenson was unopposed on the Democtatic presidential slate, but supporters of Senator Kefauver called for a write in vote of their candidate. With 451 out of 9-thousand, 511 precincts reporting, Stevenson was 46,512 votes so far, no report of write - in votes for Kefauver. Kefauver's supporters had said they hoped he would get 10 percent of the vote. Over on the Republican slate, President Eiswnhower had only token opposition. So far, in 354 precincts, Eisenhower has garnered 12,691 votes. A complete, up-to-the-minute report on the Illinois primary will be presented over most of these stations on Campaign '56 at 9:30 tonight, Eastern Time.

Secretary of State Dulles discussed the Middle East situation today with congressional leaders. The meeting..at the State Department..lasted an hour and a half, and Senate Majority Leader Johnson said it was a "thorough briefing." He also said it wasn't very encouraging. The question of asking Congress for authority to use American troops, if necessary, was discussed. But congressional leaders empahaized that the Administration is not asking for such authority at this time. There was no request for any legislative action.

Mr. Dulles discussed the Middle East situation again today with President Eisenhower, this time by telephone since the President is in Augusta. Mr. Eisenhower's statement yesterday that the United States is "determined to support and assist" any nation subjected to aggression was warmly endorsed today be Britain and France. But there was no comment from either Israel or the Arab states. In Augusta today, White House News Secretary Jim Hagerty announced that the President will make a major foreign policy address in Washington on April 21st. The occasion will be the annual meeting of the American Society of Newspaper Editors. Hagerty refused to give any details about the contents of the President's speech. United Nations Secretary - General Hammarskjold talked informally with Israeli officials in Tel Aviv today, then flew to Cairo. He was accomapnied to Cairo by the head of the United Nations truce commission, General Burns. Tomorrow, they will confer with Egyptian Premier Nasser.

And ther was other diplomatic activity. Italy called its diplomats in the Middle East home for urgent consultations. And..in Paris..French Foreign Minister Pineau instructed the French ambassadors in Cairo and Tel Aviv to express France's "grave concern" over the continuing border incidents..also, to express the hope that nothing will be done by Egypt or Israel to hamper Harrarskjold's efforts to lessen tension.

Israel reported tonight that it had killed two more Arab commandos, operating inside Israeli lines near the Jordanian frontier. The Israeli foreign office charged that Egypt is responsible for the commando raids which Israel says have cost at least six Israeli lives in the past few days. The foreign office says it monitored an Egyptian broadcast today which boasted that one of the commando bands had struck deep in Israeli territory, leaving an Israeli settlement on fire. Israel calls the broadcast an open admission of Egypt's "aggressive designs."

Syria charged today that an Israeli patrol violated Syrian territory during the night. Syria said its troops fired on the patrol, which then withdrew during the night. Syria said tis troops fired on the patrol, which then withdrew to its own lines. The Syrian announcement made no mention ofcasualties.

The general election has ended in Ceylon, with a defeat for the West. The election was held in three stages. It was the voters of northern and eastern Ceylon who went to the polls in the last stage today. The results are not all in. But a late dispatch says the Peoples' United Front..the neautralist party.. is assured of an absolute majority in the next legislature. The pro-Western premier is out. This was apparent in the first two days of balloting Today's balloting merely confirmed the trend.

President Eisenhower prodded Congress today to approve a series of measures designed to make military careers more attractive. Some of the billls have been pending in Congress for months. And the President said no time should be lost in stopping the manpower waste, resulting from the failure of many servicemen to re-enlist. One measure already passed by the House would assure free medical care for the dependents of all military personnel. Other measures would provide better housing and extend the law permitting officers to retire on the basis of their highest temporary rank.

The Air Force announced plans today for building a nuclear reactor at the Wright Air Development Center in Dayton, to be used in testing parts for an airplane powered by atomic energy. The reactor will cost seven and a half million dollars, and construction will start in June. Only yesterday, the Government awarded contracts to the Lockheed Aircraft Company, and to Convair, for development of an airframe to carry an atomic engine for the plane. Activity in this field is picking up.

The Office of Defense Mobilization has announced a nationwide air raid test for the week starting July 20th. Seventy-six areas in the United States and its territories will be targets in a simulated nuclear attack involving the armed forces and the civil defense organization at all levels. Local officials will decide in each areaa if there is to be an actual evacuation. Ne.

But President Eisenhower and members of his cabinet will evacuate Washington, if they are in the capital at the time of the alert. More than 30 federal agencies will test their ability to operate in emergency quarters. The mock attack will last five hours. In that time, a total of 125 nuclear devices will be assumed to have been dropped.

At Parris Island, South Carolina, a Marine Corps court of inquiry began hearing testimony today in the tragic drowning of six Marines during a forced march in a tidal stream Sunday night. The body of the sixth Marine was recovered today. The victims were in a platoon of 75 recruits, under the command of Staff Sergeant Matthew McKeon of Worcester, Massachusetts. Through his counsel, McKeon has issued a statement saying he took the platoon to the river to teach them discipline. and that he was the first to go into the water and the last out. "It is no excuse," hhe statement said, "that I had not been in the area before and did not realize the stream we entered was a tidal stream, or that it was unusually deep." Survivors told how McKeon struggled to rescue men from the streem in pitch darkness. The commandant of the Marine Corps.. General Pate..said McKeon lacked authority to schedule such a maneuver.

So much is happening abroad that has to be reported, that not all of it is receiving the interpretation it reserves. And I'm not thinking of the marraige in Monaca. Time has to be found for the crisis in the Middle East, the news of the anti-Stalin somersaults in the Soviet Union, for the fighting in Algeria, the disarmament talks in London, just to mention some of the stories. A fact that is lost in the flood of news is that NATO-- the North Atlantic Treaty Organization which is the pillar of Western Union and Security -- is going through very serious times.

This past week both the Netherlands and West Germany officially expressed their consternation over the admission of General Gruenther that NATO forces are not sufficient to assure full protection of their territories. The power of NATO to serve its primary function of defense has been greatly weakened by the withdrawal of a great part of France's divisions to Algeria. West Germany also was shocked, and said as much officially, that Premier Mollet had gone back on the Western policy that has ranked German unification ahead of disarmament.

This cames on top of still more serious trouble. The biggest threat from within NATO is the rift between Turkey and Greece. This is not new, but by now has grown so wide that early reconciliation seems to be out of the question. The two countries are the mainstays of NATO's ground defense in the Middle East. Their present difference is over Cyprus. But NATO shook as from an earthquake when the recent Greek elections came close to voting a communist - controlled coalition into power, It was this election that clinched Turkey's opposition to any compromise that might end with Cyprus becoming Greek. For a communist - controlled Cyprus just of Turkey's coast was something that country would seek to prevent at any cost, not excluding war. The real Cyprus issue has been clouded over by Britain's troubles on the island. But in terms of power the danger is the solidarity of NATO. And nothing is being done, and perhaps can be done at this time, to maintain a sense of solidarity between Greece and Turkey.

The ardor of Greece to annex Cyprus, even at the cost of a breach with Britain and Turkey, is an instance of the growing strength of neautralism in Europe. That is, the Greek government which is advocating the annexation of Cyprus, feels it must do so to keep ahead of its opposition, which accepts without question the Kremlin's slogans of anti-colonialism and peace. This neaturalist pressure is affecting the Socialists of the Mollet government in France, and has led to unbridled criticisms of American emphasis on military power. Premier Millet himself went on record last week as never having believed the Soviet Union would attack the West in Europe. And though he later qualified this by saying it was the result of Western strength and powers of retaliation, he also said that disarmement might make it unnecessary for West Germany ever to become one of the strongly armed members of NATO. And he stressed his desire to have NATO transformed into an economic alliance more than a military one.

This trend to neautralism unexpectedly cropped up in Iceland, with a resolution by the Icelandic parliament calling for the withdrawal of United States forces from that country. That made it look as though Iceland were preparing to become the first NATO deserter to the neautralist camp. With its total population of a quarter of a million, Iceland probably should never have been elevated to the rank of full membership in NATO in the first place. But at the time when the United States had the monopoly of atomic power, the air base in Iceland was important. It is less so today, though it still has considerable value. But Iceland, tiny though it is, would advertise a defeat of the West and a triumph for Communist influence if it expelled the American forces and turned Neautralist.

Since the resolution was passed, spokesmen in Iceland have been busy explaining that it didn't really mean what it said. They suggested that the non-communist majority in parlaiment passed it to stave off a communist victory in the coming election, and once the communists were beaten, the resolution would be allowed to become a dead-letter. They also suggested that Icelanders might themselves man the NATO bas . And governmnnt leaders have staunchly asserted that Iceland will never walk out of NATO. But it is not to be denied that neuatralism in Iceland is more of a factor today than ever before. And the same must be said about far more important NATO countries, notably France.

Ever since the West authroized the rearmament of West Germany, the avowed Soviet policy has been to undermine and wreck the Western alliance. That is the motive of the Kremlin's switch to th soft policy. Today the Allicnce still holds, but nobody would say it has the unity and spirit it had before the Kremlin changed its course. Whether the Soviet gains greatly alarm Washington is hard to say. The Washington strategy seems to be to greet rising perils with silence, or optimism, or even denials. This may be election-year caution. But the result is that the public isn't well aware of the dangers to one of the central structures of American power. And that, one might say, is of itself one of the dangers.

I'll be back in a moment with a footnote to the day's news.

ANNOUNCER: COMMERCIAL

COLLINGWOOD: former Presidnnt and Mrs. Harry S. Truman are going to take a European vacation after their daughter's wedding on April 21. A reporter asked Mr. Truman whether he would be going to Europe as an elder statesman. He took exception to this at once. "I am not an elder statesman", said Mr. Truman. "I hate elder statesman. I am a Democrat and a live politician and proud of it."

This is Charles Collingwood. See you tomorrow.

Good evening:

The House ignored the threat of a presidential veto today and passed a farm bill calling for restoration of high, rigid price supports for one year. The House first rejected a motion by Republican Leader Martin that the measure be sent back to conference committee for revision. Farm state Reoublicans then joined the Democrats in approving the bill by a vote of 237 to 181. Although the measure contains the President's soil bank plan, it also pegs the support price of basic crops at 90 percent of parity... a feature the Administration has bitterly opposed. Dispatches from Washington are calling today's action the Administration's worst legislative defeat since President Eisenhower took office. The bill has now gone to the Senate, and a vote may come there later tonight.

The Administration also scored a victory today. The Senate defeated a proposal to set up a special "watchdog" committee to keep an eye on the Central Intelligence Agency. The vote was 59 to 27. The Administration was strongly opposed to the suggestion.

The House Public Works Committee tentatively approved a 25-billion dollar highway program today. Final committee action was delayed until at least tomorrow. Financing features of the bill... including an additional one-cent federal tax on gasoline... already have been approved by the House Ways and Means Committee.

Former President Hoover proposed today that if a president is incapacitated, it should be up to the cabinet to decide whether the vice president should temporarily take over the duties of the President. Mr. Hoover made his proposal in a telegram to a House committee that has been looking into the problem. The Constitution is not clear on the procedure to be followed, if the President becomes too ill to carry out the functions of his office. Mr. Hoover thinks the cabinet should make the decision, since it would be in close contact with the President and best able to appraise the situation. He doesn't think the decision should be left up to Congress.

In Augusta today, President Eisenhower signed the Colorado power and irrigation bill. The measure authorizes a 760-million-dollar system of power dams and irrigation projects for the Upper Colorado River basin, involving five western states.

President Eisenhower has accepted... with regret... the resignation of R. Douglas Stuart as our ambassador to Canada. Stuart had said he wanted to resign because of "personal and business reasons". The new ambassador will be Livingston T. Merchant, the assistant secretary of state.

The President's commission on information issued a strong report today... saying the United States must step up its overseas information activities to counteract Russia's new propaganda line. The report says the United States must prepare and present its case with the greatest possible skill, and not resort to mere defensive tactics. "The effectiveness of our defenses, economic aid and diplomacy depend to a large extent," the report warns, "on how our acts and words are understood by others."

United Nations secretary general Dag Hammarskjold held a series of conferences today with Egyptian leaders in Cairo. In a "frank exchange" with these leaders... including Premier Nasser... Hammarskjold concentrated on steps which might lead to a lessening of tensions along the border between Egypt and Israel. The larger question of a Middle East settlement reportedly was not discussed. According to informed sources, one proposal Hammarskjold made was that each side should pull its forces back 500 meters, or about 550 yards. CBS News Correspondent Frank Kearns says newspapers in Cairo show little sign of conciliation. He quotes one government-sponsored paper mmmm as saying: "The only reasonable proposal which Mr. Hammarskjold can make is the obliteration of Israel from the face of the earth."

The Cairo Radio announced tonight that its commando forces...known as the fedayeen... had completed their mission of revenge in Israel for what it termed "Israeli attacks on Gaza citizens." Just as Cairo was making this announcement, Israel reported new incidents. —INSERT— Egyptian commandos, it said, infiltrating to within 10 miles of Tel Aviv, had ambushed an Israeli bus, wounding six of its passengers.

Egypt charged today that Israeli bombers flew over Gaza twice during the day, but that no bombs were dropped.

Jordan and Syria issued a joint communique, marking the conclusion of a three-day conference between the rulers of the two countries. The communique said Jordan and Syria had agreed to coordinate their defenses.

R143

~~BULLETIN~~

~~LEAD COMMANDOS~~

— INSERT —

~~JERUSALEM, ISRAELI SECTOR, APRIL 11 (REUTERS)~~ EGYPTIAN COMMANDOS BURST INTO A SCHOOL BUILDING ~~AT [illegible]~~ NEAR SHAFRIR, ~~[illegible]~~ AND OPENED FIRE ON 30 YOUTHS AT PRAYER, KILLING THREE OF THEM AND INJURING FIVE, AN ISRAELI SPOKESMAN ANNOUNCED. EYEWITNESSES SAID THE COMMANDOS SPRAYED THE CHILDREN WITH SUB-MACHINEGUN FIRE.

~~(MORE) [illegible]~~

My colleague, Eric Sevareid, reports that French Foreign Minister Pineau asked the United States today for a meeting of the Big Three foreign ministers to discuss the critical Middle Eastern situation. In 1950, the United States, Britain and France... as you know... signed a declaration that they would act to prevent aggression in the Middle East. Their foreign ministers already are scheduled to attend a NATO council meeting in Paris in May. But apparently France [redacted] WANTS A SEPARATE MEETING. [redacted]

In Paris today, the French cabinet voted to call up as many as 200-thousand reservists, as a step toward bringing the rebellion in Algeria under control. A government spokesman said the first mobilization orders will be sent out within 48 hours.

Former President Truman made a speech in Des Moines tonight in which he called Mr. Eisenhower a "do nothing" President. With presidential leadership, he said, "We could have a good farm program." And he repeated his conviction that a Democrat will be elected as the next president.

Adlai Stevenson says he derives "great personal satisfaction" from the results of yesterday's Illinois primary. Nearly complete returns show President Eisenhower leading Stevenson by roughly 20-thousand votes in the popularity contest---723-thousand for Eisenhower, 703-thousand for Stevenson. That gives Eisenhower about 51 percent of the total vote. But Democratic National Chairman Butler has been quick to point out that in the last presidential primary in Illinois---in 1952---the Democrats got only 39 percent of the vote. Yesterday, Stevenson got roughly 49 percent. Senator Kefauver, who waged no personal campaign in Illinois, received around 28-thousand write-in votes, not nearly so many as Kefauver's supporters had hoped for. In downstate Illinois yesterday, the President bettered Stevenson by a margin of better than 2 to 1. In the downstate rural districts, in the 1952 primary, the Republican candidates bettered their opponents by 3 to 1. Political observers feel Stevenson gained ground as a result of yesterday's vote -

Charles Collingwood
11 April 7:45 PM

THINK

After President Eisenhower's announcement that the United States will "assist and support" any nation in the Middle East subject to aggression, Secretary Dulle's conference yesterday with Congressional leaders, the summoning home of ambsaasadors , and the whole atmosphere of gestation of policy, Washington can be said to have awakened, belatedly, to the possibility of a Middle Eastern war in which the United States might be involved.

At that, Washington is not as apprehensive as, say, London... certainly not as much as Tel Aviv. One reason is that Washington hopes the Eisenhower statement, plus the general diplomatic activity will prevent foolhardy action in the Middle East that could set off large scale fighting. Todays relative calm suggests that the warning of the possibility of American intervention is being heeded.... And Secretary General Hammarshold's seventy-five minute conference with Premier Nasser in Egypt today could not have come at a more appropriate moment.

The sense of approaching crisis in the Middle East is being felt all over the world. But it is well to bear in mind that the crisis is reaching its climax on two levels -- only one of which is at the moment clearly visible. The crisis we see is apparent in the raids, counter-raids, border violations, and commando attacks that make up most of the news. But they are only one part of it... Reports say that Washington is beginning to believe that Colonel Nasser has been touched by a big ambition to lead the whole Arab world and that this makes him no longer willing to have peace with Israel. That is what London has been saying with rising insistence for some time.

But even if this is true, this is still only part of the real crisis. What is not seen yet is the full role of the Soviet Union. Some of it is apparent. Russia has plunged into the Middle East and, in full view, is challenging the right of Britain, France and the United States to supervise that region. It showed its hand for all to see with the sale of Czech arms to Egypt. But even before that it had nominated itself as the big brother of the Arab world.

What we don't see is the final Soviet objective. Nor do we know what lengths the Kremlin is prepared to go to achieve it. We can assume it does want to plant its banner at the hub of the world, in the Middle East, for all nations to see. It would be its most sensational victory since World War II. But we don't know whether it is willing to risk a local war to get what it wants. If for instance, there should be trouble that brought in Western forces, would the Soviet answer be to bring in Soviet forces? Does the Kremlin figure it could get much better terms in a settlement if it has Soviet forces on the spot? And how does it assess the risks of general war that that would involve?

We don't know the answers to those questions. Walter Lippmann has pointed out that we are not genuinely in contact with the Soviet Union about the Middle East. We don't know what we are able to do without her, in spite of her, or with her. The Eisenhower declaration and Dulles's meeting with Congressional leaders yesterday were about possible action without the Soviet Union, or about action in spite of her. There is one other possible course. That is to contemplate a Middle East policy with Russia. But that would concede to the Russians a voice in Middle Eastern supervision, which is what the Russians want and which is what the West is determined they shall not have. However, it is not easy to imagine a permanent settlement in the Middle East that does not take account of Russia's new influence there. Moreover, the Russians may not want a permanent settlement.

If we were to guess at Soviet thinking, we should begin by realizing, as the Russians must, that the only thing that holds the Arab states together is their commong hatred of Israel. So, if the Kremlin wants to dominate the Arab world it can hardly agree to a permanent settlement that saves and establishes Israel.

Thus the second, and in the long run the most important, level of the Middle Eastern crisis is the situation among the Big Powers. Whether a big power agreement on the Middle East is possible we don't know. It doesn't seem likely. But the first light we are likely to get on it will not come from Mr. Hammarshold's visits on the scene, but from the B ulganin-Kruschev visit to London later in the month. Their talks with the British may give us some indication of Soviet intentions. Meanwhile the West seems to be elaborating a policy to serve notice on the Soviet Union that if a showdown is forced in the Middle East, the West will meet it.

I'LL BE BACK IN A MOMENT WITH A FOOTNOTE TO THE DAYS NEWS BUT FIRST _____.

FOOTNOTE

A new complication has arisen for Secretary General Hammarshold in his mission to the middle east. Tomorrow the holy month of Ramadan begins. During this month — the Muslim world — no one may eat from sunrise to sunset. Government employees work shorter hours and everyone stays up late at night. A luncheon meeting such as Hammarshold had today with Premier Nasser will be impossible -- unless, of course, they have a bite about 2 AM.

This is C.S.... See you tomorrow

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 11, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

CHARLES COLLINGWOOD REPORTING

Good Evening:

The House ignored the threat of a presidential veto today and passed a farm bill calling for restoration of high, rigid price supports for one year. The House first rejected a motion by Republican Leader Martin that the measure be sent back to conference committee for revision. Farm state Republicans then joined the Democrats in approving the bill by a vote of 237 to 181. Although the measure contains the President's soil bank plan, it also pegs the support price of basic crops at 90 percent of parity..a feature the Administration has bitterly opposed. Dispatches from Washington are calling today's action the Administration's worst legislative defeat since President Eisenhower took office. The bill has not gone to the Senate, and a vote may come there later tonight.

The Administration also scored a victory today. The Senate defeated a proposal to set up a special "watchdog committee"to keep an eye on the Central Intelligence Agency. The vote was 59 to 27. The Administration was strongly opposed to the suggestion.

The House Public Works Committee tentatively approved a 25-billion dollar highway program today. Final committee action was delayed until at least tomorrow. Financing features of the bill..including an additional one-cent federal tax on gasoline..already have been approved by the House Ways and Means Committee.

Former President Hoover proposed today that if a president is incapacitated, it should be up to the cabinet to decide whether the vice president should temporarily take over the duties of the President. Mr. Hoover made his proposal in a telegram to a House committee that has been looking into the problem. The Constitution is not clear on the procedure to be followed, if the President becomes too ill to carry out the functions of his office. Mr. Hoover thinks the cabinet should make the decision, since it would be in close contact with the President and best able to appraise the situation. He doesn't think the decision should be left up to Congress.

In Augusta today, President Eisenhower signed the Colorado power and irrigation bill. The measure authorizes a 760-million-dollar system of power dams and irrigation projects for the Upper Colorado River basin, involving five western states.

President Eisenhower has accepted..with regret..the resignation of R. Douglas Stuart as our ambassador to Canada. Stuart had said he wanted to resign because of "personal and business reasons." The new ambassador will be Livingston T. Merchant, the assistant secretary of state.

The President's commission on information issued to a strong report today.. saying the United States must step up its overseas information activities to counteract Russia's new propaganda line. The report said the United States must prepare and present its case with the greatest possible skill, and not resort to mere defensive tactics.

United Nations secretary general Dag Hammarskjold held a series of conferences today with Egyptian leaders in Cairo. In a "frank exchange" with these leaders..including Premier Nasser..Hammarskjold concentrated on steps which might lead to a lessening of tensions along the border between Egypt and Israel. The larger question of a Middle East settlement reportedly was not discussed. According to informed sources, one proposal Hammarskjold made was that each side should pull its forces back 500 meters, or about 550 yards. CBS News Correspondent Frank Kearns says newspapers in Cairo show little sign of conciliation. He quotes one government-sponsored paper as saying:"The only reasonable proposal which Mr. Hammarskjold can make is the obliteration of Israel from the fact of the earth."

The Cairo Radio announced tonight that its commando forces..known as the Fedayeen .. had completed their mission of revenge in Israel for what it termed "Isreeli attacks on Gaza citizens." Just as Cairo was making this announcement, Israel reported new incidents. Egyptian commandos burst into a school building near Sharfir and opened fire on 30 youths at prayer, killing three of them and injuring five, an Israeli spokesman announced. Eye witnesses said the commandos sprayed the children with sub-machinegun fire. Egyptian commandos, it said, infiltrating to within 10 miles of Tel Aviv, had ambushed an Israeli bus, wounding six of its passengers.

Egypt charged today that Israeli bombers flew over Gaza twice during the day, but that no bombs were dropped.

Jordan and Syria issued a joint communique, marking the conclusion of a three-day conference between the rulers of the two countries. The communique said Jordan and Syria had agreed to coordinate their defenses.

My colleague, Eric Sevareid, reports that French Foreign Minister Pineau asked the United States today for a meeting of the Big Three foreign ministers to discuss the critical Middle Eastern situation. In 1950, the United States, Britain and France ..as you know..signed a declaration that they would act to prevent aggression in the Middle East. Their foreign ministers already are scheduled to attend a NATO council meeting in Paris in May. But apparently France wants a separate meeting.

In Paris today, the French cabinet voted to call up as many as 200-thousand reservists, as a step toward bringing the rebellion in Algeria under control. A government spokesman said the first mobilization orders will be sent out within 48 hours.

Former President Truman made a speech in Des Moines tonight in which he called Mr. Eisenhower a "do nothing" president. With presidential leaderhhip, he said, "We could have a good farm program." And he repeated his conviction that a Democrat will be elected as the next president.

Adlai Stevenson says he derives "great personal satisfaction" from the results of yesterday's Illinois primary. Nearly complete returns show President Eisenhower leading Stevenson by roughly 20- thousand votes in the popularity contest --723 thousand for Eisenhower, 703 thousand for Stevenson. That gives Eisenhower about 51 percent of the total vote. But Democratic Nationll Chairman Butler has been quick to point out that in the last presidentill primary in Illinois -- in 1952 -- the Democrats got only 39 percent of the vote. Yesterday, Stevenson got roughly 49 percent. Senator Kefauver, who waged no personal campaign in Illinois, received around 28-thousand write -in votes, not nearly so many as Kefauver's supporters had hoped for. In downstate Illinois yesterday, the President bettered Stevenson by a margin of better than 2 to 1. In the downstate rural districts, in the 1952 primary, the Republican candidates bettered their opponents by 4 to 1. Political observers feel Stevenson gained ground as a result of yesterday's vote.

After President Eisenhower's announcement that the United States will "assist and support" any nation in the Middle East subject to aggression, Secretary Dulles' conference yesterday with Congressional leaders, the summoning home of ambassadors, and the whole atmosphere of gestation of policy, Washington can be said to have awakened, belatedly, to the possibility of a Middle astern war in which the United States might be involved.

At that, Washington is not as apprehensive as, say, London..certainly not as much as Tel Aviv. One reason is that Washington hopes the Eisenhower statement, plus the general diplomatic activity will prevent foolhardy action in the Middle East that could set off large scale fighting. Todays relative calm suggests that the warning of the possibility of American intervention is being heeded..and Secretary General Hammarskold's seventy-five minute conference conference with Premier Nasser in Egypt today could not have come at a more appropriate moment.

The sense of approaching crisis in the Middle East is being felt all over the world. But it is well to bear in mind that the crisis is reaching its climax on two levels-- only one of which is at the moment clearly visible. The crisis we see is apparent in the raids, counter-raids, border violations, and commando attacks that make up most of the news. But they are only one part of it. Reports say that Washington is beginning to believe that Colonel Nasser has been touched by a big ambition to lead the whole Arab world and that this makes him no longer willing to have peace with Israel. That is what London has been saying with rising insistence for some time.

But even if this is true, this is still only part of the real cirsis. What is not seen yet is the full role of the Soviet Union. Some of it is apparent. Russia has plunged into the Middle East and, in full view challenging the right of Britain, France and the United States to supervise that region. It showed its hand for all to see with the sale of Czech arms to Egypt. But even before that it nominated itself as the big brother of the Arab world.

What we don't see is the final Soviet objective. Nor do we know what lengths the Kremlin is prepared to go to achieve it. We can assume it does want to plant its banner at the hub of the world, in the Middle East, for all nations to see. It would be its most sensational victory since World War II. But we don't know whether it is willing to risk a local war to get what it wants. If for instance, there whould be trouble that brought in Western forces would the Soviet answer be to bring in Soviet forces? Does the Kremlin figure it could get much better terms in a settlement if it has Soviet forces on the spot? And how does it assess the risks of general war that that would involve?

We don't know the answers to those questions. Walter Lippmann has pointed out that we are not genuinely in contact with the Soviet Union about the Middle East. We don't know what we are able to do without her, in spite of her, or with her. The Eisenhower declaration and Dulles's meeting with Congressional leaders yesterday were about possible action without the Soviet Union, or about action in spite of her. There is one other possible course. that is to contemplate a Middle East policy with Russia. But that would concede to the Russians a voice in Middle Eastern supervision, which is what the Russians want and which is what the West is determined they shall not have. However, it is not easy to imagine a permanent settlement in the Middle East that does not take account of Russia's new influence there. Moreover, the Russians may not want a permanent settlement.

If we were to guess at Soviet thinking, we should begin by realizing, as the Russians must, that the only thing that holds the Arab states together is their common hatred of Israel. So, if the Kremlin wants to dominate the Arab world it can hardly agree to a peramnent settlement that saves and establishes Israel.

Thus the second, and in the long run the most important, level of the Middle Eastern crisis is the situation among the Big Powers. Whether a big power agreement on the Middle East is possible we don't know. It doesn't seem likely. But the first light we are likely to get on it ill not come from Mr. Hammarskjold's visits on the scene, but from the Bulganin-Khrushchev visit to London later in the month. Their talks with the British may give us some indication of Soviet intentions.

I'll be back in a moment with the Footnote to the Days News, but first..

Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

COLLINGWOOD: A new complication has arisen for Secretary General Hammarkkjold in his mission to the middle east. Tomorrow the holy month of Ramadan begins. During this month, in the Moslem world, no one may eat from sunrise to sunset. Government employees work shorter hours and everyone stays up late at night. A luncheon meeting such as Hammarskjold had today with Premier Nasser will be impossible, unless, of course, the have a bight about 2AM. This is C.C. See you tomorrow.

Collingwood for Murrow Thurs., April 12, 1956

Good evening:

President Eisenhower was revealed today to have sent personal messages to the heads of the Israeli and Egyptian governments, appealing for their cooperation with United Nations Secretary General Hammarskjold in his mission to reduce tension in the Middle East. White House News Secretary Hagerty made this known in talking to reporters at Augusta, Georgia this afternoon. Hagerty said the President sent these messages to Prime Minister Ben Gurion of Israel and Premier Nasser of Egypt on Monday of this week. Along with the messages, Mr. Eisenhower sent the text of the statement he released later that day, declaring that the United States would, within constitutional means, oppose any aggression in the Middle East. Hammarskjold reported to the Security Council today on what he has accomplished so far on his mission. He said both Israel and Egypt had promised not to attack, in compliance with Article Two of the armistice agreement, but that both countries reserved the right to act in self-defense. Israel already has accused Egypt of breaking the agreement. In a letter to Hammarskjold... who conferred with Egyptian leaders again today in Cairo... Ben Gurion cited the invasion of Israeli air space by Egyptian planes and the series of attacks last night in which four Israeli civilians, including three school children, were killed by Arab guerrillas. Ben Gurion asked Hammarskjold to ascertain whether orders actually had been issued to the Egyptian forces to avoid hostilities. In the air incident, two Israeli planes engaged in a dogfight with Egyptian aircraft over Israeli territory. The Israeli planes were outmoded [redacted] jets. According to the Israeli communique, there were four Egyptian planes---two Vampire jets and two of the old piston-engine type. One of the Egyptian jets was shot down and the pilot taken prisoner. Both sides agree on that. But the Egyptians say they also shot down an Israeli plane, and that the Israeli formation had been flying over the Egyptian frontier. In any case, it was the first air battle in the troubled area in more than seven months.

There were other accusations today. Egypt accused Israel of firing on an outpost in the Gaza Strip, and wounding an Egyptian soldier.

—)

Egypt says the outpost did not return the fire. And Jordan charged that three Israeli jets violated the Jordanian frontier. Josdan said the jets chased an Arab passenger plane flying to Cairo... but that no shots were fired.

In Washington, the Navy says amphibious forces of the United States Sixth Fleet will visit the Mediterranean island of Crete early next month. A reinforced battalion of Marines is attached to the Sixth Fleet. And the Navy says this may account for the erroneous report that Marines were going to be based on Crete. Navy and Marine forces, it says, have visited and trained on Crete "many times in the past."

The powerful Arab League has set up a committee to plan a political and economic boycott of France. The boycott would be a means of pressuring France into recognition of what the Arab League calls "the right of the Algerian people to self-determination."

Scattered fighting between French and rebel forces continued throughout Algeria today, despite the start of Ramadan, the Moslem month of fasting. More than a hundred lives are reported to have been lost in the past 48 hours. And mobilization notices for French reservists in the 20-to-24-year-old age groups went up today all over France.

On Cyprus, two masked gunmen assassinated a Greek Cypriot suspected of collaboration with the British authorities. The gunmen escaped.

A member of the Atomic Energy Commission said today that the United States should stop testing huge hydrogen bombs... without waiting for establishment of an international control agency. Thomas E. Murray made the statement while testifying before a special Senate committee looking into disarmament problems. For both moral and practical reasons, Murray said he believes a limit should be placed on the size and number of H-bombs in the American arsenal. He said he wasn't proposing a reduction in armaments, just a shift in emphasis. He thinks we should keep on testing... and stockpiling... smaller nuclear devices.

The Pentagon announced today that the Army will draft 12-thousand men in June. That's the same quota as was announced last month for May.

Paul Hoffman, the former head of the Economic Cooperation Administration, said today that we must wage peace "with imagination, boldness and dedication," if we are to meet [redacted] Russia's new economic challenge. He estimated that the cost of "waging peace" might run, during the next five years, in the neighborhood of 200-billion dollars. And he suggested that a committee of experts be appointed to develop an expanded [redacted] foreign aid program.

Three big farm organizations disagreed today as to whether President Eisenhower should veto the farm bill passed last night by Congress. The National Farmers Union and the National Grange contended the measure calling for high, rigid price supports would [redacted] boost farmers' income, and that if it's vetoed, there would be no hope of other legislation this year. The American Farm Bureau Federation opposes the measure. It's enactment, it says, "would mean a return to the discredited programs that contributed to much of the present glutted market situation."

In Augusta, White House Secretary Hagerty said today the President still doesn't think "the bill meets the test of a good bill," but that Mr. Eisenhower probably won't decide whether to sign it until he returns to Washington next week. A reporter asked Hagerty for comment on former President Truman's statement last night, in a speech in Des Moines, that Mr. Eisenhower is a "do-nothing" President. Hagerty replied tartly: "I don't believe Mr. Truman, by his own standards, can recognize accomplishment when he sees it." Incidentally, both Adlai Stevenson and Senator Kefauver were campaigning in Florida today, getting ready for the primary there on May 29th, and they agreed on one thing---they both said the President should sign the farm bill, whether he likes it or not. Secy of Agri Benson has an appointment with Mr. Eisenhower on Saturday, and doubtless the matter of a possible veto will be discussed.

Today... in Congress... the House passed a 2-billion-dollar military construction bill. Much of the money would be used to build facilities for developing ballistic missiles and an atom-power airplane. The measure now goes to the Senate.

For the fifth time in a year, the Federal Reserve Board has boosted the lending rates of SOME OF its member banks. Today, the Federal Reserve Board approved an increase in [redacted] rates for 11 of the 12 federal reserve banks in the country. Only the Chicago reserve district is unaffected due, perhaps, to the fact that there was no meeting OF BANK DIRECTORS there today. The amount of increase varied between a quarter and one-half a [redacted] percentage point. The action is designed to serve as a brake against inflation.

Charles Collingwood
12 April 7:45 PM

THINK

Now, a few words about politics. First, the Illinois primary. The only national candidate who gained from it was Adlai Stevenson. But it was a painless primary, for no one got hurt either. President Eisenhower's position is, at this stage impregnable and if his total was only narrowly above that of Mr. Stevenson, that doesn't worry Republican strategists who can find plenty of good and sufficient reasons for it. Moreover, the Administration can find actual comfort in the fact that the farm revolt was not nearly as apparent in Illinois as it had been in Minnesota and Wisconsin... As for Senator Kefauver, even though his write-in vote fell far short of what his more enthusiastic backers had hoped for, he hadn't really exerted himself in Illinois and the result has not really sullied his vote-getting reputation. But for Mr. Stevenson the result was very important. His big vote in his home state kept his campaign very much alive and undoubtedly improved his chances in the Florida primary for which he is now campaigning even though it is more than a month away.

The next primary is next Tuesday's in New Jersey. Here Senator Kefauver, as in Illinois and elsewhere, has managed to manuevre himself into the happy position where he can't lose, but does stand a chance to gain a good deal. If his slate of delegates should win out over the official and officially neutral slate headed by Governor Meyner then he has scored another victory. If it should lose, well, Stevenson wasn't ~~officially~~ even entered and it doesn't make much difference. Of such calculations are shrewd political gambles made.

On another aspect of politics, everyone in Washington is making book on whether the President will veto the farm bill. The farm bill comes under politics because even its most enthusiastic proponents would hardly call it an objective, long range attack on the fundamentals of the farm problem. Both the administration and the administration's opponents introduced elements into the bill designed to appease various agricultural interests. Since the opponents of the administration position were stronger, they got more into the bill than did the administration.

Nevertheless, the odds quoted on whether or not the president will veto are about 6 to 5 and pick em. The reasons why he might veto it are obvious. There are a lot of things in the bill he and his Secretary of Agriculture fought against. On the other hand, there are things like the soil bank plan they do want.... Moreover, it has doubtless not escaped the attention of the administration that this is an election year and bills with something for everybody acquire special merit in election years.... Particularly farm bills. For the attitude of farmers has a strong influence on American politics, probably out of proportion to the actual number of farm votes.

This American solicitude for the farmer goes very deep and goes back a long way. Professor D.W. Brogan, an eminent British observer of the American scene, has remarked that the special thing about the influence of American farmers on politics is that they are sacred. This goes back a long way. The Founders of the Republic thought of the farmer as the backbone of the state. Jefferson dreamed of a republic of virtuous husbandmen. And ever since it has been a general assumption that special virtue resided in people devoted to agriculture. This has shown itself in our literature, our movies, and above all in our politics. Even though the log cabin has passed from the scene as the approved place of birth for a political candidate, it is still regarded as helpful if a candidate has some rural background, however vague, and can pose convincingly in rural garb.

The farmers, it should be ~~quit~~ said, are quite aware of the comic aspects of corproation lawyers and city politicians decking themselves out in the uniform of a working farmer, but as long as it registers their own real and abiding influence, they do not greatly complain.

For the fact is that from the time the first man ~~tilled~~ cultivated the first plot, a farmer's lot has been hard and his problems complex. He can be pardoned for wanting all the help he can get.

I'LL BE BACK IN A MOMENT WITH A FOOTNOTE TO THE DAYS NEWS BUT FIRST _____.

FOOTNOTE

All 375 acres of the Principality of Monaco were abustle today as Grace Kelly arrived for her wedding next week. It is reported that after the ~~wex~~ excitement of the welcoming ceremonies she wept a little in her room, but soon recovered her~~m~~ high spirits. A small protocol problem arose. Ex-King Otto of Albania complained he hadn't been invited. The ex-King now runs a merry-go-round in Hamburg, Germany.

THIS IS C.C.... SEE YOU TOMORROW

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

THURSDAY, APRIL 12, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

CHARLES COLLINGWOOD REPORTING:

Good Evening:

President Eisenhower was revealed today to have sent personal messages to the heads of the Israeli and Egyptian governments, appealing for their cooperation with United Nations Secretary General Hammarskjold in his mission to reduce tension in the Middle East. White House News Secretary Hagerty made this known in talking to reporters at Augusta, Georgia this afternoon. Hagerty said the President sent these massages to Prime Minister Ben Gurion. of Israel and Premier Nasser of Egypt on Monday of this week. Along with the messages, Mr. Eisenhower sent the text of the statement he released later that day, declaring that the United States would, within constitutional means, oppose any aggression in the Middle East. Hammarskjold reported to the Security Council today on what he was accomplished so far in his mission. He said both Israel and Egypt had promised not to attack, in compliance with Article Two of the armistice agreement, but that both countries reserved the right to act in self- defense. Israel already has accused Egypt of breaking the agreement. In a letter to Hammarskjold.. who conferred with Egyptian leaders again today in Cairo.. Ben Gurion cited the invasion of Israel air space by Egyptian planes and the series of attacks last night in which four Israeli civilians, including three school children, were killed by Arab guerillas. Ben Gurion asked Hammaraskold to ascertain whether orders actually had been issued to the Egyptian forces to avoid hostilities. In the air incident, two Israeli planes engaged in a dogfight with Egyptian air craft over Israeli territory. The Israeli planes were outmoded jets. According to the Israeli communique, there were four Egyptian planes -- two Vampire jets and two of the old piston - enging type. One of the Egyptian jets was shot down and the pilot taken prisoner. Both sides agree on that. But the Egyptian say they also shot down an Israeli plane, and that the Israeli formation had been flying over the Egyptian frontier. In any case, it was the first air battle in the troubled area in more than seven months.

There were other accusations today. Egypt accused Israel of firing on an outpost on the Gaza Strip, and wounding an Egyptian soldier. Egypt says the outpost did not return the fire. And Jordan charged that three Israeli jets violated the Jordanian frontier. Jordan said the jets chased an Arab passenger plane flying to Cairo..but that no shots were fired.

In Washington, the Navy says amphibious forces of the United States Sixth Fleet will visit the Meditreraneann island of Crete early next month. A reinforced battalion of Marines is attached to the Sixth Fleet. And the Navy says this may account for the erronious report that Marines were going to be based on Crete. Navy and Marine forces, it says, have visited and trained on Crete "many times in the past."

The powerful Arab League has set up a committee to plan a political and economic boycott of France. The boycott would be a means of pressuring France into recognition of what the Arab League calls the" the right of the Algerian people to self-determination."

Scattered fighting between French and rebel forces continued throughout Algeria today, despite the start of Ramadan, the Moslem month of fasting. More tha a hundred lives are reported to have been oost in the past 48 hours. And mobilization notices for French reservists in the 20-to-24 year-old age groups went up today all over France.

On Cyprus, two masked gunmen assassinated a Greek Cypriot, suspected of collaboration with the British authroities. The gunmen escaped .

A member of the Atomic Energy Commission said today that the United States should stop testing huge hydrogen bombs without waiting for establishment of an international control agency. Thomas E. Murray made the statement while testifying before a special Senate Committee looking into disarmament problems. For both moral and practical reasons, Murray said he believes a limit should be placed on the size and number of H-bombs in the American arsenal. He said he wasn't proposing a reduction in armaments, just a shift in empahsis. He thinks we should keep on testing..and stockpiling smaller nuclear devices.

The Pentagon announced today that the Army will draft 12-thousand men in June. That's the same quota as was announced last month for May.

Paul Hoffman, the former head of the Economic Cooperation Administration, said today that we must wage peace "with imagination, boldness and dedication if we are to meet Russia's new economic challenge. He estimated that the cost of "waging peace" might run, during the next five years, in the neighborhood of 200-billion dollars. And he suggested that a committee of experts be appointed to develop an expanded foreign aid program.

Three big farm organizations disagreed today as to whether President Eisenhower should veto the rarm bill passed last night by Congress. The National Farmers Union and the National Grange contended the measure calling for high, rigid price supports would boost farmers' income, and that it it's vetoes, there would be no hope of other legislation this year. The American Farm Bureau Federation opposes the measure. It's enactment, it says, "would mean a return to the discredited programs that contributed to much of the present glutted market situation." In Augusta, White House Secretary Hagerty said today the President still doesn't think "the bill meets the test of a good bill", but that Mr. Eisenhower probably won't decide whether to sign it until he returns to Washington next week. A reporter asked Hagerty for comm nt on former President Truman's statement last night in a speech in Des Moines that Mr. Eisenhower is a "do - nothing" President. Hagerty replied tartly: "I don't believe Mr. Truman by his own standards, can recognize accomplishment when he sees it. Incidentally both Adlai Stevenson and Senator Kefauver were campaigning in Florida today, getting ready for the primary there on May 29th, and they agreed on one thing--they both said the President should sign the farm bill, whether he likes it or not. Secretary of Agriculture Benson has an appointment with Mr. Eisen - e hower on Saturday, an doubtless the matter of possible veto will be discussed.

Today ...in Congress.. the House passed a 2-billion dollar military construction bill. Much of the money would be used to build facilities for developing ballistic missiles and an atom powe. air plane. The measure now goes to the Senate.

For the fifth time in a year, the Federal Reserve Board has boosted the lending rates of ome of its member banks. Today, the Federal Reserve Board approved an increase in rates for 11 of the 12 federal reserve banks in the country. Only the Chicago reserve district is unaffected due, perhaps, to the fact that there was no meeting of bank directors there today. The amount of increase varied between a quarter and one-half a percentage point. The action is designed to serve as a break against inflation.

Now, a few words about politics. First, the Illinois primary. The only national candidate who gained from it was Adlai Stevenson. But it was a painless primary, for no one got hurt either. President Eisenhower's position is, at this stage impregnable and if his total was only narrowly above that of Mr. Stevenson that doesn't worry Republican strategists who can find plenty of good and sufficient reasons for it. Moreover, the Administration can find actual comfort in the fact that the farm revolt was not nearly as apparent in Illioois as it had been in Minnesota and isconsin..as for Senator Kefauver, even though his write-in vote fell far short of what his more enthusiastic backers had hoped for, he didn't really exerted himself in Illioois and the result has not really sullies his vote-getting reputation. But for Mr. Stevenson the result is very important. His big vote in his home state kept his compaign very much alive and undoubtedly improved his chances in the Florida primary for which he is now campaigning even though it is more than a month away.

The next primary is next Tuesday's in New Jersey. Here Senator Kefauver as in Illinois and elsewhere, has managed to maneuvere himself into the happy position where he can't lose, but does stand a chance to gain a good deal. If his slate of delegates whould win out over the official and officially neautral slate headed by Governor Meyner then he has scored another victory. If it should lose, well, Stevenson wasn't even entered and it doesn't make much difference. Of such calculationa are shrewd political gambles made.

On another aspect of politics, everyone in Washington is making book on whether the President will veto the farm bill. The farm bill comes under politics because even its most enthusiastic proponents would hardly call it an objective, long range attack on the fundamentals of the farm problem. Both the administration and the administration's opponents introduced elememts into the bill designed to appease various agrigultural interests. Since the opponents of the administration position were stronger, they got more into the bill than did the Administration.

Nevertheless, the odds quoted on whether or not the president will veto are about 6 to 5 and pick em. The reasons why he might veto it are obvious. There are a lot of things in the bill he and his Secretary of Agriculture fought against. On the other hand, there are things like the soil bank plan they do want. Moreover, it has doubtless not escaped the attention of the administration that this is an election year and bills with something for everybody acquire a special merit in election years. Particularly farm bills. For the attitude of farmers has a strong influence of American politics, probably out of proportion to the actual number of farm votes.

This American solicitude for the farmer goes very deep and goes back a long way. Professor D.W. Brogan, an eminent British observer of the American scene, has remarked that the special thing about the influence of American farmers on politics is that they are sacred. This goes back a long way. The Founders of the Republic thought of a farmer as the backbone of the state. Jefferson dreamed of a republic of virtuous husbandmen. And ever since it has been a general assumption that special virtue resided in people devoted to agriculture. This has shown itself in our literature, our movies, and above all in our politics. Even though the log cabin has passed from the scene as the approved place of birth for a political candidate, it is still regarded as helpful if a candidate has some rural background, however vague, and can pose convincingly in rural garb.

The farmers, it should be said, are quite aware of the comic aspects of corporation lawyers and city politicians decking themselves out in the uniform of a working farmer, but as long as it registers their own real and abiding influence, they do not greatly complain.

For the fact is that from the time the first man cultivated the first plot, a farmer's lot has been hard and his problems complex. He can be pardoned for wanting all the help he can get.

I'll be back in a moment with a Footnote to the Days News. But first here is our announcer.

ANNOUNCER - COMMERCIAL

COLLINGWOOD: All 375 acres of the Principality of Monaco were abustle today as Grace Kelly arrived for her wedding next week. It is reported that after the excitement of the welcoming ceremonies she wept a little in her room, but soon recovered her high spirits. A small protocol problem arose. Ex-King Otto of Albania complained he hadn't been invited. The ex-King now runs a merry-go-round in Hamburg, Germany.

This is Charles Collingwood. See you tomorrow.

CBS RADIO DIVISION

CHARLES COLLINGWOOD

Friday, April 13, 1956
7:45-8:00 P.M.

ANNC'R: (C O M M E R C I A L)

And now, sitting in for EDWARD R. MURROW, here is Charles Collingwood.

COLLINGWOOD: Good evening!

President Eisenhower announced the retirement today of General Alfred M. Gruenther as Supreme Commander of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. The President has nominated General Lauris Norstad, Gruenther's Air Deputy, to succeed General Gruenther. And the NATO Council in Paris has already approved the nomination. Gruenther is not just resigning as commander of NATO forces; he is resigning from the Army as well. In a letter to Gruenther, President Eisenhower said his decision to retire will be received with great disappointment by our European allies and by the American people. "All appreciate the magnificent contribution you have made." The White House announcement said General Gruenther was retiring for personal reasons. At a news conference in Paris this afternoon, Gruenther said he was leaving his NATO assignment to make way for younger men and newer ideas. Gruenther is 57, Norstad is 48. Gruenther has been NATO commander since 1953, and he said today he thought three years is about the maximum length of time for effective command. After that, he said, there's danger of stagnation. He told his news conference there is no ulterior motive behind his resignation, and he said: "I can't hide behind the excuse of health. I've played tennis three times this week, and I intend to win another match tomorrow."

It was relatively quiet today on the frontiers of Israel and the Arab States, altho Israel accused Jordan of breaking a lull in the border fighting by firing on Israelis across the Jerusalem demarcation line and in two other places on the frontier.

In Cairo, United Nations Secretary General Hammarskjold made an unscheduled call on the Egyptian Foreign Minister and stayed an hour and a half. A U.N. spokesman said the talks aimed at lessening tensions are making progress. Hammarskjold is revealed to have sent a letter to Israeli Prime Minister Ben Gurion, asking whether Israel has issued orders to its troops to refrain from hostile acts. Hammarskjold announced yesterday that both Israel and Egypt had promised not to launch an attack. Ben Gurion asked Hammarskjold if Egypt had actually ordered its forces not to engage in hostilities. The Secretary General replied today that he regarded the word of any government in such negotiations as binding and noted that Israel had not said whether orders to the same effect had been issued to its forces.

In New York today about twenty youths invaded the Egyptian Consulate and chanted and prayed for almost an hour. The demonstrators said they were members of a Zionist youth organization and that they were conducting a memorial service for the three school children killed by Arab tommy-gunners near Tel Aviv on Wednesday. An Egyptian attaché called police, but there were no arrests. In Jerusalem an Israeli spokesman said a thirteen-year-old boy injured in the guerrilla attack Wednesday died today of his wounds. A x rabbi also was killed in the incident.

Secretary of State Dulles flew to New York today on personal business, but he also took the opportunity to talk to Henry Cabot Lodge, our ambassador at the U.N. Lodge met Dulles at the airport, and they had a talk lasting more than an hour. Mr. Dulles declined to say whether they had discussed the Middle East situation. He said he had heard that a special Security Council meeting to deal with the crisis might be held in Rome.

A familiar voice was heard in London today. Sir Winston Churchill, back from a vacation in the south of France, told a Conservative party rally, "I think we can be perfectly sure the United States as well as the United Kingdom will intervene to prevent aggression by one side or the other." Churchill added that he hoped the need for intervention in the Middle East would never arise.

In Moscow today the Communist party newspaper Pravda accused the United States of trying to find a pretext for military intervention in the Middle East. Pravda charged that this country, with Britain, wants to control the oil resources of the area by perpetuating what the paper called "the colonial order."

French Premier Mollet has made a new appeal for peace in Algeria. He promised free elections within three months after order is restored and authorized French military authorities to make local contacts with rebel forces in Algeria for a cease-fire. This is interpreted as a concession to former Premier Mendes-France, who has been urging a negotiated settlement. But Mollet reiterated today that any solution would have to come within framework of the indissoluble links between Algeria and France - no change from the position that Algeria politically is an integral part of France.

West Germany served notice today that it will soon make a direct bid to Russia on the subject of German unity. West Germany feels that the United States and other Western powers are putting disarmament ahead of German reunification, and the West German Foreign Minister told a news conference today that his government would very soon take the initiative thru its ambassador in Moscow.

India has again proposed that its dispute with Pakistan over Kashmir be settled on the basis of the cease-fire line existing between the two countries. Prime Minister Nehru said today that, with slight modifications, that is as far as India is prepared to go.

Will President Eisenhower veto the farm bill? White House News Secretary Hagerty refused to comment today on persistent reports that Mr. Eisenhower has decided to veto the measure because it calls for restoration of high rigid supports. In about an hour, Secretary of Agriculture Benson is due to arrive in Augusta for a conference with the President. Tomorrow, Hagerty says, it's quite probable that in the course of the conference Mr. Eisenhower will decide whether to make a radio and television report to the people next Thursday nite. But Hagerty warned that the President may go on the air, whichever decision he makes, regardless of whether he decides to sign the farm bill or veto it. The United Press reports tonite that fifteen Republican Senators, mostly from the Middle West, are trying to get Mr. Eisenhower to hold up his decision until they can give him their views. These are the Republican Senators from farm states who voted for the measure, despite Administration disapproval. The United Press says they want a chance to state their case. The Democrats meanwhile are saying that if Mr. Eisenhower vetoes the bill, he will have to suffer the political consequences. Chairman Ellender of the Senate Agriculture Committee predicts that in that case the farmers will blame the President and not Secretary Benson for their plight.

Next week is going to see one of the most unusual state visits in modern history - the ten-day stay of Soviet Premier Bulganin and Communist boss Khrushchev in Great Britain. It's a novelty in more ways than one. Uusually foreign statesmen make special visits like this when preparatory consultations have been favorable and a few gaps remain that can only be closed by the top men themselves sitting down together. And then there's another kind of visit - the one undertaken in the height of a great crisis, for which preparatory consultation has not been possible and the top men must, if possible, improvise a settlement. They don't always manage to avert the dangers that bring them together. Churchill's visit to Paris just before the collapse of France early in the last war was one that failed. But this Soviet visit to Britain doesn't fit into either of these classifications. The Soviet leaders, with the breezy informality of the Kremlin's new posture, virtually invited themselves to Britain. The British couldn't very well say "please don't come", and they thought it might be a good occasion to do what all the Western leaders wanted to do, to find out just how much Soviet policy has changed in substance as well as in manners. But the British even then realized that what Soviet policy wanted more than anything else was to break up the Western alliance. And now they don't like being in a position where any courtesy they show their visitors may be misinterpreted by their allies as a form of flirtation. If they felt that way when the visit was first scheduled, they feel it all the more today, for this is a season of pretty well advertised difference between Washington and London over the way to deal with the Middle East crisis. British opinion is more critical than usual of the United States now. There's nothing abnormal in this. It's inherent in an alliance of free nations. But having these seasons of disagreement in private is one thing. It becomes quite different when America's greatest adversaries drop in for a call.

The Soviet leaders have gone out of their way to deny that they want to undermine British relations with the United States, but when Malenkov during his recent stay in England so emphatically denied it, the London Economist remarked that he'd given the game away all too clearly. It still is the game, even tho it can't be played by openly avowing it. The Soviet leaders, to succeed, must build up good-will not only in Britain but in France and Germany, too. They must appeal to those in Britain and France who dislike both the United States and Germany and to those in Germany who want reunification at any price. Above all, they must be effusive and pleasant. They must try to make skeptical Westerners think that peaceful coexistence has become a safe kind of life for them, one that offers only advantages and no penalties, and they must give the impression that it's possible now because conditions in the Soviet Union that formerly made it impossible have changed.

It's significant that the Kremlin complained the other day that the British plans for the visit would keep them from having enough direct contact with the British people. That suggested that they hoped more from the British people than from the Eden government. It also is significant that the Eden government responded by saying the visit was not to be a good-will parade but a serious meeting for political discussion. The topics of this serious discussion have not been officially identified, but it goes without saying that the chief topic should be the crisis in the Middle East. The Soviet Union is now presented with the opportunity of joining the Western powers as sponsor of peace and of peaceful negotiations. This is the kind of opening Sir Anthony Eden may welcome. He's adroit at negotiating in an emergency - and this is an emergency.

There are, to be sure, other subjects for discussion. One is increased trade, where Soviet promises will be big and tempting; one is the jamming of British broadcasts, the misrepresentation of British life in Soviet textbooks and newspapers. And if the final communique registers no successes in these lesser fields, the visit will have been an acknowledged failure. But the real test of its success may not be mentioned in the communique at all. The real test is whether the visit has made some progress toward a peaceful settlement in the Middle East.

I'll be back in a minute with a footnote to the day's news. But, first, Bob Dixon.

DIXON: (C O M M E R C I A L)

That's my word for today. And here's Charles Collingwood with his footnote to the day's news.

COLLINGWOOD: This broadcast is originating tonite from Station WSBT in South Bend, Indiana - and nicer people you'd never hope to meet. WSBT is dedicating its elegant new Broadcast Center. As part of the ceremonies this correspondent is going to moderate a discussion tonite on education, involving no less than thirteen presidents of Indiana colleges and universities. With that number of college presidents on this particular day, we may set back education a generation.

This is Charles Collingwood. Ed Murrow will be back on Monday.

(C O M M E R C I A L)

ANNC'R: Listen to Murrow on Monday.

This is the CBS RADIO NETWORK.

Ediphone trans./E. Scheiner

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

FRIDAY, APRIL 13, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

CHARLES COLLINGWOOD REPORTING

Good Evening:

President Eisenhower announced the retirement today of General Alfred M. Gruenther as Supreme Commander of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. The President has nominated General Lauris Norstad, Gurenther's Air Deputy, to succeed General Gruenther. And the NATO Council in Paris has already approved the nomination. Gruenther is not just resigning as commander of NATO forces; he is resigning from the Army as well. In a letter to Gruenther, President Eisenhower said his decision to retire will be received with great disappointment by our European allies and by the American people. "All appreciate the magnificent contribution you have made." The White House announcement said General Gruenther was retiring for personal reasons. At a news conference in Paris this afternoon, Gruenther said he was leaving his NATO assignment to make way for younger men and newer ideas. Gruenther is 57, Norstad is 48. Gruenther has been NATO commander since 1953, and he said today he thought three years is about the maximum length of time for effective command. After that, he said, there's danger of stagnation. He told his news conference there is no ulterior motive behind his resignation, and he said: "I can't hide behind the excuse of health. I've played tennis three times this week, and I intend to win another match tomorrow."

It was relatively quiet today on the frontiers of Israel and the Arab states, although Israel accused Jordan of breaking a lull in the border fighting by firing on Israelis across the Jerusalem demaration line and in two other places on the frontier.

In Cairo, United Nations Secretary General Hammaraskjold made an unscheduled call on the Egyptian Foreign Minister and stayed an hour and a half. A U.N. spokesman said the talks aimed at lessening tensions are making progress. Hammarskjold is revealed to have sent a letter to Israeli Prime Minister Ben Gurion, asking whether Israel has issued orders to its troops to refrain from hostile acts. Hammarskjold announced yesterday that both Israel and Egypt had promised not to launch an attack. Ben Gurion asked Hammarskjold if Egypt had actually ordered its forces not to engage in hostilities. The Secretary General replied today he regarded the word of any government in such negotiations as binding and noted that Israel had not said whether orders to the same effect had been issued to its forces.

In New York today about twenty youths invaded the Egyptian Consulate and chanted and prayed for almost an hour. The demonstrators said they were members of a Zionist youth organization and they were conducting a memorial service for the three school children killed by Arab tommy-gunners near Tel Aviv on Wednesday. An Egyptian attache called the police, but there were no arrests. In Jersualem an Israeli spokesman said a thirteen-year-old-boy injured in the guerrilla attack Wednesday died today of his wounds. A rabbi also was killed in the incident.

Secretary of State Dulles flew to New York today on personal business, but he also took the opportunity to talk to Henry Cabot Lodge, our ambassador at the U.N.. Lodge met Dulles at the airport, and they had a talk lasting more than an hour. Mr. Dulles declined to say whether they discussed the Middle East situation. He said he had heard that a special Security Council meeting to deal with the crisis might be held in Rome.

A familiar voice was heard in London today. Sir Winston Chruchell, back from a vacation in the south of France, told a Conservative party rally, "I think we can be perfectly sure the United States as well as the United Kingdom will intervene to prevent aggression by one side or the other." Churchill added that he hoped the need for intervention in the Middle East would never arise.

In Moscow today the Communist party newspaper Pravda accused the United States of trying to find a pretext for military intervention in the Middle East. Pravda charged that this country, with Britain, wants to control the oil resources of the area by perpetuating what the paper called "the colonial order."

French Premier Mollet has made a new appeal for peace in Algeria. He promised free elections within three months after order is restored and authorized French military authorities to make local contacts with rebel forces in Algeria for a cease - fire. This is interpreted as a concession to former Premier Mendes - France, who has been urging a negotiated settlement. But Mollet reiterated today that any solution would have to come within framework of the indissoluble lines between Algeria and France - no change from the position that Algeria politically is an integral part of France.

West Germany served notice today that it will soon make a direct bid to Russia on the subject of German unity. West Germany feels that the United States and other Western powers are putting disarmament ahead of German reunification, and the West German Foreign Minister told a news conference today that his Government would very soon take the initiative through its ambassador in Moscow.

India has again proposed that its dispute with Pakistan over Kashmir be settled on the basis of the cease - fire line existing between the two countries. Prime Minister Nehru said today that, with slight modifications, that is as far as India is prepared to go.

Will President Eisenhower veto the farm bill? White House News Secretary Hagerty refused to comment today on persistent reports that Mr. Eisenhower has decided to veto the measure because it calls for restoration of high rigid supports. In about an hour, Secretary of Agriculture Benson is due to arrive in Augusta for a conference with the President. Tomorrow, Hagerty says, it's quite probable that in the course of the conference Mr. Eisenhower will decide whether to make a radio and television report to the people next Thursday night. But Hagerty warned that the President may go on the air, whichever decision he makes, regardless of whether he decides to sign the farm bill or veto it. The United Press reports tonight that fifteen Republican Senators, mostly from the Middle West, are trying to get Mr. Eisenhower to hold up his decision until they can give him their views. There are the Republican Senators from farm states who voted for the measure, despite Administration disapproval. The United Press says they want a chance to state their case. The Democrats meanwhile are saying that if Mr. Eisenhower vetoes the bill, he will have to suffer the political consequences. Chairman Ellender of the Senate Agriculture Committee predicts that in that case the farmers will blame the President and not Secretary Benson for their plight.

Next week is going to see one of the most unusual state visits in modern history -- the ten - day stay of Soviet Premier Bulganin and Communist boss Khurshchev in Great Britain. It's a novelty in more ways than one. Usually foreign statesmen make special visits like this when preparatory consultations have been favorable and a few gaps remain that can only be closed by the top ment themselves sitting down together. And then there's another kind of visit - the one undertaken in the hieght of a great crisis, for which preparatory consultations has not been possible and the top men must, if possible, improvise a settlement. They don't always manage to avert the dangers that bring them together. Churchill's visit to Paris just before the collapse of France early in the last war was one that failed. But this Soviet visit to Britain doesn't fit into either of these classifications. The Soviet leaders, with the breezy informality of the Kremlin's new posture, virtually invited themselves to Britain. The British couldn't very well say "please don't come", and they thought it might be a good occasion to do what all the Western leaders wanted to do, to find out just how much Soviet policy has changed in substance as well as in manners. But the British even then realized that what Soviet policy wanted more than anything else was to break up the Western alliance. And now they don't like being in a position where any courtesy they show their visitors may be misinterpreted by their allies as a form of flirtation. If they felt that way when the visit was first scheduled, they feel it all the more today, for this is a season of pretty well advertised difference between Washington and London over the way to deal with the Middle East crisis. British opinion is more critical than usual of the United States now. There's nothing abnormal in this. It's inherent in al alliance of free antions. But having these seasons of disagreement in private is one thing. It becomes quite different when America's greatest adversaries drop in for a call.

The Soviet leaders have gone out of their way to deny that they want to undermine British relations with the United States, but when Malenkov during his recent stay in England so emphatically denied it, the London Economist remarked that he's given the game away all too clearly, It still is the game, even though it can't be played by openly avowing it. The Soviet leaders, to succeed, must build up good-will not only in Britain but in France and Germany too. They must appeal to those in Britain and France who dislike both the United States and Germany and to those in Germany who want reunification at any price. Above all, they must be effusive and pleasant. They must try to make skeptical Westerners think that peaceful coexistence has become a safe kind of life for them, one that offers only advantages and no penalties, and they must give the impression that its possible now because conditions in the Soviet Union that formerly made it impossible have changed.

It's significant that the Kremlin complained the other day that British plans for the visit would keep them from having enough direct contact with the British people. That suggested that they hoped more from the British people then from the Eden government. It also is significant that the Eden government responded by saying the visit was not to be a good-will parade but a serious meeting for political discussion. The topics of this serious discussion have not been officially identified, but it goes without saying that the chief topic should be that crisis in the Middle East. The Soviet Union is now presented with the opportunity of joining the Western powers as sponsor of peace and of peaceful negotiations. This is the kind of opening Sir Anthony Eden may welcome. He's adroit at negotiating in an emergency -- and this is an emergency.

There are, to be sure, other subjects for discussion. One is increased trade, where Soviet promises will be big and tempting; one is the jamming of British broadcasts, the misrepresentation of British life in Soviet textbooks and newspapers. And if the final communique registers no successes in these lesser fields, the visit will have been an acknowledged failure. But the real test of its success may not be mentioned in the communique at all. The real test is whether the visit has made some progress toward a peaceful settlement in the Middle East.

I'll be back in a minute with a footnote to the day's news. But first, Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

COLLINGWOOD: This broadcast is originating tonight from Station WSBT in South Bend, Indiana - and nicer people you'd never hope to meet. WSBT is dedicating its elegant new Broadcast Center. As part of the ceremonies this correspondent is going to moderate a discussion tonight on education, involving no less than thirteen presidents of Indiana colleges and universities. With that number of college presidents on this particular day, we may set back education a generation.

This is Charles Collingwood. Ed Murrow will be back on Monday.

Edward R. Murrow Mon., April 16, 1956

This is the news:

President Eisenhower vetoed the farm bill today. He called the measure "self-defeating"... said it would do harm to every agricultural region of the country and damage the interests of consumers. "Thus," he said, "it fails to meet the test of being good for the farmers and fair to all the people." The measure included the soil bank plan requested by the Administration, but it also called for supports pegged at 90 percent of parity. Mr. Eisenhower said a return to high rigid supports would stimulate production at a time when surpluses already present a serious problem. "Markets would be further destroyed," he said, "instead of expanded." The President said the Administration will take prompt executive action to improve farm income. Price supports on basic crops, he said, will be raised to at least eighty-two and one-half percent of parity. Corn, which is now supported at 81 percent of parity, would be raised to 86 percent. Wheat, now supported at 76, would be raised to 84. The President promised that prices of perishable farm commodities will be bolstered with Agriculture Department funds, and that the price support of manufacturing milk (milk used in making such products as ice cream, butter and cheese) will be raised 10 cents a hundredweight, to 3 dollars and 25 cents. ~~The President, in his message, also asked Congress to pass a separate soil bank bill "as promptly as possible."~~ Mr. Eisenhower will explain his veto action in a broadcast over most of these radio stations at 10 o'clock tonight, Eastern Time.

~~The veto message provoked immediate debate today on the Senate floor. Chairman Ellender of the Agriculture Committee charged that Mr. Eisenhower was "too busily engaged in playing golf in Augusta" to know what was in the measure. Republican Leader Knowland said, "I do not believe anyone in the country believes that President Eisenhower desires that farm income go down."~~ The House will vote on the question of overriding the veto on Wednesday. Two-thirds majorities in both houses are necessary to override. And the consensus on Capitol Hill is that the bill is dead. (I should like to discuss this subject further in a few minutes).

A Senate subcommittee began hearings today on the state of American air power. The subcommittee is headed by Senator Symington, who was secretary of the Air Force in the Truman Administration. He and other Democratic senators have charged the present administration with allowing Russia to get ahead of the United States in the field of long-range jet bombers and intercontinental ballistic missiles. The first witness... General Walter Bedell Smith... said Russia has been "steadily closing the gap" on our military supremacy since the end of World War Two. The former ambassador to Moscow said that in the weapons field, the Russians can keep pace with the United States "in those areas in which they wish to concentrate." General Omar Bradley, former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, warned that the first attack in another global war might well be directed against the United States. "Unless we can powerfully and decisively retaliate," he said, "we cannot hope to break the enemy's might while we develop from a weak position to a mm position of strength."

~~President Eisenhower conferred for an hour today with Secretary of State Dulles. The White House says a "a number" of topics were discussed, including the Middle East.~~ to review the Middle East situation. The United States is said to feel that such a meeting might tend to undermine the current peace mission of United Nations Secretary-General Hammarskjold. Washington prefers that the talks be postponed until May 4th, when the foreign ministers of the United States, Britain and France will be attending a regular meeting of the NATO council in Paris.

The United States has rejected a proposal... made by France... that the Big Three foreign ministers hold a special meeting this month

Hammarskjold met with Lebanese leaders today in Beirut. Tomorrow, he will go to Israel to confer with Prime Minister Ben Gurion. Hammarskjold revealed today that Ben Gurion has sent him a message, formally demanding that Egypt end its blockade of Israeli shipping through the Suez Canal. Ben Gurion also raised the question whether Egypt's pledge to observe the Palestine armistice agreement means that the Cairo government no longer considers itself to be at war with Israel. In reply, Hammarskjold said his mission was concerned primarily with the situation which had developed along the demarkation line between Egypt and Israel. The question of the Suez Canal, he said, was not included in his formal mandate from the Security Council.

Israel celebrated the eighth anniversary of its independence today. In a military review in Haifa, the Israeli Air Force put ~~[illegible]~~ ~~[illegible]~~ 12 French jet fighters on display for the first time. This ~~is an~~ airplane ~~manufactured in France and~~ is capable of speeds up to 600 miles an hour. There was no sign in the demonstration of the later-type Mystere jet. Israel is reported to have also bought twelve of these from France.

~~In Algeria today, 22 rebel prisoners escaped from a French jail after killing the wife of the warden and a guard. In Paris, the French finance minister... Paul Ramadier... said new taxes may have to be imposed to help pay for stepped-up effort to restore order in Algeria.~~

~~The Communist prime minister of Bulgaria... Vulko Chervenkov... resigned today. The resignation was expected. For several weeks, Chervenkov has been under attack for his Stalinist beliefs.~~

In South Africa today, the non-white population boycotted the public bus system in Capetown in protest against a new segregation order applying to the city's double-deck buses. The order prescribes that only Europeans may take seats on the lower deck. There were no disorders.

In Washington, former Army Lieutenant Aldo Icardi went on trial today for perjury... in a case growing out of the murder of his commanding officer, Major William Holohan, in Italy during World War Two. Legal technicalities have prevented the government from trying Icardi, or an alleged accomplice, on charges of homicide. In the present trial, he is accused of perjury in denying implication in the crime. A motion to postpone trial on grounds of prejudicial publicity was denied.

In Denver, John Gilbert Graham went on trial today for the murder of his mother in the dynamiting of a United airliner last November. Forty-four persons died when the airplane exploded shortly after take-off. The trial is expected to last five to eight weeks.

A special meeting of the AFL-CIO executive council has been called for May first, to consider possible suspension of the teamsters union. The AFL-CIO president, George Meany, says the meeting will determine whether the teamsters union... by its alliance with the independent longshoremen's association... has violated the constitution of the AFL-CIO. Dave Beck, head of the teamsters, has insisted the alliance is legal under the constitution. The independent longshoremen's union was thrown out of the AFL three years ago, on grounds that it had fallen under the domination of gangsters. Meany contends that it still has not cleaned house.

Edward R. Murrow: April 16, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

The President has demonstrated that he likes to work with Congress, and to support his subordinates. His veto of the Farm Bill is only the fourth time he has used that power against a major piece of legislation. He chose to support his Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Benson against the advice of a considerable number of Republican leaders from farm states. There ~~may~~ will be an effort in the House to override the veto, but it is not likely to succeed. Fifteen Republican Senators and forty-eight Republican members of the House find themselves in an uncomfortable position, because they voted for the Bill the President has vetoed.

The Democrats now have a campaign issue which served them well in 1948, and they may be expected to make full use of it. Most dispassionate observers will agree that the President's action will cost the Republicans some votes in the farm states. This may be partially offset by consumer votes in the big cities. ~~[illegible]~~

~~The President in his veto message said: "To return now to wartime, ninety percent supports would be wrong. Production would be stimulated; markets would be further destroyed; more surplus would accumulate; and surpluses are price-depressing. Regimentation by ever stricter controls~~ would be the [illegible]." It is clear that the President objected primarily to the return to ninety percent of parity. He tried to take some of the sting out of his veto by announcing increased price supports on five basic crops - wheat, corn, cotton, rice and peanuts. These will be set at a level of eighty-six and a half percent of parity. The support price for milk will be raised, and more than four hundred million will be used to strengthen the prices of perishable farm commodities. The increased support will raise the value of this year's basic crops by about half-a-billion dollars, as compared with the previously announced rates.

The President also asked for approval of his Soil Bank Plan as a separate measure. This is the plan to spend about a billion, two hundred million a year for acres retired from crops; and it is designed to reduce surplus production. This Soil Bank was part of the Bill vetoed by the President.

Seldom has a President received more conflicting advice. Republican governors in farm states wanted him to sign the Bill; fifteen senators and forty-six Representatives of his own Party voted for it; the National Grange and the Farmers' Union wanted him to approve it; but the American Farm Bureau Federation - the largest farm organization - asked for the veto.

Reaction to the President's message reflects the bitter political battle to come. The farmer, as happens every four years, is about to become the darling of the politicians.

Republican National Chairman Leonard Hall said the President was right, and the veto wouldn't make Hall's job any tougher. He admitted there was a problem in the farm area, but thought the President's recommendations would go a long way toward solving it. Republican Senator Schoeppel of Kansas had said previously that a veto would "make it tough for us in the farm belt." Republican Senator Aiken of Vermont said the President had again demonstrated the courage of his convictions. Senate Republican leader Knowland was cautious in his comment, saying there was an honest difference of opinion; "only time will tell which group was right."

For the Democrats, Chairman Paul Butler said this was a direct blow from the President himself, not from a mere subordinate. It demonstrated again that farmers will not get help from a Republican Administration. According to Senator Kefauver, the President must now take full blame for the callous attitude of his Administration toward the difficulties of the farmers. Senator Lyndon Johnson claimed the President had created a stalemate, said: "Congress is seeking to raise farm income to adequate levels. The Administration is seeking to keep farm income down." Democratic Senator Ellender doubted that the President knew what was in the Bill; said he was too busily engaged in playing golf at Augusta.

All this, of course, represents only the opening skirmishes in the political campaign. The President has now committed his great personal prestige and popularity against high rigid price supports; and much of the campaign will now roar and rave around two primary issues - foreign policy and the farm problem. Up to now, Secretary of Agriculture Benson has borne most of the burden, received most of the blame for Administration farm policy. Tonight at 10, Eastern Time, when he speaks to the country, President Eisenhower assumes more of the burden than he has carried heretofore. He will, of course, attempt to shift part of the blame to the Democrats, just as they will try to present him with the whole of it - that's politics. [redacted]

Word for Today

Years ago, Will Rogers had a theory for solving the farm problem. "I have always claimed," he said, "that if every farmer eats all he raised, he would not only get fat himself, but farm prices might probably go up. 'Course, on account of this not being an Economist's idea, it might not work."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

MONDAY, APRIL 16, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

President Eisenhower vetoes the farm bill today. He called the measure "self defeating"..said it would do harm to every agricultural region of the country, and damage the interests of consumers. "Thus", he said, "it fails to meet the test of being good for the farmers and fair to all the people." The measure included the soil bank plan requested by the Administration, but it also called for supports pegged at 90 percent of parity. Mr. Eisenhower said a return to high rigid supports would stimulate production at a time when surpluses already present a serious problem. "Markets would be further destroyed" he said, "instead of expanded." The President said the Administration will take prompt executive action to improve farm income. Price supports on basic crops, he said, will be raised to at least eighty-two and one half percent of parity. Corn, which is now supported at 81 percent of parity, would be raised to 86 percent. Wheat , now supported at 76, would be raised to 84. The President promised that prices of perishable farm comodities will be bolstered with Agriculture Department funds, and that price support of manufacturing milk (milk used in making such products as ice cream, butter and cheese) will be raised 10 cents a hundred weihgt, to 3 dollars and 25 cents. Mr. Eisenhower will explain his veto action in a broadcast over most of these radio stations at 10 o'clock tonight, Eastern Time.

The House will vote on the question of overriding the veto on Wednesday. Two-thirds majorities in both houses are necessary to override. And the consensus on Capitol Hill isthat the bill is dead. (I should like to discuss this subject further in a few minutes.)

A Senate subcommittee began hearings today on the state of American air power. The subcommittee is headed by Senator Symington, who was secretary of the Air Force in the Truman Administration. He and other Democratic senators have charged the present administration with allowing Russia to get a head of the United States in the field of long-range jet bombers and intercontinental ballistic missiles. The first witness..General Walter Bedell Smith..said Russia has been "steadily closing the gap" on our military supremacy since the end of World War Two. The former ambassador to Moscow wais that in the weapons field, the Russians can keep pace with the United States "in those areas in which they wish to concentrate." General Omar Bradley, former chairman of the Joint Cheifs of Staff, warned that the first attack in another global war might well be directed against the United States. "Unless we can powerfully and decisively retaliate," hd said, "we cannot hope to break the enemy's might while we develop from a weak position to a position of strength."

The United States has rejected a proposal..made by France..that the Big Three foreign ministers hold a special meeting this month to review the Middle East situation. The United States is said to feel that such a meeting might tend to undermine the current peace mission of United Nations Secretary-General Hammarskjold. Washington prefers that the talks be postponed until May 4th when the foreign ministers of the United States, Britain and France will be attenting a regular meeting of the NATO council in Paris.

Hammarskjold met with Lebanese leaders today in Beirut. Tomorrow, he will go to Israel to confer with Prime Minister Ben Gurion. Hammarskjold revealed today that Ben Gurion has sent him a message, formally demanding that Egypt end its blockade of Israeli shipping through the Suez Canal. Ben Gurion also raised the question whether Egypt's pledge to observe the Palestine armistice agreement means that the Cairo government no longer considers itself to be at war with Israel. In reply, Hammarskjold said his mission was concerned primarily with the situation which had developed along the demarkation line between Egypt and Israel. The question of the Suez Canal, he said, was not included in his formal mandate from the Security Council.

Israel celebrated the eighth anniversary of its independence today. In a military review in Haifa, the Israeli Air Force put 12 French jet fighters on display for the first time. This airplane capable of speeds up to 600 miles an hour . There was no sign in the demonstration of the later-type Mystere jet. Israel is reported to have also bought twelve of these from France.

In South Africa today, the non-white population boycotted the public bus system in Capetown in protest against a new segregation order applying to the city's double-deck busses. The order prescribes that only Europeans may take seats on the lower deck. There were no disorders.

A special meeting of the AFL-CIO executive couccil has been called for May first, to consider possible suspension of the teamsters union. The AFL-CIO president, George Meany, says the meeting will determine whether the teamsters union..by is alliance with the independent longshoremen's association.. has violated the constitution of the AFL-CIO. Dave Back, head of the teamsters, has insisted the alliance is legal under the constitution. The independent longshoremen's union was thrown out of the AFL three years ago, on grounds that it had fallen under the domination of gangsters. Meany contends that it still has not cleaned house.

The President has demonstrated that he likes to work with Congress, and to support his subordinates. His veto of the Farm Bill is only the fourth time he has used that power against a major piece of legislation. He chose to support his Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Benson against the advice of a considerable number of Republican leaders from farm states. There will be an effort in the House to override the veto, but it is not likely to succeed.

Fifteen Republican Senators and forty-eight Republican members of the House find themselves in an uncomfortable position, because they voted for the Bill the President has vetoed.

The Democrats now have a campaign issue which served them well in 1948, and they may be expected to make full use of it. Most dispassionate observers will agree that the President's action will cost the Republicans some votes in the farm states. This may be partially ofiset by comsumer votes in the big cities.

It is clear that the President objected primarily to the return to ninety percent of parity. He tried to take some of the sting out of his veto by announcing increased price supports on five basic crops - wheat, corn, rice and peanuts. The support price for milk will be raised, and more than four hundred million will be used to strengthen the prices of perishable farm commodieies. The increased support will raise the value of this year's basic crops by about half - a billion dollars, as compared with the previously announced rates.

The President also asked for approval of his Soil Bank Plan as a separate measure. This is the plan to spend about a billion, two hundred million a year for acres retired from crops; and it is designed to reduce surplus production. This Soil Bank was part of the Bill vetoed by the President.

Seldom has a President received more conflicting advice. Republican governors in farm states wanted him to sign the Bill; fifteen senators and forty-six Representatives of his own Party voted for it; the National Grange and the Farmers' Union wanted him to approve it; but the American Farm Bureau Federation - the largest farm organization - asked for the veto.

Reaction to the President's message reflects the bitter political battle to come. The farmer, as happens every four years, is about to become the darling of the politicians.

Republican National Chairman Leonard Hall said the President was right, and the veto wouldn't make Hall's job any tougher. He admitted there was a problem in the farm area, but thought the President's recommendations would go a long way toward solving it. Republican Senator Schoeppel of Kansas had said previously that a veto would "make it tough for us in the farm belt." Republican Senator Aiken of Vermont said the President had again demonstrated the courage of his convictions. Senator Republicans leader Knowland was cautious in his comment, saying there was an honest difference of opinion; "only time will tell which group was right."

For the Democrats, Chairman Paul Butler said this was a direct blow from the President himself, not from a mere subordinate. It demonstaated again that farmers will not get help from a Republican Administration. According to Senator Kefauver, the President "must now take full blame for the callous attitude of his Administration toward the difficulties of the farmers." Senator Lyndon Johnson claimed the President had created a stalemate, said: "Congress is seeking to raise tarm income to adaquate levels. The Administration is seeking to keep farm income down." Democratic Senator Ellender doubted that the President knew what was in the Bill; said he was too busily engaged in playing golf at Augusta.

All this, of course, represents on ut the opening skirmishes in the political campaign. The President has now committed his great personal prestige and popularity against high rigid price supports; and much of the campaign will not roar and rave aroung two primary issues - foreign policy and the farm problem. Up to now, Secretary of Agricultur Benson has borne most of the burden received most of the blame for Administration farm policy. Tonight at 10, Eastern time, when he speaks to the country, President Eisenhower assumes more of the burden than he has carried heretofore. He will, of course, attempt to hift part of the blame to the Democrats, just as they will try to present him with the whole of it - that's politics.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: Years ago, Will Rogers had a theory for solving the farm problem. "I have always claimed, " he said, "that if every farmer eats all he raised, he would not only get fat himself, but farm prices might probably go up. Course, on account of thi not being an Economist's idea, it might not work."

Good Night and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Tues., April 17, 1956

This is the news:

Russia has dissolved the Cominform, the [redacted] bureau organized by Stalin to coordinate Communist activities in the satellite states. Reports of the move were confirmed in Moscow by First Deputy Premier Mikoyan, who said a full statement will appear tomorrow in the Soviet press. The editor of the Communist Party newspaper Pravda told reporters today the Cominform was dissolved because times had changed. "Each Communist party," he said, "has reached sufficient maturity to get along without the Cominform." In Washington, State Department experts call the Russian move a cheap gesture. They say it will have no practical effect on the operations of international Communism.

Russia offered today to help keep peace in the Middle East. A statement... issued by the foreign ministry in Moscow... pledged Russia to support the United Nations in its effort to strengthen the peace. And it called on Israel and the Arab states "to refrain from any kind of action which might lead to worsening of the situation." ~~In a supplementary statement, Soviet Foreign Minister~~ Molotov said Russia's offer ~~could serve as a basis for talks between the Soviet leaders and British Prime Minister Eden. Molotov was referring to the forthcoming visit in Britain of Premier Bulganin and Communist Party Boss Khrushchev... a visit that starts tomorrow when they arrive at Portsmouth on board a Russian~~ cruiser.

Secretary of State Dulles said today that if Russia sincerely wants to help the United Nations prevent war in the Middle East, that help would, of course, be welcomed by the United States. Mr. Dulles recalled that... on April 9th... President Eisenhower had appealed to all U.N. members to support the peace effort. He said the Soviet pronouncement might be in response to that appeal. (I should like to discuss this development further in a few minutes).

United Nations Secretary General Hammarskjold conferred for two hours today with Israeli leaders in Jerusalem. No communique was issued after the meeting. But informed sources say Prime Minister Ben Gurion again asked Hammarskjold to broaden the scope of his mission. So far, the secretary general has restricted his efforts to finding ways for preventing incidents between Israel and the Arab states. Israel wants a broader solution, including the lifting of the Egyptian ban on Israeli shipping through the Suez Canal.

Today... in Teheran... the Baghdad Pact council approvel preliminary steps for joint development of the natural resources of four member countries---Turkey, Pakistan, Iran and Iraq. Britain, the fifth member of the alliance, promised to help finance the project. The United States, which is not a member of the Baghdad Pact, has promised increased economic aid.

~~In London, the War Office announced today that Britain will continue to lend army officers to Jordan. This, despite the recent dismissal... by Jordan... of General Glubb as commander of the Arab Legion.~~

~~Russia and Egypt signed a three million dollar trade agreement today in Cairo. Russia will supply Egypt with 100 thousand tons of kerosene, in exchange for Egyptian products.~~

The new British budget was announced today in London. It calls for higher taxes on tobacco and company profits. And it would end the government subsidy on bread, which means the price of the standard loaf will go up about two cents. Government expenditures for the coming year were estimated at 13-billion, 300-million dollars... an increase of nearly 200-million over this year. Four billion, 200-million would go for defense. The budget message contained a surprise... a kind of nationalized lottery, to encourage savings. The government will issue bonds that pay no interest. Instead, the bond numbers will be drawn, and the customary interest money distributed among the winners.

~~The Bulgarian parliament today named Anton Yugov, as the new Communist premier. Yugov has been serving as deputy premier. He succeeds Vulko Chervenkov, who has been criticized by party leaders for following the Stalinist line.~~

In California, ~~today,~~ the Air Force took the wraps off a new jet fighter, capable of speeds up to 14-hundred miles an hour. The airplane is the F-104 Starfighter, manufactured by Lockheed, and it is scheduled to go into service "soon". General Weyland, the tactical air commander, says, "No country in the world can match the F-104 at this time."

Republican congressional leaders met with President Eisenhower today, and assured him Congress will uphold his veto of the farm bill. They also predicted Congress will pass a separate soil bank measure, as he requested, if the Democratic leadership will let it come to the floor for a vote. A "soil bank" bill was introduced in the House today by Republican Representative Simpson of Illinois. Its language is identical to the soil bank provision in the original farm measure.

The Agriculture Department set the 1956 support price for cotton today at 28 dollars and 85 cents a pound. That's the equivalent of 82 and one-half percent of parity.

The House Judiciary Committee voted today to send pending civil rights legislation back to a subcommittee for further study. The vote was 14 to 13, with most southern members voting for the delay.

The polls in the New Jersey primary will close a few minutes from now, at 8 o'clock, Eastern Time. Voting has been light, and political observers say this may spell trouble for Senator Kefauver, who is bucking the state Democratic organization. The slate of delegates entered by the state organization... led by Governor Meyner... is uncommitted. On the Republican ballot, President Eisenhower is virtually unopposed.

Republican leaders are holding a strategy meeting in Washington. And Mr. Eisenhower will go before them to deliver what is being called his first speech of the presidential campaign. Mr. Eisenhower will outline his program for victory in November. It includes emphasis on civil rights, individual and collective security, and espousal "of the cause of freedom, justice and peace."

This afternoon, the President threw out the first ball of the baseball season when the New York Yankees met the Washington Senators in G riffith Stadium. The senators lost, 10 to 4.

Edward R. Murrow: April 17, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

The announcement of the Kremlin on the Middle East crisis, ends a long and ominous period of rising anxiety over Soviet intentions. After playing "big brother" to the Arab countries in the Nasser camp, the Russians themselves precipitated the present crisis, with the sale of Czech arms to Egypt. That brought on wave after wave of incidents, each edging closer to war.

The Russians were playing a game of their own, in which the Arabs were quite willing instruments. For more than a century the Russians have wanted to exercise power at the eastern end of the Mediterranean. So by deeds, rather than words, they challenged the sole responsibility of Britain, France and the United States to supervise this region. As a minimum they wanted to share the Western monopoly. As a maximum, they might aspire to replace it. They did not let out a hint to indicate how much they wanted now, nor how far they were willing to go to get it. They simply let the turbulence rise, and the crisis come closer day after day to local war.

Then today, the Kremlin came out sharply against local war. It appeared to be willing to settle its own claims for the minimum, for partnership with the West, through the United Nations.

It is, of course, a familiar Soviet device to act badly, so as to get double gratitude when it stops acting badly. If the Kremlin had said weeks or months ago what it said today, there would have been no crisis, no rash of border incidents, no Hammarskjold mission, no unsteady heart beats in many capitals. But there also would have been no such burst of gratitude as Premier Bulganin and Boss Khrushchev are sure to receive in England when they arrive there tomorrow. The Kremlin policy was tailored and timed for its impact on Britain in particular, and on world opinion in general.

The Kremlin statement coincided, too, with the announcement that the Cominform had been dissolved. This really was almost too pat. The action does have some weight in the scales of propaganda, even though the Cominform hasn't met for years, and Moscow's influence on communist parties abroad will not be lessened one bit by the Cominform being formally abandoned.

Another Soviet strategem, when the time comes to "play good", is to accuse the West of doing precisely what the Kremlin has been doing. It would not be skillful to admit that the Middle East crisis had been set off by the sale of Czech arms to Egypt. So the Kremlin says it resulted from "certain circles in some countries" - as it was put - striving to make use of the Arab-Israel conflict for their aggressive aims, to the point of stationing foreign troops on the territories of countries in that area. "Interference in the affairs of Arab countries" the Kremlin says, "aims at re-establishing the positions of colonialism in the Near East, in which certain oil monopolies are particularly interested." It even denounces the Western declaration of 1950 as in line with these aspirations. "All this" it says, "is fraught with the danger of emergence of a hotbed of war, and that cannot be permitted."

The reasoning by which the Kremlin explains that it is against local war in the Middle East is not so important as that it is against the local war. "The Soviet Government" the statement says, "considers that it is possible and necessary to avoid an armed conflict in the Near East, and that it is in the interests of all near-Eastern states not to allow themselves to be provoked into being involved in military operations. The Soviet Union" it promises, "will render the necessary support to the U.N. measures directed toward the search for ways and means of strengthening peace in the area of Palestine, and the implementation of the corresponding decisions of the Security Council." It concludes by saying that "the Soviet Union considers it essential to direct efforts toward a stable, peaceful settlement of the Palestine question on a mutually acceptable basis, taking due consideration of the just, national interests of the parties involved." And it adds that the Soviet Union is ready to "contribute with other states to the peaceful solution of unsolved questions."

To say this, however, is far from saying that from now on things will go well in regard to the Middle East. The Soviet Union has claimed and has won its right to partnership in supervising the Middle East. But the new partner has its own interests, its own aspirations and its special allies. Experience indicates that it will be a contentious and obstinate negotiator. The road ahead can be long and rough.

But the Kremlin is thinking of more than the Middle East. Its Number One objective is to break up the Western alliance. Everything it does is shaped to that end. And that, more than anything, explains the appearance of this declaration at the moment the Soviet leaders arrive to woo the good will of the British public.

Ted Pearson—

Word for Today

World politics... and policies... are changing. John Adams said, "All great changes are irksome to the human mind, especially those attended by great dangers and uncertain effects." But the meaning of these changes must be found. "What is more unwise," Cicero said, "than to mistake uncertainty for certainty, falsehood for truth?"

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

TUESDAY, APRIL 17, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

Russia has dissolved the Cominform, the bureau organized by Stalin to coordinate Communist activities in the satellite states.

Reports of the move were confirmed in Moscow by First Deputy Premier Mikoyan, who said a full statement will appear tomorrow in the Soviet press . The editor of the Communist Party newspaper, Pravda, told reporters today the Cominform was dissolved because times had changed. "Each Communist party", he said, "has reached sufficient maturity to get along without the Cominform." In Washington, State Department experts call the Russian move a cheap gesture. They say it will have no practical effect on the operations of international Communism.

Russia offered today to help keep peace in the Middle East. A statement issued by the foreign ministry in Moscow..pledged Russia to support the United Nations in its effort to strengthen the peace. And it called on Israel and the Arab states "to refrain from any kind of action which might lead to worsening of the situation."

Secretary of State Dulles said today that if Russia sincerely wants to help the United Nations prevent war in the Middle East, that help would, of course, be welcomed by the United States. Mr. Dulles recalled that..on April 9th..President Eisenhower had appealed to all U.N. members to support the peace effort. He said the Soviet pronouncement might be in response to that appeal. (I should like to discuss this development further in a few mintues.)

United Nations Secretary General Hammarskjold conferred for two hours today with Israeli leaders in Jerusalem. No communique was issued after the meeting. But informed sources say Prime Minister Ben Gurion again asked Mr.

Hammarakjold to broaden the scope of his mission. So far, the secretary general has restricted his efforts to finding ways for preventing incidents between Israel and the Arab states. Israel wants a broader solution, including the lifting of the Egyptian ban of Israeli shipping through the Suez Canal.

Today..in Teheran ..the Baghdad Pact council approved preliminary steps for joint development of the natural resources of four member countries--Turkey, Pakistan, Iran and Iraq. Britain, the fifth member of the alliance, promised to help finance the project. The United States, which is not a member of the Baghdad Pact, has promised increased economic aid.

The new British budget was announced today in London. It calls for higher taxes on tobacco and company profits. And it would end the government subsidy on bread, which means the price of the standard loaf will bo up about two cents. Government expenditures for the coming year were estimated at 13-billion 300-million dolars..an increase of nearly 200-million ofer this year. Four billion, 200-million would go for defense. The budget message contained a surprise..a kind of nationalized lottery to encourage savings. The government will issue bonds that pay no interest. Instead, the bond numbers will be drawn, and the customary interest money distributed among the winners.

In California, the Air Force took the wraps off a new jet fighter capable of speeds up to 14-hundred miles an hour. The airplane is the F-104 Starfighter, manufactured by Lockheed, and it is scheduled to go into service "soon." General Weyland, the tactical air commander, says, "No country in the world can match the F-104 at thi time."

Republican congressional leaders met with President Eisenhower today and assured him Congress will uphold his veto of the farm bill. They also predicted Congress will pass a separate soil bank measure, as he requested, if the Democratic leadership will let it come to the floor for a vote. A "soil bank" bill was introduced in the House today by Republican Representative Simpson of Illinois. Its language is identical to the soil bank provision in the original farm measure.

The Agricultre Department set the 1956 support price for cotton today at 28 dollars and 85 cents a pound. That's the equivalent of 82 and one half percent of parity.

The House Judiciary Committee voted today to sent pending civil rights legislation back to a subcommittee for further study. The vote was 14 to 13, with most southern members voting for the delay.

The polls in the New Jersey primary will close a few minutes from now, at 8 o'clock, Eastern Time. Voting has been light, and political observers say this may spell trouble for Senator Kefauver, who is bucking the state Democratic organization. The slate of delegates entered by the state organization..led by Governor Meyner..is uncommitted. On the Republican ballot, President Eisenhower is virtually unopposed.

Republican leaders are holding a strategy meeting in Washington. And Mr. Eisenhower will be before them to deliver that is being called his first speech of the presidential campaign. Mr. Eisenhower will outline his program for victory in November. It includes emphasis on civil rights, individual and collective security, and espousal "of the cause of freedom, justice and peace."

This afternoon, the President threw out the first ball of the baseball season when the New York Yankees met the Washington Senators in Griffith Stadium. The senators lost, 10 to 4.

The announcement of the Kremlin on the Middle East crisis, ends a long and ominous period of rising anxiety over Soviet intensions. After playing "big brother" to the Arab countries in the Nasser camp, the Russians themselves percipitated the present crisis with the sale of Czech arms to Egypt. That brought on wave after wave of incidents each edging closer to war.

The Russians were playing a game of their own, in which the Arabs were quite willing instruments. For more than a century the Russians have wanted to exercise power at the eastern end of the Mediterranean. So by deeds, rather than words, they challenged the sole responsibility of Britain, France and the United States to supervise this region. As a minimum they wanted to share the Western monopoly. As a maximum, they might aspire to replace it. They did not let out a hint to indicate how much they wanted now, nor how far they were willing to go to get it. The simply let the turbulence rise and the crisis come closer day after day to local war.

Then today, the Kremlin came out sharply against local war. It appeared to be willing to settle its own claims for the minimum, for partnership with the West, through the United Nations.

It is, of course, a familiar Soviet device to act badly so as to get double gratitude when it stops acting badly. If the Kremlin had said weeks or months ago what it said today, there would have been no crisis, no rash of border incidents, no Hammarskjold mission, no unsteady heart beats in many capitals. But there also would have neen no such burst of gratitude as Premier Bulganin and Boss Khurshchev are sure to receive in England when they arrive there tomorrow. The Kremlin policy was tailored and timed for its impact on Britain in particular, and on the world opinion in general.

The Kremlin statement coincided, too, with the announcement that the Cominform had been dissolved. This really was almost too pat. The action does have some weight in the scales of propaganda, even though the Cominform hasn't met for years, and Moscow's influence on communist parties abroad will not be lessened one bit by the Cominform being formally abandoned.

Another Soviet stratagem, when the time comes to "play good", is to accuse the West of doing precisely what the Kremlin has been doing. It would not be skillful to admit that the Middle East crisis had been set off by the sale of Czech arms to Egypt. So the Kremlin says it resulted from "certain circles in some countries" - as it was put - striving to make use of the Arab-Israel conflict for their aggressive aims, to the point of stationing foreign troops on the territories of countries in that area. "Interference in the affairs of Arab countries" the Kremlin says, "aims at re-establishing the positions of colonialism in the Near East, in which certain oil monopolies are particularly interested." It even denounces the Western declaration of 1950 as in line with these aspirations. "All this" it says, "is fraught with the danger of emergence of a hotbed of war, and that cannot be permitted."

The reasoning by which the Kremlin explains that it is against local war in the Middle East is not so important as that it is against the local war. "The Soviet Government" the statement says, "considers that it is possibble and necessary to avoid an armed conflict in the Near East, and that it is in the interests of all near - Eastern states not to allow themselves to be provoked into being involved in military operations. The Soviet Union" it promises, "will render [illegible] the necessary support to the U.N. measures directed toward a search for ways and means of strengthening peace in the area of Palestine, and the implementation of the corresponding decisions of the Security Council." It concludes by saying that "the Soviet Union considers it essential to direct efforts toward a stable, peaceful settlement of the Palestine question of a mutually acceptable basis, taking due consideration of the just, national interests of the parties involved." And it adds that the Soviet Union is ready to "contribute with other states to the peaceful solution of unsolved questions."

To say this, however, is far from saying that from now on things will go well in regard to the Middle East. The Soviet Union has claimed and has won its right to partnership in supervising the Middle East. But the new partner has its own interests, its own aspirations and its special allies. Experience indicates that it will be a contintious and obstinate negotiator. The road ahead can be long and rough.

But the Kremlin is thinking of more than the Middle East. Its Number one objective is to break up the Western alliance. Everything it does is shaped to that end. And that, more than anything, explains the appearance of this declaration at the moment the Soviet leaders arrive to woo the good will of the British public.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. First, here is Ted Pearson.

PEARSON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: World politics...and policies..are changing. John Adams said, "All great changes are irksome to the homan mind, especially those attended by great dangers and uncertain effect." But the meaning of these changes must be found. "What is more unwise," Cicero said, "than to mistake uncertainty for certainty, falsehood for truth?"

Goodnight and good luck.

Edward R. Murrow Wed., April 18, 1956

This is the news:

Twelve countries... including the United States and Russia... have reached basic agreement on a charter for an international atomic agency. A communique, issued in Washington tonight, says: "While several delegations reserved their positions on certain details, all delegations voted in favor of the statute as a whole." Russia is said to have given up its insistence that the agency be subject to the big power veto in the United Nations Security Council. The agency would create a pool of atomic energy for PEACEFUL use by all countries.

1-A

[redacted]

Reports from Jerusalem say Egypt and Israel have agreed to a cease-fire... and that United Nations Secretary General Hammarskjold will announce the agreement later tonight. These reports are not confirmed. Hammarskjold conferred with Israeli leaders twice today, and a communique issued after the meetings said simply: "Discussions on full implementation of the armistice agreement were continued." The Israeli cabinet will meet tomorrow morning to study Hammarskjold's proposals... and further talks with the secretary general are scheduled for tomorrow afternoon.

Soviet Premier Bulganin and Communist Party Boss Khrushchev arrived in England today for a 10-day visit. A London crowd cheered... and jeered... their arrival. In a brief speech, Bulganin said that although Russia and Britain have different social systems, this should not keep them from being good neighbors---provided, he said, "there is reasonable understanding of the fact we all have to live together on one planet." Tonight, Prime Minister Eden dined with the Russians at Claridge's Hotel, and tomorrow they start their formal talks. My colleague, Howard Smith, cables that Bulganin and Khrushchev may have brought with them a prize goodwill package. The "package", Smith says, is reportedly an offer of a new Anglo-Soviet pact, to replace the wartime alliance the Russians denounced only a year ago. That denunciation was based on the approval... by Britain... of the Paris agreements bringing Germany into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Since this British policy is unchanged, any new pact presumably would be based on different terms. And Smith quotes the British as saying their attitude toward the Russian offer will depend on the nature of those terms.

~~Twelve persons are reported to have been killed... and 20 injured...~~ in rioting between followers of rival political parties yesterday in ~~Spanish Morocco. Reports of the rioting were held up until~~ today by ~~military censorship.~~

Today... in a ceremony in Tunis... France turned over its police powers to the Tunisian government. The action was in accordance with the recent agreement granting independence to Tunisia.

In Teheran, the United States today joined the economic committee of the five-nation Baghdad Pact. The United States is still not a member of the alliance.

In Washington, the House today upheld President Eisenhower's veto of the farm bill. On a roll-call, 211 representatives voted to uphold the veto, 202 voted to override. S~~ince a two-thirds majority is necessary~~ to ~~override, supporters of the omnibus measure were short 74 votes. Democratic leaders conceded yesterday there was no hope of reviving the measure.~~ Today's vote was for the record. Chairman Cooley of the House Agriculture Committee said today, "There isn't a Chinaman's chance Congress will pass a separate soil bank bill," as requested by the President. He called the soil bank plan "a dead duck". But House Speaker Rayburn said "something" may be done in the way of new farm legislation. He did not elaborate.

→

In other action today, the House authorized a 70-million-dollar program for building test facilities for atom-powered airplanes. The measure now goes to the Senate.

And a House Judiciary Subcommittee approved a catch-all civil rights bill and sent it to the full committee. Chairman Celler predicted approval when that group meets on Tuesday.

In Birmingham, Alabama, four men convicted as accessories in the assault last week on Negro entertainer Nat King Cole received maximum sentences today of six months in jail. In passing sentence, Judge Ralph Parker commended the entertainer's conduct. He said the attack "could have resulted in untold tragedy." Two other white persons have been accused of assault with intent to murder... in connection with the attack... and will receive a preliminary hearing on Friday.

Most of the returns are in on the New Jersey primary, and they show the state Democratic organization... led by Governor Meyner... winning thirty-five and a half of the state's 36 convention votes. Only one of Senator Kefauver's slate of candidates was elected, giving him one-half of a vote at the August convention. Kefauver campaigned hard in New Jersey, and had said he expected to get 10 votes. He says he has "no excuses"... and will continue to campaign "as hard as I can." In the Republican primary in New Jersey, President Eisenhower was virtually unopposed. Adlai Stevenson said the results in New Jersey show he's still in the race for the Democratic presidential nomination.

~~The following intelligence from today's issue of the weekly journal of the entertainment world, Variety: "Grace Kelly to Prince Rainier the Third, April 18-19, Monaco. Bride is film star. Groom pro.~~

At a dinner here in New York tonight, Vice President Nixon said credit for America's prosperity must be shared among Democrats and Republicans alike. "Yet," he said, "I think I can state without fear of contradiction that the philosophy of government in Washington for the last three years has been the most important single factor."

The following intelligence from today's issue of the weekly journal of the entertainment world, Variety: "Grace Kelly to Prince Rainier the Third, April 18-19, Monaco. Bride is film star. Groom, non-pro."

Edward R. Murrow: April 18, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

President Eisenhower formally opened the 1956 campaign last night with a speech that disclosed that he will electioneer in a way not known in this republic since the introduction of the party system. In the early campaigns in our history partisanship was called factionalism, and factionalism was roundly denounced. In those times it was a bad word. Mr. Eisenhower didn't go back on the two-party system. After all, he is the candidate of a party as such, and to win, he has to beat the nominee of the other party. But all he said about Republicanism he kept beautifully non-controversial. He seemed to have chosen his ideas and language, to make them equally acceptable to Republicans, Democrats and Independents. The speech cannot be described as the opening gun of a hard fight. It was not a gun. It was more like a bell, calling a community to a great get-together.

The President did talk mostly about Republicanism, and its principles. He said nothing about these principles - or next to nothing - that most Right Wing Republicans would reject. But neither would most Democrats. And what most Democrats would have rejected was absent from the speech.

He started with Lincoln, as most Republican speakers do. But when he had finished, he was not many inches beyond Lincoln. Some ~~Right Wing Republicans start with Lincoln, then go miles beyond him, and even seem to~~ be more comfortable the farther they get. Their concept of Republicanism is much more controversial than anything Mr. Eisenhower said last night. So is the concept of some Republicans not so far to the right. They glory in the differences between the Republican and Democratic parties. The party platform has always underscored such differences, and sought to capitalize on them.

Mr. Eisenhower, after praising Democrats for their devotion to American principles, did mention that they differ from Republicans in methods, tradition and philosophy of government responsibilities. But that was all he said about differences. And the platform he wants from the San Francisco convention, ~~will~~ would be a program of principles around which all Republicans, Independents and sound-thinking democrats can rally. Mr. Eisenhower said so in just those words. And he added: "We welcome them all." He might also have said: "We solicit them all", for his speech sounded like an appeal for bi-partisan support.

The speech should be measured in its context. It came a day after the veto of the farm bill. That veto cost the President votes, and he knew it was going to. He vetoed it because he felt his principles required him to. He declined to compromise for the sake of votes. The votes he lost are Republican votes in the farm states. So what did the President do? He turned his attention to what he called sound-thinking Democrats and Independents. # Presumably he would have conducted a generally bi-partisan campaign, whether or not a farm bill had been vetoed. But since he did veto it, the importance of a bi-partisan campaign became so much the greater. He was losing votes by adherence to principles, but there were votes to be had for proclaiming principles the Democrats and Independents could follow.

It may be in the end that President Eisenhower will win another four years in the White House and the Democrats will continue in control of Congress. On the basis of the speech last night, their co-operation could be harmonious. This would be a kind of coalition government, under a President who campaigned in as nearly bi-partisan a way as the two-party system permits. Anyway that is how he started. If Mr. Eisenhower thinks ahead - which he surely does - this may be what he sees. Certainly he said nothing in the speech that would ruffle the harmony or diminish the will to co-operate.

For those who may not have read the speech, let me summarize ~~the eight~~ some of the principles which Mr. Eisenhower said the people are to know as the Republican program for tomorrow, next year, and a generation hence:

First: The individual is of supreme importance, and every American of every race and creed should enjoy equally the rights of free citizens.

Second: Liberty, human dignity, opportunity and equal rights are our heritage. They are the things of the spirit that inspire us and which we must strengthen.

Third: America does not prosper unless all Americans prosper. Better jobs, a flourishing agriculture, peace and plenty requires a strong, growing system of private enterprise.

Fourth: Government must have a heart as well as a head, and must relieve distress and strengthen personal and family security.

Fifth: People must work together, which under a free government can be done by spontaneous co-operation, something it is the Republican mission to strengthen.

Sixth: The purpose of government is to serve and never to dominate.

Seventh: To remain free we must be strong.

Eighth: We espouse the cause of freedom and justice and peace for all people.

"I believe" said the President, "that the Republican platform presented to America at the national convention in August will in substance be the expression of these principles."

The campaign begins on a high level - as others have before.

Word for Today

The President has made a bid for bipartisan support, saying it is only in methods, not objectives, that Republicans and Democrats disagree. This is not to say methods are unimportant. Lord Chesterfield said, "Lay down a method for everything." But Mr. Eisenhower would seem to be following the counsel of Goethe, who said, "Unite and lead is the watchword of the wise."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 18, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

Twelve countries..including the United States and Russia..have reached basic agreement on a charter for an international atomic agency. A communique, issued in Washington tonight, says: "While several delegations reserved their positions on certain details, all delegations voted in favor of the statute as a whole." Russia is said to have given up its insistence that the agency be subject to the big pwerr veto in the United Nations Security Council. The agency would create a pool of atomic energy for peaceful use by all countries.

Reports from Jerusalem say Egypt and Israel have agreed to a cease-fire and that United Nations Secretary General Hammarakjold will announce the agreement later tonight. These reports are not confirmed. Hammarskjold conferred with Israeli leaders twice today, and a communique issued after the meeting said simply: "Discussions on full implementation of the armistice agreement were continued." The Israeli cabinet will meet tomorrow morning to study Hammarskjold'd proposals..and further talks with the secretary general are scheduled for tomorrow afternoon.

Soviet Premier Bulganin and Communist Party Boss Khrushchev arrived in England today for a 10-day visit. A London crowd cheered..and jeered their arrival. In a brief speech, Bulganin said that although Russia and Britain have different social systems, this should not keep them from being good neighbors -- provided, he said, "there is reasonable understanding of the fact that we all have to live together on one planet." Tonight, Prime Minister Eden dined with the Russians at Claridge's Hotel, and tomorrow they start their formal talks. My colleague, Howard Smith, cables that Bulganin and Khrushchev may have brought with them a prize goodwill package. The "package", Smith says, is reportedly an offer of a new Anglo - Soviet pact, to replace the wartime alliance the Russians denounced only a year ago. That denunciation was based on the approval..by Britain ..of the Paris agreements, bringing Germany into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Since this British policy in unchanged any new pact presumably, would be based on different terms. And Smith quotes the British as saying their attitude toward the Russian offer will depend on the nature of those terms.

Today in a ceremony in Tunis France turned over its police power to the Tunisian government. The action was in accordance with the recent agreement granting independence to Tunisia.

In Teheran, the United States today joined the economic committee of the five-nation Baghdad Pact. The United States is still not a member of the alliance.

In Washington, the House today upheld President Eisenhower's veto of the farm bill. On a roll-call, 211 representatives voted to uphold the veto, 202 voted to override. Today's vote was for the record. Chairman Cooley of the House Agriculture Committee said today, "There isn't a Chinaman's chance Congress will pass a separate soil bank bill", as requested by the President. He called the soil bank plan "a dead duck". But House Speaker Rayburn said "something" may be done in the way of new farm legislation. He did not eleborate.

In other action today, the House authorized a 70-million dollar program for building test facilities for atom-powered airplanes. The measure now goes to the Senate.

And a House Judiciary Subcommittee approved a catch-all civil rights bill and sent it to the full committee. Chairman Celler predicted approval when that group meets on Tuesday.

In Birmingham, Alabama, four men convicted as acessories in the assault last week on Negro entertainer Nat King Cole received maximum sentences today of six months in jail. In passing sentence, Judge Ralph Parker commended the entertainer's conduct. He said the attack "could have resulted in untold tragedy." Two other white persons have been accused of assault with intent to murder in connection with the attack ans will receive a preliminary hearing on Friday.

Most of the returns are in on the New Jersey primary, and they show the state Democratic organization..led by Governor Meyner..winning thirty-five and a half of the state's 36 convention votes. Only one of Senator Kefauver's slate of candidates was elected, giving him one-half of a vote at the August convention. Kefauver campaigned hard in New Jersey, and had said he expected to get 10 votes. He says he has "no excuses" and will continue to campaign "as hard as I can." In the Republican primary in New Jersey, President Eisenhower was virtually unopposed. Adlai Stevenson said the results in New Jersey show he's still in the race for the Democratic presidential nomination.

At a dinner here in New York tonight, Vice Presidnet Nixon said credit for America's prosperity must be shared along Democrats and Republicans alike. "Yet", he said, "I think I can state without fear of contradiction that the philosophy of government in Washington for the last three years has been the most important single factor."

The following intelligence from today's issue of the weekly journal of the entertainment world, Variety: "Grace Kelly to Prince Rainier the Third, April 18-19, Monaco. Bride is film star. Groom, non-pro."

President Eisenhower formally opened the 1956 campaign last night with a speech that disclosed that he will electioneer in a way not known in this republic since the introduction of the party system. In the early campaigns in our history partisanship was called factionalism, and factionalism was roundly denounced. In those times it was a bad word. Mr. Eisenhower didn't go back on the two party system. After all, he is the candidate of a party as such, and to win, he has to beat the nominee of the other party. But all he said about Repbulicanism he kept beautifully non-controversial. He seemed to have chosen his ideas and language, to make them equally acceptable to Republicans, Democrats and Independents. The speech cannot be described as the opening gun of a hard fight. It was not a gun. It was more like a bill, calling a community to a great get-together.

The President did talk mostly about Republicanism, and its principles. He said nothing about these principles - or next to nothing - that most Right wing Republicans would reject. But neither would most Democrats. And what most Democrats would have rejected was absent from the speech.

He started with Lincoln, as most Republican speakers so. But when he had finished, he was not many inches beyond Lincoln.

Mr. Eisnnhower, after praising Democrats for their devotion to American principles, did mention that they differ from Republicans in methods, tradition and philosophy of government responsibilities. But that was all he said about differences. And the platform he wants from the San Francisco convention would be a program of principles anound which all Republicans, Independents and sound-thinking democrats can rally, Mr. Eisenhower said so in just so those words. And he added: "We welcome them all." He might also have said: "We solicit them all", for his speech sounded like an appeal for bi-partisan support.

The speech should be meauured in its context. It came a day after the veto of the farm bill. That veto cost the President votes, and he knew it was going to. He vetoed it because he felt his principles required him to. He declined to compromise for the sake of votes. The votes he lost are Republican votes in the farm states. So what did the President do? He turned his attention to what he called sound-thinking Democrats and Independents.

Presumably he would have conducted a generally bi-parti an campaign, whether or not a farm bill had been vetoed. But since he did veto it, the importance of a bi-partisan campaign became so much the greater. He was losing votes by adherence to principles, but there were votes to be had for proclaiming principles the Democrats and Independents could follow.

It may be in the end that President Eisenhower will win another four years in the White House and the Democrats will continue in control of Congress. On the basis of the speech last night, their co-operation could be harmonious. This would be a kind of coalition government, under a President who campaigned in as nearly bi-partisan a way as the two - party system permit.. Anyway that is how he started. If Mr. Eisenhower thinks ahead -- which he surely does - this may be what he sees. Certainly he said nothing in the speech that would ruffle the harmony or diminish the will to cooperate.

For those who may not have read the speech, let me summarize some of the principles which Mr. Eisenhower said the people are to know as the Republican program for tomorrow, next year, and a generation hence:

The individual is of supreme importance. Liberty, human dignity, opportunity and equal rights are our heritage. America does not prosper unless all Americans prosper. Government must have a heart as well as a head. People must work together, which under a free government can be done by spontaneous cooperation. The purpose of government is to serve and never to dominate. To remain free we must be strong. We espouse the cause of freedom and justice and peace for all people.

"I believe" said the President, "that the Republican platform presented to America at the national convention in August will in substance be the expression of these principles."

The campaign begins on a high level -- as others have before.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll ba back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: The President has made a bid for bipartisan support, saying it is only in methods, not objectives, that Republicans and Democrats disagree. This is not to say methods are unimportant. Lord Chesterfield said, "Lay down a method for everything." But Mr. Eisenhower would seem to be following the counsel of Goethe, who said, "Unite and lead is the watchword of the sise."

Goodnight and Good Luck!

Edward R. Murrow Thurs., April 19, 1956

This is the news:

Dag Hammarskjold, secretary general of the United Nations, announced in Jerusalem today that Egypt and Israel have agreed to an unconditional cease-fire along their frontiers. The cease-fire went into effect at 6 o'clock last night, Jerusalem time. The agreement provides that "no military or para-military forces, including non-regular forces, may shoot across the demarcation line, or pass over that line, for any purpose whatsoever." The agreement further provides that neither side "shall commit any warlike or hostile act."

A new incident was reported today on the border between Israel and Jordan. An Israeli soldier, and two Jordanian guardsmen, were killed in an exchange of fire between border patrols. Each side accuses the other of starting the action. (I should like to discuss the Middle East situation further in a few minutes).

In London today, Soviet Premier Bulganin and Communist Party Boss Khrushchev began their series of informal conferences with British leaders. At the suggestion of Prime Minister Eden, it was agreed that neither the progress nor the substance of the talks would be divulged, except by means of joint communiques. The first meeting was held in the cabinet room at No. 10 Downing Street, and lasted two and a half hours.

British officials say the Soviets have suddenly eased their "jamming" of British broadcasts beamed to Russia. They estimate that in the last 48 hours, the interference with these broadcasts has been reduced by 40 percent.

The council meeting of the Baghdad Pact ended today in Teheran, with a pledge by the United States to give the anti-Communist alliance "moral and material support". The United States is not a member of the five-nation alliance. But the American observer at the meeting... Deputy Under-Secretary of State Loy Henderson... announced today that the United States would name a representative to the counter-subversion committee of the Baghdad Pact. Yesterday, he announced American membership in the economic committee. Henderson said the members of the pact---Britain, Turkey, Pakistan, Iran and Iraq---"are making a great contribution to the preservation of freedom and security for the entire family of free nations."

My colleague, Bob Pierpoint, had an exclusive interview today with the head of the Chinese Nationalist government, Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek. Chiang told Pierpoint that Moscow's dissolution of the Cominform is "just another Russian effort to deceive the world." Chiang said it was a move to "soften" opposition to Communist in both Britain and the United States. And he predicted that Communist efforts to infiltrate, will now be stepped up in Asia and the Middle East.

The Atomic Energy Commission announced today, that the hydrogen bomb test... scheduled to be held in the South Pacific on May first... has been postponed until May 8th. / The delay was attributed to "technical difficulties involved in making ready for the test."

The White House today described President Eisenhower as "very much gratified" by the preliminary approval of an international agency to carry out his atoms-for-peace program. / For the particulars of that story, here is Bill Downs in Washington. (Bill runs 2:00, returns on standard cue).

The House Appropriations Committee voted a billion, 200-million dollars today, for President Eisenhower to put a soil bank program into operation without delay. The committee vote was 36 to 7. Chairman Cannon said the money would enable Secretary of Agriculture Benson to put into effect... under existing laws... the soil plan contemplated in the omnibus farm bill vetoed by the President on Monday. There is one difference. Democratic Representative Whitten of Mississippi, who helped draft the appropriations bill, says the new measure gives the President no authority to make advance payments to farmers this year for soil bank commitments next year. Today's action was a surprise maneuver. The Administration has held that special legislation is needed for a soil bank program, and Mr. Eisenhower requested such a bill in his veto message.

Secretary Benson testfied before the Senate Agriculture Committee today... and insisted that a soil bank program cannot be put into operation without new legislation. But new legislation, he said, is not required in order to raise support prices, as recommended by the President. Benson said, "The law already provides that basic commodities may be supported above the minimum levels specified in the flexible scale."

A federal jury today acquitted former Army Lieutenant Aldo Icardi on a charge of perjury. Icardi was accused of lying to a congressional committee three years ago, when he denied complicity in the murder of his commanding officer behind enemy lines in Italy during World War Two. The court directed the verdict of acquittal on the technicality that Icardi's testimony... even if false... could not have been material to the congressional inquiry.

Edward R. Murrow: April 19, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

News of the cease-fire between Egypt and Israel is an occasion for relief, rather than for excited expectations of an early peace settlement. What is good in the news is that things aren't going to grow worse, at least for the time being. And in this respect it is much like the news earlier this week that the Soviet Union had agreed to work for a settlement of the conflict through the United Nations. The two developments have won time in which to try to make some real progress toward a real peace. They do not promise that peace will be achieved. The difficulties of getting it continue to be formidable and will need strong pressures for moderation and forebearance on both parties. And they need even more a demonstration that the Soviet Union wants a reasonable settlement, and is not simply shifting its tactics to enlarge its power.

The cease-fire, then, is a modest success. Still it is a very considerable one. And it once more attests the value of the United Nations. It is not being cynical to say that the success is only negative in nature. The United Nations, as it stands, cannot aspire to more than this in such circumstances. It cannot solve the problems that produce tensions; it cannot knock heads together, or summon chiefs of state, to answer for their actions or policies. At best it can give voice to world concern when local fires threaten to turn into a conflagration. But this it has done once more, and the success of Mr. Hammarskjold's mission is greatly to his personal credit, as well as an enhancement of the United Nation's prestige.

The Hammarskjold mission, however, is not fully satisfying Israeli desires. The objection is not to what he has done, but that he seems to have limited himself to do little more at this time. My colleague Winston Burdett cables me from Jerusalem that Israeli leaders have tried their utmost to induce Mr. Hammarskjold to use his influence and authority to try to bring about direct negotiations between their country and Egypt. What they want him to do, Mr. Burdett says, is to take the initiative by proposing a "little summit meeting" between Colonel Nasser and Ben Gurion. If Nasser consented, they would consider it a long step forward, marking a radical change in Egypt's policy, and giving some promise of eventual settlement. If he refused, he would appear to be accepting responsibility for the failure to get a settlement.

But they find Mr. Hammarskjold dedicated to a course of caution, staying strictly within his security council mandate, and taking one step at a time. Having obtained the cease-fire, his next objective is not something basic or far-reaching. It is to get new border regulations and better facilities for U.N. observers, so that it will be easier to prevent the border explosions, that have been so nerve-wracking lately. It appears that Mr. Hammarskjold will return to New York without going much, if any, further.

The Israeli leaders say they want something more than gracious acceptance of the cease-fire. They want direct negotiations so that Egypt would at least imply the recognition of Israel. Without real negotiations they fear that Egypt will use the time now won simply to accelerate its warlike preparations.

Ted Pearson-

Word for Today

In the role of peace-maker, Dag Hammarskjold has made a notable start. A ~~cease-fire has gone into effect.~~ If a final settlement is achieved, it probably will not be popular. Benjamin Franklin said, "I have never known a peace made, even the most advantageous, that was not censured as inadequate, and the makers condemned as injudicious or corrupt."

Goodnight and good luck!

CBS RADIO DIVISION

EDWARD R. MURROW

Thursday, April 19, 1956
7:45-8:00 p.m.

MURROW: ..... The Atomic Energy Commission announced today that the hydrogen bomb test, scheduled to be held in the South Pacific on May 1,, has been postponed until May 8. The delay was attributed to technical difficulties involved in making ready for the test. The White House today described President Eisenhower as "very much gratified" by the preliminary approval of an international agency to carry out his atoms-for-peace program. For the particulars of that story here is Bill Downs in Washington.

DOWNS: Something like a ray of hope for co-existence between mankind and the atom came out of Washington today, Ed, and, although it may be too early to say that international common sense has prevailed in controlling the terrible potentialities of the hydrogen and atomic bombs, an important step has been taken in that direction. What has happened is that twelve nations, including the United States and Russia, have agreed to set up an international atomic energy agency to make available the raw materials of nuclear power to all countries for peaceful exploitation of the new science. The agreement grew out of a suggestion by President Eisenhower a couple of years ago that this country would earmark part of its production of fissionable materials for an international pool.

For the past two months, Ambassador James Wadsworth, and twelve other diplomats have been working on a charter, which would set up an international organization to handle the program. The operation will be run by a board of governors from twenty-three countries. There will be a director-general and a new international atomic headquarters. There would be teams of inspectors to make sure that nonation was diverting the so-called peacetime atoms to military purposes and, generally speaking, the new international atomic energy agency would be the banker and broker of this new source of power and experiment. The general idea is to get the new science into the energy-starved areas of the world and make nuclear power available to those nations without the natural resources to develop their own projects.

Although not strictly a United Nations agency, it would make regular reports to the U. N. General Assembly and other interested U. N. groups. In event of a security violation the U. N. Security Council would be advised but would not have the power of veto.

With the United States planning another hydrogen test explosion within the next three or four weeks in the Pacific, the establishment of the atoms-for-peace agency is highly significant and welcome news. Maybe after all there is such a thing as international common sense, nuclear or otherwise.

This is Bill Downs in Washington. Now, back to Ed Murrow in New York.

Ed.trans.-A.A.Cardiff (30)

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

THURSDAY, APRIL 19, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

Dag Hammarskjold, secretary general of the united Nations, announced in Jerusalem today that Egypt and Israel have agreed to an unconditional cease-fire along their frontiers. The cease-fire went into effect at 6 o'clock last night, Jerusalem time. The agreement provides that "no military or para-military forces, including non-regular forces, may shoot across the demarcation line, or pass over that line, for any purpose whatsoever." The agreement further provides that neither side "shall commit any warlike or hostile act."

A new incident was reported today on the border between Israel and Jordan. An Israeli soddier, and two Joradnian guardsmen, were killed in an exchange of fire between border patrols. Each side accused the other of starting the action. (I coould like to discuss the Middle East situation further in a few minutes.)

In London today, Soviet premier Bulganin and Communist Party Boss Khruschev began their series of informal conferences with British leaders. At the suggestion of Prime Minister Eden, it was agreed that neither the progress nor the substance of the talks would be divulged, except by means of joint communiques. The first meeting was held in the cabinet room at No.10 Downing Street, and lasted two and a half hours.

British officials say the Soviets have suddenly eased their "jamming of British broadcasts beamed to Russia. They estimate that in the last 48 hours, the interference with these broadcasts has been reduced by 40 percent.

The council meeting of the Baghdad Pact ended in Teheran, with a pledge by the United States to give the anti-Communist alliance "moral and material support." Theu United States is not a member of the five-nation alliance. But the American observer at the meeting.. Deputy Under-Secretary of State Loy

Henderson..announced today that the United States would name a representative to the counter-subversion committee of the Baghdad Pact. Yesterday, he announced American membership in the economic committee, Henderson said the members of the pact -- Britain, Turkey, Pakistan, Iran and Iraq --"are making a great contribution to the preservation of freedom and security for the entire family of free nations."

My colleague, Bob Pierpoint, had an exclusive interview today with the head of the Chinese Nationalist government, Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek. Chiang told Pierpoint that Moscow's dissolution of the Cominform is "just another Russian effort to decieve the world." Chiang said it was a move to "soften" opposition to Communism in both Britain and the United States. And he predicted that Communist efforts to infiltrate will now be stepped up in Asia and the Middle East.

The atomic Energy Commission announced today that the hydrogen bomb test ..scheduled to be held in the South Pacific on May first..has been postponed until May 8th. The delay was attributed to " technical difficulties involved in making ready for the test."

The White House today described President Eisenhower as "very much gratified" by the preliminary approval of the international agency to carry out his atoms-for-peace program. For the particulars of that story, here is Bill Downs in Washington.

DOWNS: Something like a ray of hope for co-existence between mankind and the atom came out of Washington today, Ed, and, although it may be too early to say that international common sense has prevailed in controlling the terrible potentialities of the hydrogen bnd atomic bombs, an important step has been taken in that direction. What has happened is that twelve nations, including the United States and Russia, have agreed to set up an international atomic headquarters. There would be teams of inspectors to make sure that no nation was diverting the so-called peacetime atoms to military purposes and, generally speaking, the new international atomic energy agency would be the banker and broker of this new source of power and experiment. The general idea is to get the new science into the energy-starved areas of the world and make nuclear power available to those nations without the natural resources to develop their own projects.

Although not strictly a United Nations agency, it would make regular reports to the U.N. General Assembly and other interested U.N. groups. In event of a security violation of the U.N. Security Council would be advised but would not have the power of veto.

With the United States planning another hydrogen test explosion within the next three or four weeks in the Pacific, the establishment of the atoms for peace agency is highly significant and welcome news. Maybe after all there is such a thing as international common sense, nuclear or otherwide. This is Bill Downs in Washington. Now, back to Ed Murrow in New York.

MURROW: The House Appropriations Committee voted a billion, 200-million dollars today, for President Eisenhower to put a soil bank program into operation without delay. The committee vote was 35 to 7. Chairman Cannon said the money would enable Secretary Of Agriculture Benson to put into effect ..under existing laws in thesoil lan contempleted in the omnibus farm bill vetoed by the President on Monday. There is one difference. Democratic Representative Whitten of Mississippi, who helped draft the appropriations bill, says the new measure gives the President no authority to make advance payments to farmers this year for soil bank commitments next year. Today's actionwas a surprise manouver. The Amministration has held that special legislation is needed for a soil bank program, and Mr. Eisenhower requested such a bill in his veto message.

Secretary Benson testified before the Senate Agrigulture Committee today- and insisted that a soil bank program caonot be put into operation without new legislation. But new legislation, he said, is not required in order to raise support prices, as recommended by the President. Benson said, "The law already provides that basic commodities may be supported above the minimum levels specified in the flexible scale."

A federal jury today acquitted former Army Lieutenant Aldo Icardi on a charge of perjury. Icardi was accused of lying to a congressional committee three years ago, when he denied complicity in the murder of his commanding officer behind enemy lines in Italy during World War Two. The court directed the verdict of acquittal on the technicality that Icardi's testimony..even if false..could not have been material to the congressional inquiry.

News of the cease-fire between Egypt and Israel is an occasion for relief, rather than for excited expectations of an early peace settlement.

What is good in the news is that things aren't going to grow worse, at least for the time being. And in this respect it is much like the news earlier this week that the Soviet Union had agreed to work for settlement of the conflict thorugh the United Nations. The two developments have won time in which to try to make some real progress toward a real peace. They do not promise that peace will be achieved. The difficulties of getting it continue to be formidable and will need strong pressures for moderation and forebearance on both parties. And they need even more a demonstration that the Soviet Union wants a reasonable settlement, and is not simply shifting its tactics to enlarge its power.

The cease-fire, then, is a modest success. Still it is a very considerable one. And it once more attests tha value of the United Nations. It is not being cynical to say that the success is only negative in nature. The United Nations, as it stands, cannot aspire to more than this in such circumstances. It cannot solve the problems that produce tensions; it cannot knock heads together, or summon chiefs of state, to answer for their actions or policies. At best it can give voice to worldconcern when local fires threated to turn into a conflagration. But this it has done once more, and the success of Mr. Hammarskjold's mission is greatly to his personal credit, as well as an enhancement of the United Nation's prestige.

The Hammarskjold mission, however, is not fully staisfying Israeli desires The objection is not, to what he has done, but that he seems to have limited hi self to little more at this time. My colleague inston Burdett cables me from Jerusalem that Israeli leaders have tried their utmost to induce Mr. Hammarskjold to use his influence and authority to try to bring about direct negotiations between their country and Egypt. That they want him to do, Burdette says, it to take the initiative by proposing a "little summit meeting" between Colonel Nasser and Ben Gurion. If Nasser consented, they would consider it a long step forward, marking a radical change in Egypt's policy, and giving some promise of eventual settlement. If he refused, he would appear to be accepting responsibility for the failure to get a settlement.

But they find Mr. Hammarskjold dedicated to a course of caution staying strictly within his security council mandate, and taking one step at a time. Having obtained the cease-fire, his next objective is not something basic or far reaching. It is to get new border regulations and better facilities for U.N. observers, so that it will be easier to prevent the border explosions, that have been so nerve-wracking lately. It appears that Mr. Hammarskjold will return to New York without going much, if any, further.

The Israeli leaders say they want something more than gracious acceptance of the cease-fire. They want direct negotiations so that Egypt would at least imply the recognition of Israel. Without real negotiations they fear that Egypt will use the time now won simply to accelerate its warlike preparations.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Ted Pearson.

PEARSON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: In the role of peace maker, Dag Hammarskjold has made a notable start. If a final settlement is achieved, it probably will not be popular. Benjamin Franklin said, "I have never known a peace made, even the most advantageous, that was not cesuured as inadaquate, and the makers condemned as injudicious or corrupt.

Goodnight and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Fri., April 20, 1956

This is the news:

Russia has sent a note to the United States, protesting the hydrogen bomb test scheduled to be held in the South Pacific on May 8th. The test will be held near Eniwetok, in the Marshall Islands. The United States occupied the islands in World War Two... and now administers them as a trustee for the United Nations. According to the Moscow radio, the Russian note calls the test "incompatible with the aims and principles of the international trusteeship system... a violation of the most important principles of international law." Russia lodged a similar protest in the United Nations Trusteeship Council in February, and a Soviet-sponsored resolution to condemn the test died from lack of support. The trusteeship council did pass a resolution urging the United States to take precautions for the safety of the islanders. And the United States gave assurances that precautions would be taken.

The American ambassador to Moscow... Chip Bohlen... reported to President Eisenhower today on recent events in Russia, including the → downgrading of Stalin. Bohlen told reporters, "It was just a normal sort of report and estimate of events." He will leave for Moscow tomorrow, after two weeks of consultations in Washington.

Soviet Premier Bulganin, and Communist Party Boss Khrushchev, continued their talks with British leaders today in London. My colleague, Howard K.Smith, has been covering that story at first-hand. Here, direct from London, is his recorded report.

(tape runs 4:56
(ends on cue: "Back now
(to Ed Murrow in NY."

PL-73721

Admiral Carney, retired chief of naval operations, testified today before the Senate committee investigating the state of American air power. Carney said Russian military progress "could result in tacit stalemate, tantamount to disarmament." If that happens, he said, the research and development of new weapons would be "the guts of the whole business."

The American ambassador to the United Nations... Henry Cabot Lodge... said today that the danger of war in the Middle East has lessened. "But," he said, "we are not out of the woods." He said, that in achieving a cease-fire between Egypt and Israel, Secretary General Hammarskjold had done an outstanding job. Lodge also credited the "firm policy" of the President.

In Jerusalem today, Hammarskjold wound up three days of talks with Israeli leaders. An Israeli announcement says they discussed "special problems regarding the implementation of armistice agreements between Israel and Jordan and Syria respectively." On leaving Israel for his headquarters in Beirut, the capital of Lebanon, Hammarskjold said, "I am sure we are on the right road." Next week, he will visit Syria and Jordan, then return to Cairo for further talks with Egyptian leaders.

Israel accused Jordan today of again violating its frontier. An Israeli spokesman said Jordanian troops entered Israeli territory and opened fire on a military vehicle. No casualties were reported.

Egypt charged [redacted] that Israeli planes had violated its air space by flying over Gaza for three successive days. [redacted] Egypt said it regarded the flights as a breach of the cease-fire agreement and had protested to the mixed armistice commission. Israel denied the charge.

Premier Nasser of Egypt [redacted] flew to Saudi Arabia today for a meeting with King Saud of Saudi Arabia and King Ahmed of the Yemen. The two kings are expected to sign a bilateral pact, linking their countries to Egypt and Syria, which have already signed a separate military accord.

On Cyprus, the British governor has imposed new curfew restrictions on thirteen villages, in the largest mass reprisal since the start of rebel violence more than a year ago. The leader of the Communist Party on Cyprus escaped from British custody today, after being detained since last December.

And it was a bad day for the French in North Africa. Fifteen French soldiers were killed in action in Algeria, in the last 24 hours. The French say, that in the same period, they killed more than 200 nationalist guerrillas. A French civilian died when he was caught in a rebel ambush on a highway, only a few miles from Algiers.

In Washington, the United States Court of Appeals found today... in a 2-to-1 decision... that James Kutcher, a former G.I., had been fired improperly in 1948 from his job as a clerk in the Veterans Administration. Kutcher, who lost both legs in World War Two, had been charged with active membership in the Socialist Wprkers Party, an organization listed by the attorney general as subversive. Kutcher denied that the party advocates violent overthrow of the government. Last year, the Veterans Administration terminated his pension. But it was restored after a public hearing.

The Democratic National Committee today named House Speaker Rayburn as permanent chairman of the Democratic national convention. Other arrangements for the convention... including the selection of a keynote speaker... will be made next month.

National Chairman Butler warned Democratic leaders in Washington today that the party is confronted with a financial crisis. He said Democrats face "a very real danger" unless more money is raised for their campaign. The party, he said, has only 100-thousand dollars in the bank... while the Republicans have five million dollars in their war chest. A Republican spokesman says the figure is closer to four million.

The House Public Works Committee voted overwhelmingly today to send the highway bill to the House floor. The measure proposes a 51 and a half billion-dollar highway program, stretching over 13 years. The federal government would put up some 37 and a half billion dollars; the states would provide the rest. The measure also calls for an increase in the federal gasoline tax... from 2 to 3 cents a gallon.

The House Appropriations Committee cut 25 million dollars today from President Eisenhower's request for the government's overseas information program. The President had asked for 135-million dollars. The committee approved an appropriation of 110-million. Still, it is 22-million dollars more than the information program had to spend this year.

Word for Today

In discussing the possibility of improving East-West relations, Premier Bulganin quoted what he alleged was an old Russian proverb. "Moscow," he said, "was not built in a day." This, of course, is exactly the kind of situation Mark Twain had in mind when he remarked, "What a good thing Adam had! When he said a good thing, he knew nobody had said it before."

Goodnight and good luck!

CBS RADIO DIVISION

EDWARD R. MURROW

Friday, April 20, 1956
7:45-8:00 p.m.

MURROW: ..... Soviet Premier Bulganin and Communist Party boss Khrushchev continue their talks with British leaders today in London. My colleague, Howard K. Smith, has been covering that story at first-hand. Here, direct from London, is his recorded report.

SMITH: The only lucky break that Premier Bulganin and Mr. Khrushchev have had so far on their trip to Britain has been that Grace Kelly finally got married and got away on her honeymoon. The visit of the Russian leaders to their first western capital is probably one of the most important events of the year 1956, but until this afternoon it has been running a bad second, even in the newspapersof Great Britain, to the romantic developments at Monte Carlo and Villefranche on the Mediterranean. Partly because of this competition in the news the Russians' trip has so far failed to meet the expectations they had of repeating the popular success that their Cabinet colleague, Malenkov, won in touring this country earlier this month. Crowds have been small wherever Bulganin and Khrushchev have appeared in the three days of their visit so far. Cheers have been few and thin. In many places they have been received with boos instead of cheers as this afternoon, when they returned to their hotel after talks with Prime Minister Eden. This evening the two men got into a motor launch to go down the Thames for an official dinner at Greenwich, the place which marks zero degrees longitude on the world map. At Waterloo Bridge and along the river bank the small crowds of people who watched neither cheered nor booed but simply looked in cold, complete silence.

In fairness, the new Princess of Monaco, she is only partly the cause for this lack of popular acclaim for the Russians. One other cause is the most stringent security network that Scotland Yard has ever thrown around foreign visitors to Britain. In a country where not even the Queen or the Prime Minister has ever had a motorcycle escort, twenty-one motorcycle policemen packed themselves around the Russians' car and moved with it like a black cloud around it wherever it moves. Wherever they stop for some ceremony or to pay a visit, police and plain clothesmen become thicker on the ground than spectators and the police do something that I have seen in other countries but never before here. They face not the men they're guarding; they face the public they are guarding the men from. There seems to be a grim resolve that death may in time come to Bulganin and Khrushchev but it will not be permitted to come on British soil.

Still another reason for the absence of popular enthusiasm is no doubt the simple fact that Britons are rather angry at these two visitors Last year Bulganin and Khrushchev paid a visit to India and Burma, two places where Britain's reputation for granting freedom to dependencies is very good. There the Russians proceeded to brand Britain a colonial exploiter and they even went so far in speeches as to suggest that it was not Hitler but Britain and the United States who started World War 11. Those insults were sorely felt here and ordinary people are still far from ready to forgive the men who perpetrated them.

Finally, one last reason for the coolness of the reception is that it is a deliberate act of the British Government's policy. The Soviet sent Malenkov last month as a kind of dry run to see what their visit would be like. However, not only the Russians but also the British learned something from that dry run. The British concluded in particular that they could not allow B. and K. to repeat the baby-kissing, back-slapping, Robert Burns quoting propaganda success that Malenkov had enjoyed. To prevent it, the Government here prepared an exceedingly tight schedule of serious sightseeing and more serious negotiating for the visitors. The timetable leaves the two men almost no time to try to break the police cordon and warm up the rather chilly audiences by the Malenkov approach even if that were possible. Yesterday, for example, the Soviet leaders had no sooner fulfilled the barest formalities of arrival, like signing the visitors' book at Buckingham Palace, before they were escorted into the Prime Minister's residence at 10 Downing Street. Doors were locked and serious talks were begun. This morning, early, they were escorted back to No. 10 for more talks and this afternoon back again for still more. They will talk some more at Chequers over the week-end and after one day off for a visit to the north more talks at No. 10 on Tuesday. A communique tonight said they had covered Europe yesterday, the Middle East this morning and disarmament this afternoon.

Curiously, despite the public unenthusiasm here, people in Britain have a good deal of solid hope that something good may come out of this visit. The formula, they say, calls for firm treatment and firm treatment the visitors will get.

Back now to Ed Murrow in New York.

Ed.trans.-A.A.Cardiff (30)

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

FRIDAY, APRIL 20, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

Russia has sent a note to the United States, protesting the hydrogen bomb test scheduled to be held in the South Pacific on May 8th. The test will be held near Eniwetok, in the Marshall Islands. The United States occupied the islands in World War Two and now administers them as a trustee for the United Nations. According to the Moscow radio, the Russian note calls the test "incompatible with the aims and principles of the international trusteeship system..a violation of the most important principles of international law." Russia lodged a similar protest in the United Nations Trusteeship Council in February, and a Soviet sponsored resolution to condemn the test died from lack of support. The Trusteeship council did pass a resolution urging the United States to take precautions for the safety of the islanders. And the United States gave assurances that precautions would be taken.

The American ambassador to Moscow..Chip Bohlen..reported to President Eisenhower today on the recent events in Russia, including the downgrading of Stalin. Bohlen told reporters, "It was just a normal sort of report and estimate of events." He will leave for Moscow tomorrow, after two weeks of consultations in Washington.

Soviet Premier Bulganin and Communist Party Boss Khrushchev continued their talks with British leaders today in London. My colleague, Howard K. Smith, has been covering the story at first-hand. Here, direct from London, is hes recorded report.

SMITH: The only lucky break that Premier Bulganin and Mr. Khrushchev have had so far on their trip to Britain has been that Grace Kelly finally got married and got away on her honeymoon. The visit of the Russian leaders ot their first western capital is probably one of the most important events of the year 1956, but until this afternoon it has been running a bad second, even in the newspapers in Great Britain, to the romantic developments at Monte Carlo and Villefranche on the Mediterranean. Partly because of this competition in the news the Russians' trip has so far failed to meet the expectations they had of repeating the popular success that their cabinet colleague, Malenkov, won in touring this country earlier this month. Crowds have been small wherever Bulganin and Khurshchev have appeared in the three days of their visit so far. Cheers have been few and thin. In many places they have been received with boos instead of cheers as this afternoon, when they returned to their hotel after talks with Prime Minister Eden. This evening the two men got into a motor launch to go down the Thames for an official dinner at Greenwich, the place which marks zero degrees longitude on the world map. At Waterloo Bridge and along the river bank the small crowds of people who marched neither cheered nor booed but simply looked in cold, complete silence.

In fairness, the new Princess of Monaco, she is only partly the cause for this lack of popular acclaim for the Russians. One other cause is the most stringent security network that Scotland Yard has ever thrown around foreign visitors to Britain. In a country where not even the Queen or the Prime Minister has ever had a motorcycle escort, twenty-one motorcycle policemen packed themselves around the Russians' car and moved with it like a black cloud around it wherever it moves. Wherever they stop for some ceremony or to pay a visit, police and plain clothesmen become thicker on the ground than spectators and the police to something that I have seen in other countries but never before here. They face not the men they're guarding; they face the public they are guarding the men from. There seems to be a grim resolve that death may in time come to Bulganin and Khrushchev but it will not be permitted to come on British soil.

Still another reason for the absence of popular enthusiasm is no doubt the simple fact that Britons are rather angry at these two visitors. Last year Bulganin and Khrushchev paid a visit to India and Burma, two places where Britain's reputation for granting freedom to dependencies is very good. There the Russians proceeded to brand Britain a colonial exploiter and they even went so far in speeches as to suggest that it was not Hitler but Britain and the United States who started World War II. Those insults were sorely felt here and ordinary people are still far from ready to forgive the men who perpetrated them.

Finally, one last reason for the coolness of the reception is that it is a deliberate act of the British Government's policy. The Soviet sent Malenkov last month as a kind of dry run to see what their visit would be like. However, not only the Russians but also the British learned something from that dry run. The British concluded in particular that they could not allow B. & K to repeat the baby-kissing, back-slapping, Robert Burns quoting propaganda success that Malenkov enjoyed. To prevent it, the Government here prepared an exceedingly tight schedule of serious sightseeing and more serious negotiating for the visitors. The timetable leaves the two men almost no time to try to break the police cordon and warm up the rather chilly audiences by the Malenkov approach even if that were possible. Yesterday, for example, the Soviet leaders had no sooner fulfilled the barest formalities of arrival, like signing the visitors book at Buckingham Palace, before they were escorted to the Prime Minister's residence at 10 Downing Street. Doors were locked and serious talks were begun. This morning, early, they were escorted back to Number 10 for more talks and this afternoon back again for still more. They will talk some more at Chequers over the week-end and after one day off for a visit to the north more talks at Number 10 on Tuesday. A communique tonight said they had covered Europe yesterday, the Middle East this morning and disarmament this afternoon.

Curiously, despite the public unenthusiasm, the people in Britain have a good deal of solid hope that something good man come out of this visit. The formula, they say, calls for firm treatment and firm treatemet the visitors will get.

Back now to Ed Murrow in New York.

MURROW: Admiral Carney, retired chief of naval operations, testified today before the Senate committee investigating the state of American air power. Carney said Russian military progress "could result in tacit stalement tantamount to disarmement." If that happens, he said, the research and development of new weapons would be "the guts of the whole business."

The American ambassador to the United Nations..Henry Cabot Lodge..said today that the danger of war in the Middle East has lessened. "But", he said, "we are not out of the woods." He said that in achieving a cease-fire between Egypt and Israel, Secretary General Hammarskjold had done an outstanding job. Lodge also credited the "firm policy" of the President.

In Jerusalem today, Hammarskjold wound up three days of talks with Israeli leaders. An Israeli announcement says they discussed "special problems regarding the implementation of armistice agreements between Israel and Jordan and Syria respectively." On leaving Israel for his headquarters in Beirut, the capital of Lebanon, Hammarskjold said, "I am sure we are on the right road." Next week, he will visit Syria and Jordan, then return to Cairo for further talks with the Egyptian leaders.

Israel accused Jordan today again of violating its frontier. An Israeli spokesman said Jordanian troops entered Israeli territory and opened fire on a military vehicle. No casualties were reported.

Egypt charged that Israeli planes had violated its air space by flying over Gaza for three successive days. Egypt said it retarded the flights as a breach of the cease-fire agreement and had protested to the mixed armistice commission. Ismael denied the charge.

Premier Nasser of Egypt flew to Saudi Arabia today for a meeting with King Saud of Saudi Arabia and King Ahmend of Yemen. The two kings are expected to sign a bilateral pact, linking their countries to Egypt and Syria which have already signed a separate military accord.

On Cyprus, the British governor had imposed new curfew restrictions on thirteen villages in the largest mass reprisal since the start of rebel violence more than a year ago. The leader of the Communist party on Cyprus escaped from British custody today , after being detained since last December.

And it was a bad day for the French in North Africa. Fifteen French soldiers were killed in action in Algeria in the last 24 hours. The French say that in the same period they killed more than 200 nationalist guerillas. A French civilian died when he was caught in a rebel ambush in a highway, only a few miles from Algiers.

In Washington, the United States Court of Appeals found today..in a 2 to 1 decision..that James Kutcher, a former G.I., had been fired improperly in 1948 from his job as a clerk in the Veterans Administration. Kutcher, who lost both legs in World War Two, had been charged with active membership in the Socialist Workers Party, an organization listed by the attorney general as subversive. Kutcher denied that the party advocates violent overthrow of the government. Last year, the Veterans Administration terminated his pension. But it was restored after a public hearing.

The Democratic National Committee today namend House Speaker Rayburn as permanent chairman of the Democratic National convention. Other arrangements for the convention..including the selection of a keynote speaker..will be made next month.

National Chairman Butler warned Democratic leaders in Washington today that the party is confronted with a financial crisis . He said Democrats face a "very real danger" unless more money is raised for their campaign. The party, he said, has only 100-thousand dollars in the bank..while the Republicans have five million dollars int their war chest. A Republican spokesman says the figure is closer to four million.

The House Public Works committee voted overwhelmingly today to send the Highway bill to the House floor. The measure purposes a 51 and a half billion-dollar highway program, stretching over 13 years. The federal government would put up some 37 and a half billion dollars; the states would provide the rest. The measure also calls for an increase in the federal gasoline tax..from 2 to 3 cents a gallon.

The House Appropriations Committee cut 25 million dollars today from President Eisenhower's request for the government's overseas information program. The President had asked for 135-million dollars. The committee approved an appropriation of 110 million. Still, it is 22 million dollars more than the information program had to spend this year.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: In discussing the possibility of improving East-West relations, Premier Bulganin quoted what he alleged was an old Russian proverb. "Moscow", he said, "was not built in a day." This, of course, is exactly the kind of situation Mark Twain had in mind when he remarked, "What a good thing Adam had. When he said a good thing, he knew nobody had said it before."

Good Night and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Mon., April 23, 1956

This is the news:

Secretary of State Dulles said today the time has come to make the North Atlantic Treaty Organization something more than a military pact. He indicated its purpose should be broadened... to benefit member countries in the economic and cultural fields. Mr. Dulles was addressing the annual Associated Press luncheon, here in New York. Last Saturday, President Eisenhower also made a major foreign policy speech. And I should like to discuss both speeches in a few minutes.

In Britain today, the visit of Soviet Premier Bulganin and Communist Party Boss Khrushchev turned sour. In a speech at an industrial fair in Birmingham, Khrushchev boasted that Russia "very soon" will have a missile with a hydrogen bomb warhead "which can hit any point in the world." Russia, he said, has already dropped a hydrogen bomb from an airplane... something he said no other country has done. He claimed the American hydrogen blast had been from a ground installation. Khrushchev made his boast in discussing the embargo on shipment of strategic goods to Russia. He asked, "Do you think you are preventing us from doing anything?" And then he made the boast about hydrogen missiles capable of hitting any part of the world. My colleague, Alex Kendrick, cables from London that there was more than a trace of exasperation in Khrushchev's words. Kendrick says this may be because his talks with British leaders are getting practically nowhere, and the Communist Party boss is sounding off his resentment that the British don't "charm" as easily as the governments of India, Burma and Afghanistan last summer, when Khrushchev and Bulganin made their Asian tour. In any case, Kendrick says, by rattling the H-bomb Khrushchev struck exactly the wrong note.

In Washington, Democratic Senator Symington said the Russian statement... if true... is "a significant and terrible warning to the free world." Symington is chairman of a Senate committee investigating the state of American airpower. Secretary of the Air Force Quarles commented he would not "want to assume that Khrushchev does not know what he is talking about." Soviet possession of such a missile, he said, will seem quick no matter when it happens. But Quarles predicted that the piloted bomber will be the "preferred" means of delivering atomic or hydrogen bombs for at least the next five years. Khrushchev, he said, spoke in generalities.

It was revealed today... in Moscow... that the presidium of the Supreme Soviet has set up a special watchdog committee to check on the activities of all security organizations in Russia, including the secret police. The decision... tightening party control... was reached at a meeting of the presidium on April 7th.

United Nations Secretary General Hammarskjold conferred for two hours today with Syrian leaders in Damascus. Syria is the fourth country Hammarskjold has visited on his peace mission to the Middle East. There was no announcement on the results of today's meeting.

Britain has called on Yemen, the smallest of the Arab states, to withdraw its tribesmen from the adjoining British protectorate of Aden, on the Red Sea. The tribesmen staged a raid last Wednesday, and reportedly stayed on the territory.

On Cyprus, three more persons have met violent deaths. A Turkish policeman was killed in Nicosia, while chasing three gunmen who had tried to kill another police officer. Another Turkish Cypriot was shot to death by unknown assailants. And a British soldier died of wounds received in a rebel ambush last night. ~~Rioting between Greek and Turkish Cypriots was broken up today by British troops.~~

France reports a new action against rebel nationalists in Western Algeria. Nationalist forces are reported routed after a two-hour attack. But in accordance with new French policy, no casualty figures are given.

Talks opened in London today looking toward the granting of independence to Singapore. The meeting is being attended by representatives of all political parties in the colony. The British colonial secretary, Alan Lennox-Boyd, welcomed them as representing "the will and belief of the people of Singapore" that they are able to manage their own affairs.

On Formosa, the Chinese Nationalists report a new artillery duel between Communist batteries on the mainland and Nationalist forces on the island of Quemoy. A Nationalist communique says the Reds fired 340 rounds. It reports two civilians killed.

The Supreme Court today banned racial segregation on buses operating within states. The court refused... unanimously... to review a decision by the United States Circuit Court in Richmond, that segregation on buses operating within a state is contrary to the Constitution. In 1946, the Supreme Court declared segregation on buses traveling between states unconstitutional. ~~Thus, today's action... together with the recent order by the Interstate Commerce Commission prohibiting segregation on buses and trains that cross state lines, in effect places a ban on racial segregation on all public transportation.~~ Twelve ~~Thirteen~~ states have laws requiring segregation on public transportation within their borders. One of them is Alabama. And there is speculation how today's Supreme Court action will affect the Negro boycott of public buses in Montgomery.

→

Edward R. Murrow: April 23, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

In the course of President Eisenhower's ~~address~~ speech to the newspaper editors in Washington Saturday night, he said that our aim must be to strengthen the close bonds within the Atlantic community, and announced that Secretary Dulles would speak today on that subject. Today Mr. Dulles called for NATO to be developed into more than a military pact. "The time has come" he said, "to advance NATO from its initial phase into the totality of its meaning."

This, to be sure, is no new idea. Economic development of NATO was much discussed at the last NATO Council meeting. But aides of Mr. Dulles suggested today that Mr. Dulles's speech might prove to be comparable to the address Secretary George Marshall delivered at Harvard which was the forerunner of the Marshall Plan.

Mr. Dulles did not produce a blueprint of what NATO might become. Well, neither did General Marshall in his Harvard address. What Mr. Dulles said was that NATO must consider further development if the alliance was to serve the needs of this and coming generations. "If that is the desire of NATO member nations" he said, "the United States will join eagerly in exploring the possibilities that now beckon us forward." He promised that the possibilities are to be taken up at the coming NATO council meeting in Paris on May fourth. He stressed that it was not enough for the free world to be united against something, it also must unite for something. "Our peoples" he declared, "have many common aspirations and interests that go far beyond the instinct of self-preservation." He gave his particular blessing to the trend toward closer integration of West European countries, as in the coal and steel community and the projected organism that is to control the joint use of atoms for peace in Europe. However, if there is to be a Dulles plan, or anything like the Marshall Plan, it was being kept carefully under wraps.

Both President Eisenhower and Mr. Dulles were pointing to the new direction of American foreign policy, with its accent on economic rather than military development. Not only did they touch on the future of NATO, they stressed the changes in Soviet policy. Notably absent from both speeches was any emphasis on massive retaliation. Clearly it is not considered desirable now to talk about it. Instead both speakers showed a cautious interest in the changes in Kremlin behavior. Mr. Eisenhower made it one of the three principles of American policy to induce the Kremlin to correct injustices and work for peaceful purposes. The President did not shut his eyes to the changes that need to be made before the free world can feel at ease. But he said that the legitimate interests and purposes of the United States do not conflict with those of the Soviet Union. "A Soviet Government genuinely devoted to these purposes" he declared, "can have friendly relations with the United States and the free world for the asking. We will welcome that day."

Mr. Dulles today spoke of advancing "the inevitable day when the historic friendship between the Russian and American peoples can again be fully manifested." And he took satisfaction from the fact "that we can today see within Russia some signs of light which could mark the dawning of that new day". One reason for the new look in Soviet policy, he said, was the unity and strength of free nations. But another reason was that forces of liberalization are at work within the Soviet bloc, and are powerful enough to require response, or at least appearance of response. "All this" he declared, "is immensely important. It is more than the free world dared to hope a few years ago."

I have said that both the President and Mr. Dulles were cautious in showing their interest in the changes in the Kremlin. The President pointed out that Germany was still divided; that the European satellites are still ruled by Soviet puppets, and Korea still is divided. Mr.

Dulles's catalogue of deficiencies was longer. "Stalin has been demoted" he said, "but we have not yet seen in the Soviet bloc the reality of representative government. The Soviet leaders profess to have renounced violence, but press feverishly to develop their military establishment, particularly nuclear weapons and the means to deliver them." In Asia and the Near East, he said, Soviet leaders have become merchants of hatred and fomenters of violence. In Japan, Soviet policy is still ugly. And if the Kremlin has admitted some of the lies of the Stalin regime, it has not repudiated two of the most outrageous lies perpetrated by Stalin, the lie that South Korea was the aggressor in the Korean war, and that the United States used germ warfare against the Chinese communists.

However, no two speeches by the top policy makers in Washington in recent years have been more friendly to the Russians, and this the world is bound to note. Today it was the irrepressible Khrushchev who brandished the hydrogen bomb, dropping it, so to speak, on any spot on the planet. This too the world will note. And Mr. Khrushchev thereby handed Washington a notable propaganda victory. ~~I might say that~~ And such victories have not come so often as not to be appreciated.

Word for Today

There is a new accent on economics in the contest between East and West. This is good, for as General Marshall said, "The emphasis placed solely on the military aspects of world affairs does a disservice to the cause of peace. The more present differences are talked about and treated exclusively as a military problem," he said, "the more they tend to become so."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

MONDAY, APRIL 23, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

Secretary of State Dulles said today the time has come to make the North Atlantic Treaty Organization something more than a military pact. He indicated its purpose should be broadened ..to benefit member countries. in the economic and cultural fields. Mr. Dulles was addressing the annual Associated Press Luncheon, here in New York. Last Saturday, President Eisenhower also made a major foreign policy speech. And I should like to discuss both speeches in a few minutes.

In Britain today, the visit to Soviet Premier Bulganin and Communist Party Boss Khrushchev turned sour. In a speech at an industrial fair in Birmingham Khrushchev boasted that Russian "very soon" will have a missile with a hydrogen bomb warhead "which can hit any point in the world." Russia, he said, has already dropped a hydrogen bomb from an airplane ..something he said no other country has done. He claimed the American hydrogen blast had been from a ground installation. Khrushchev made his boast in discussing the embargo on shipment of strategic goods to Russia. He asked, "Do you think you are preventing us from doing anything?" And then he made the boast about hydrogen missiles capable of hitting any part of the world. My colleague, Alex Kendrick, cables from London that there was more than a trace of exasperation in Khrushchev's words. Kendrick says this may be because his talks with British leaders are getting practically nowhere, and the Communist Party boss is sounding off his resentment that the British don't "charm" as easily as the governments of India, Burma, and Afghanistan last summer, when Khrushchev and Bulganin made their Asian tour. In any case, Kendrick says, by rattling the H-bomb Khrushchev struck exactly the wrong note.

In Washington, Democratic Senator Symington said the Russian statemnt... if true..is "a significant and terrible warning to the free world." Symington is chairman of a Senate committee investigating the state of American airpower. Secretary of the Air Force Quarles commented he would not " want to assume that Khrushchev does not know what he is talking about." Soviet possession of such a missile, he said, will seem quick no matter when it happens. But Quarles predicted that the piloted bomber will be the "preferred" means of delivering atomic or hydrogen bombs for at least the next five years. Khrushchev he said, spoke in generalities.

It was revealed today..in Moscow..that the presidium of the Supreme Court has set up a special watchdog committee to check on the activities of all security organizationsin Russia, including the Secret police. The decision.. tightening party control..was reached at a meeting of the presiduum on April 7th.

United Nations Secretary General Hammarskjold conferred for two hours today with Syrian leaders in Damascus. Syria is the fourth country Hammarskjold has visited in his peace mission to the Middle East. There was no announcement on the results of today's meeting.

On Cyprus, three more persons have met violent deaths. A Turkish policeman was killed in Nicosia while chasing three gunmen who had tried to kill another police officer. Another Turkish Cypriot was shot to death by an unknown assailants. And a British soldier died of wounds received in a rebel ambush last night.

France reports a new action against rebel nationalists in Western Algeria. Nationalist forces are reported routed after a two-hour attack. But in accoradnce wit new French policy, no casualty figures are given.

Talks opened in London today looking toward the granting of independence to Singapore. The meeting is being attended by representatives of all political parties in the colony. The British colonial secretary, Alan Lennox-Boyd, welcomed them as representing "the will and belief of the people of Singapore" that they are able to manage their own affairs.

On Formosa, the Chinese Nationalists report a new artillery duel between Communist batteries on the mainland and Nationalist forces on the island of Quemoy. A nationalist communique says the Reds fired 340 rounds. It reports two civilians killed.

The Supreme Court today banned racial segregation on buses operating within states. The court refused..unanimously..to review a decision by the United Circuit Court in Richmond, that segregation on buses operating within a state is contrary to the Constitution. In 1946, the Supreme Court declared segregation on busses traveling between states unconstitutional. Twelve states have laws requiring segregation on public transportation within their borders. One of them is Alabama. And there is speculation how today's Supreme Court action will effect the Negro boycott of public buses in Montgomery.

In the course of President Eisenhower's speech to the newspaper editors in Washington Saturday night, he said that our aid must be to strengthen the close bonds within the Atlantic community, and announced that Secretary Dulles world speak today on that subject. Today Mr. Dulles called for NATO to be developed into more than a military pact. "The time has come" he said, "to advance NATO from its initial phase into the totality of its meaning."

This, to be sure, is no new idea. Economic development of NATO was much discussed at the last NATO Council meeting. But aides of Mr. Dulles suggested today that Mr. Dulles's speech might prove to be comparable to the address Secretary George Marshall delivered at Harvard which was the forerunner of the Marshall Plan.

Mr. Dulles did not produce a blueprint of what NATO might become. Well, neither did General Marshall in his Harvard address. What Mr. Dulles said was that NATO must consider further developement if the alliance was to serve the needs of this and coming generations. "If that is the desire of NATO member nations", he said, "The United States will join eagerly in exploring the possibilities that now beckon us forward." He promised that the possibilities are to be taken up at the coming NATO Council meeting in Paris on May fourth. He stressed that it was not enough for the free world to be united against something, it also must unite for something. "Our peoples" he declared, "have many common aspirations and interests that go far beyond the instinct of self preservation." He gave his particular blessing to the trend toward closer integration of West European countries, as in the coal and steel community and the projected organism that is to control the joint use of atoms for peace in Europe. However, if there is to be a Dulles plan,or anything like the Marshall Plan, it was being kept carefullu under wraps.

Both President Eisenhower and Mr. Dulles were pointing to the new direction of American foreign policy, with its accent on economic rather than military development. Not only did they touch on the future of NATO, they stressed the changed in Soviet policy. Notably absent from both speeches was any emphasis on massive retaliation. Clearly it is not considered desirable now to talk about it. Instead both speakers showed a cautions interest in the changes in Kremlin behavior. Mr. Eisenhower made it one of the three principles of American policy to induce the Kremlin to correct injustices and work for peaceful purposes. The President did not shut his eyes to the changes that need to me made before the free world can feel at ease. But he said that the legitimate interests and purposes of the United States do not conflict with those of the Soviet Union. " A Soviet Government genuinely devoted to these purposes" he declared, "can have freindly relations with the United States and the free world for the asking. We will welcome that day".

Mr. Dulles today spoke of advancing "the inevitable day when the historic friendship between the Russian and American peoples can again be fully manifested." And he took satisfaction from the fact "that we can today see within Russia some signs of light which could mark the dawning of that new day." One reason for the new look is Soviet policy he said, was unity and strength of free nations. But another reason was that forces of liberaliza ion are at work within the Soviet bloc, and are powerful enough to require response, or at least appearance of response."All this" he declared, "is immensely important. It is more than the free world dared to hope a few years ago."

I have said that both the President and Mr. Dulles were cautions in showing ing their interest in the changes in the Kremlin. The President pointed out thet Germany was still divided; that the European satellites are still ruled by Sovict puppets, and Korea is divided. Mr. Dulles's catalogue of deficiencies was longer. "Stalin has been demoted" he said, "but we have not yet seen in the Soviet bloc the reality of representative government. The Soviet leaders profess to have renounced violence, but press feverishly to develop their military establishemnt, particularly nuclear weapons and the means to deliver them." In Asia and the Near East, he said, Soviet leaders have become merchants of hatred and formenters of violence. In Japan, Soviet policy is still ugly. And if the Kremlin has admiteed some of the lies of the Stalin regime, it has not repudiated two of the most outragious lies perpetrated by Stalin, the lie that South Kroea was the aggressor in the Korean war, and that the United States used germ warfare against the Chinese Communists.

However, no two speeches by the top policy makers in Washington in recent years have been more friendly to the Russians, and this the world is bound to note. Today it was the irrepressible Khrushchevv who brandished the hydrogen bomb, dropping it, so to speak, on any spot on the planet. This too the world will note. And Mr. Khrushchev thereby handed Washington a notable propaganda victory. And such victories have not come so often as not to be appreciated.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: There is a new accent on economics in the contest between East and West. This is good, for as General Marshall said, "The emphasis placed solely on the military aspects of world affairs does a didservice to the cause of peace. The more present differences are talked about and treated exclusively as a military problem," he said, "the more they tend to become so."

Goodnight and good luck.

Edward R. Murrow Tues., April 24, 1956

This is the news:

The Democrats introduced a new farm bill today, authorizing the Administration to carry out a "soil bank" program. The bill was introduced by Chairman Cooley of the House Agriculture Committee, who says it will give President Eisenhower everything he asked for, except authority to make advance payments to farmers, promising to take land out of production. Introduction of the new measure, marks a change in Democratic strategy. When Mr. Eisenhower vetoed the first farm bill (because it called for high, rigid supports, as well as the soil bank), he requested separate legislation, authorizing a soil bank program. The Democrats replied that no authorizing measure was needed... that the Administration already had authority, under existing law. And the House Appropriations Committee went ahead and voted a billion, 200-million dollars to finance the program. Now, consideration of that money bill has been put over until next week, and the Democrats have introduced the legislation they once said was unnecessary. Tomorrow, the Republicans are scheduled to introduce their own farm measure.

→

The Agriculture Department today estimated 1956 farm income at 10-billion, 400-million dollars. That's 400-million less than last year, or a drop of about 5 percent.

Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey told Republican congressional leaders today, there is not much chance of a tax cut this year. Humphrey questioned the prediction of the Senate-House economic committee that the budget would show a two-billion-dollar surplus. And Republican Senator Knowland says that if the surplus should amount to two billion dollars, he would favor applying it to the national debt.

Secretary of State Dulles said today the idea of broadening the function of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization will be discussed next week at the NATO council meeting in Paris. Dulles said in a New York speech yesterday that the time had come for making NATO something more than a purely military alliance, in view of Russia's new emphasis on economics. Dulles told reporters today the alliance should be made to endure in the interest of unity. He said such an organization... created to meet an emergency... "either grows or tends to dry up."

In London, the British Foreign Office has welcomed Mr. Dulles' suggestion that NATO be something more than a military alliance. The idea has also been favorably received in Paris and Bonn.

The London visit of Soviet Premier Bulganin and Communist Party Boss Khrushchev was marked tonight by a reception at Claridge's Hotel, attended by four thousand guests. The Russian embassy ~~picked up the tab.~~ Paid the bill. Among the guests was Harold Stassen, President Eisenhower's special adviser on disarmament. When Stassen and Khrushchev met, the Russian invited Stassen into a private room for a discussion, and one report says they had a two-hour talk. A reporter asked Stassen afterward if they had made progress toward an agreement on disarmament. Stassen's answer was that it had been a friendly discussion... very thorough... and that it had been sufficiently important for him to send an immediate report to the President. Earlier in the day, Khrushchev and Bulganin visited the House of Commons while it was in session. The Russian leaders heard a member suggest that the 100th anniversary of the end of the Crimean War should be marked by some kind of [redacted] celebration. Britain opposed Russia in that war, and Prime Minister Eden replied, "I do not think we need to go back 100 years. I think we should look forward, rather, to the next 20 or 30 years."

Syria announced today that it was prepared to respect a cease-fire with Israel. And United Nations Secretary General Hammarskjold... who had been conferring with Syrian leaders... flew to Amman, the capital of Jordan, to continue his efforts there to achieve a lessening of tensions between Israel and the Arab states.

Israel announced today that four Israeli civilians were killed last night in an ambush, less than a mile from the Jordan frontier. United Nations investigators tracked the attackers into Jordan. Israeli Foreign Minister Sharett called the incident "an outrage", bearing all the signs of another commando raid.

On Cyprus, British paratroopers today searched every home in the Greek quarter of Nicosia. All male residents of the quarter... boys as well as men... were fingerprinted, and new curfew restrictions imposed. The action was taken after an outbreak between Greek and Turkish Cypriots, in which two Turks were killed and several shops in the Greek community were set on fire.

Today in Athens, the cabinet refused to accept the resignation of the Greek foreign minister. He had been attacked by the Greek Cypriots as showing softness toward Britain in the Cyprus dispute.

In Montgomery, Alabama, the police commissioner has ordered the arrest of any passenger or bus driver involved in [redacted] desegregation on the [redacted] public buses. The police order was issued after the bus company said it was abandoning segregation, in the light of yesterday's Supreme Court ruling that segregation on intra-state buses is unconstitutional. Leaders of the Negro boycott of the buses say there will be no change in their position. The boycott will continue for the time being.

In Baton Rouge, a state judge today ordered a permanent ban on activities of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in Louisiana. The judge based his injunction on a 32-year-old law designed to curb activities of the Ku Klux Klan. The N.A.A.C.P. says it will appeal.

Presidential primaries were held today in Pennsylvania, Massachusetts and Alaska. So far, there are no returns.

Edward R. Murrow: April 24, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

It is just a year ago today that the Asian-African conference at Bandung came to a close. By now that conference is closely associated in the public mind with the struggle of subject peoples for independence. To look back on it after a year is to realize, even more than at the time, that it was one of the most significant of the postwar conferences. In the year since that meeting, liberation has made remarkable gains. Sudan has achieved its independence, Malaya has come to the point where it is assured it next year, Morocco and Tunis have won [redacted] sovereign status, and Algeria is far along the same road. Quite a record for a single year.

The Bandung conference did not produce these specific advances. But it gave expression to the deep surge for liberation which the two world wars set in motion. This process of liberation might be called a heartening aspect of the present era that helps balance off such disheartening aspects as the hydrogen and plutonium bombs, inter-continental missiles and the cold war. Bandung by being associated with this aspect has become something of a symbol of encouragement.

When the Colombo powers first decided to call an Asian-African conference, a flurry of suspicion swept the Western countries. They thought the occasion would see a familiar attack on colonialism, from which only the communists would benefit. But both the State Department and the British Foreign Office had second and wiser thoughts, and did their best to make the Bandung delegates feel that their meeting was welcomed in the West.

Bandung didn't turn out to be a defeat of the West and a communist victory. It turned out to be something that had not been sufficiently understood, the first appearance on the world stage of a new alignment of peoples, most of them non-white peoples, who were formulating and announcing their common interests. It was really an astonishing meeting, for it brought together representatives of twenty-nine nations and of fifty-three percent of the world's population. It actually represented the majority of mankind meeting for the first time in history. One could not complain that such a meeting had come so late. It couldn't have come sooner. Only ten of its members had been independent before World War II.

A great deal happened at Bandung, but by all odds the most important thing about it was that the conference was held. And the next most important thing will come when it meets again. For then the Asian-African co-operation will be more than a one-time phenomenon. There was talk at Bandung of annual meetings, and Premier Nasser was busy drumming up support for the next meeting to be held at Cairo. The Bandung leaders however, decided for bi-annual meetings - decided, too, not to set up a permanent secretariat, nor to be too closely organized. So a meeting is not to be convening at this time in Egypt which, to put it mildly, would not offer as composed a setting as Indonesia. But a year from now, another meeting is due, and Africa is entitled to be the next host. Cairo happens to be the only African capital with facilities to take care of such a big conference. One must hope that by then the Middle East will have quieted down.

It is interesting to note that the big debate at Bandung would not be so vehement, if it were to be held this year. It was between the pro-Western members and the neutralists, over membership in Western defense pacts. You may recall that the conference did not in the end denounce the pacts. Its final resolution, very much of a United Nations document in spirit, recognized the right of states to join regional defense pacts, as well as their right not to join them. But in the year since Bandung, the West has been changing its priorities. Washington no longer makes partnership in defense measures a condition for granting aid. This year it has been studying how to make SEATO more economic, and now is talking of doing the same for NATO. This change, to be sure, has nothing first-hand to do with Bandung. It is chiefly the result of the Kremlin's drive to extend Soviet power through an economic offensive. But most of the nations needing economic development are in Asia and Africa. So the Bandung members are interested most of all. It makes a huge difference to them that the cold war is taking this turn. They now can have offers from two sides, and the American offers no longer necessitate a semi-military tie-in. This is a post-Bandung manifestation. ~~It could not have been foreseen at the first meeting. But it is in line with what the Asian and African countries want. For now comes a titanic competition between the West and the Communist bloc for the right to aid them.~~

~~That is not saying that the Western defense systems no longer are important. They still may be needed to defend free countries.~~ But the ~~big change is that the West now believes that freedom is as much an economic as a military problem. And in deciding so, it has moved closer to the Bandung countries. It is true that the West suffered a serious loss in the defeat in Ceylon of Prime Minister Sir John Kotelawala. He had been the most forceful critic of Soviet colonialism at Bandung. But with the West's own shift of priorities, this setback is not particularly damaging. And that of itself shows how far the West is moving.~~

Ted Pearson—

Word for Today

There has been among the colonial peoples a drive toward independence that has been remarkable for its achievement. Santayana said, "Declarations of independence make nobody really independent." But the new free nations... and those striving for nationhood... would still say with Thoreau, "I was not born to be forced. I will breathe after my own fashion."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

TUESDAY, APRIL 24, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

The Democrats introduced a new farm bill today authorizing the Administration to carry out a "soil bank" program. The bill was introduced by Chairman Cooley of the House Agriculture Committee, who says it will give President Eisenhower everything he asked for, except authority to make advance payments to farmers promising to take land out of production. Introduction of the new measure marks a change in Democratic strategy. When Mr. Eisenhower vetoed the first farm bill (because it called for high, rigid supports, as well as the soil bank), he requested separate legislation authorizing a soil bank program. The Democrats replied that no authorizing measure was needed..that the Administration already has authority under existing law. And the House Appropriations Committee went ahead and voted a billion, 200-million dollars to finnace the program. Now consideration of that money bill has been put over until next week, and the Democrats have introduced the legislation they once said was unnecessary. Tomorrow, the Republicans are scheduled to introduce their own farm measure.

The Agriculture Department today estimated 1956 farm income at 10-billion 400-million dollars. That's 400-million less than last year, or a drop of about 5 percent.

Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey told Republican congressional leaders today there is not much chance of a tax cut this year. Humphrey questioned the prediction of the Senate-House economic committee that the budget would show a two-billion-dollar surplus. And Republican Senator Knowland says that if the surplus should amount to two billion dollars, he would favor applying it to the national debt.

Secretary of State Dulles said today the idea of broadening the function of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization will be discussed next week at the NATO council meeting in Paris. Dulles said in a New York Speech yesterday that the idea of broadening the function of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization will be discussed next week at the NATO council meeting in Paris. Dulles said in a New York speech yesterday that the time had come for making NATO something more than a purely military alliance in view of Russia's new emphasis on economics. Dulles told reporters today the alliance should be made to endure in the interest of unity. He said such a organization..created to meet an emergency.."either grows or tends to dry up."

In London, the British Foreign Office has welcomed Mr. Dulles' suggestion that NATO be something more than a military alliance. The idea has also been favorably received in Paris and Bonn.

The London visit of Soviet Premier Bulganin and Communist Party Boss Khrushchev was marked tonight by a reception of Claridge's Hotel, attended by four thousand guests. The Russian embassy paid the bill. Among the guests was Harold Stassen, President Eisenhower's special adviser on disarmament. When Stassen and Khrushchev met, the Russian invited Stassen into a private room for a discussion, and one report says they had a two-hour talk. A reporter asked Stassen afterward if they had made progress toward an agreement on diasrmament. Stassen's answer was that it had been a friendly discussion.. very thorough ..and that it had been sufficiently important for him to send an immediate report to the President. Earlier in the day, Khrushchev and Bulganin visited the House of Commons while it was in session. The Russian leaders heard a member suggest that the 100th anniversary of the end of the Crimean War should be marked by some kind of celebration. Britin opposed Russia in that war, and Prime Minister Eden replied, "I do not think we need to go back 100 years. I think we should look forward, rather, to the next 20 or 30 years."

Syria announced today that it was prepared to respect a cease-fire with Israel. And United Nations Secretary General Hammarskjold..who had been conferring with Syrian leaders..flew to Amman, the capital of Jordan, to continue his efforts there to achieve a lessening of tensions between Israel and the Arab States.

Israel announced today that four Israeli civilians were killed last night in an ambush, less than a mile from the Jordan frontier. United Nations investigators tracked the attackers into Jordan. Israeli Foreign Minister Sharett called the incident "an outrage" bearing all signs of another commando raid.

On Cyprus, British prratroopers today searched every home in the Greek quarter of Nicosia. All male residents of the quarter..boys as well as men.. were fingerprinted and new curfew restrictions imposed. The action was taken after an outbreak between Greek and Turkish Cypriots, in which two Turks were killed and several shops in the Greek community were set on fire.

Today in Athens, the cabinet refused to accept the designation of the Greek foreign minister. He had been attacked by the Greek Cypriots as showing softness toward Britain in the Cyprus dispute.

In Montgomery, Alabama, the police commissioner has ordered the arrest of any passenger or bus driver involved in desegregation on the public buses. The police order was issued after the bus company said it was abandoning segregation, in the light of yesterday's supreme court ruling that segregation on an intra-state buses is unconstitutional Leaders of the Negro boycott of the buses say there will be no change in their position. The boycott will continue for the time being.

In Baton Rouge, Statate judge toda ordered a permanent ban on activities of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in Louisiana. The judge based his injunction on a 32-year old law designed to curb activities of the Ku Klux Klan. The NA.A.AC.P. says it will appeal.

Presidential primaries were held today in Pennsylvania, Massachusetts and Alaska. So far, ther are no returns.

It is just a year ago today that the Asian - African conference at Bandung came to a close. By now that conference is closely associated in the public mind with the struggle of subject peoples for independence. To look back on it after a year is to realize, even more at the time, that it was one of the most significant of the postwar conferences. It the year since the meeting, liberation has made remarkable gains. Sudan has acheived its independence, Malaya has come to the point where it is assured it next year, Morocco and Tunis have won sovereign status, and Algeria is far along the same road. Quite a record for a single year.

The Bandung conference did not produce these specific advances. But it gave expression to the deep surge for liberation which the two world wars set in motion. This process of liberation might be called a heartening aspect of the present era, one that helps balance off such disheartening aspects as the hydrogen and plutonimm bombs, inter-continental missiles and the cold war. Bandung by being associated with this aspect has become something of a symbol of encouragement.

When the Colombo powers first decided to call an Asian - African conference, a flurry of suspicion swept the Western countries. They thought the occasion would see a familiar attack on colonialism, from which only the communists could benefit. But both the State Department and the British Foreign Office had second and wiser thoughts, and idd their best to make the Bandung delegates feel that their meeting was welcomed in the West.

Bandung didn't turn out to be a defeat of the West and a Communist victory. It turned out to be something that had not been sufficiently understood, the first appearance on the world stage of a new alignment of peoples, most of them non-white peoples, who were formulating and announcing their common interests. It was really an astonishing meeting, for it brought together representatives of twenty - nine nations and of fifty - three percent of the world's population. It actually represented the majority of mankind meeting for the first time in history. One could not complain that such a meeting had come too late. It couldn't have come sooner. Only ten of its members had been independent before World War II.

A great deal happened at Bandung, but by all odds the most important thing about it was that the conference was held. And the next most important thing will come when it meets again. For then the Asian - African co-operation will be more than a one - time phenomenom. There was talk at Bandung of annual meetings, and Premier Nasser was busy drumming up support for the next meeting to be held at Cairo. The Bandung leaders however, decided for bi-annual meetings - decided, too, not to set up a permanent secretariat, nor to be too closely organized. So a meeting is not to be convening at this time in Egypt which, to put it mildly, would not offer as composed a setting as Indonesia. But a year from now another meeting is due, and Africa is entitled to be the next host. Cairo happens to be the only African capital with facilities to take care of such a big conference. One must hope that by then the Middle East will have quieted down.

It is interesting to note that the big debate at Bandung would not be so vehement if it were to be held this year. It was between the pro-Western members and the neautralists over membership in Western defense pacts. You may recall that the conference did not in the end denounce the pacts. Its final resolution, very much of a United Nations document in spirit, recognized the right of states to join regional defense pacts, as well as their right not to join them. But in the year since Bandung, the West has been changing its priorities. Washington no longer makes partnership in defense measures a condition for granting aid. This year it has been studying how to make SEATO more economic and now is talking of doing the same for NATO. This change, to be sure, has nothing first-hand to do with Bandung. It is chiefly the result of the Kremlin's drive to extend Soviet power through an economic offensive. But most of the nations needing economic development are in Asia and Africa. So the Bandung members are interested most of all. It makes a huge difference to them that the cold war is taking this turn. They now can have offers from two sides, and the American offers no longer necessitate a semi-military tie-in.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Ted Pearson.

PEARSON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: There has been among the colonial peoples a drive toward independence that has been remarkable for its achievement. Santayana said, "Declarations of independence make nobody really independent." But the new free nations... and those striving for nationhood..would still say with Thoreau, "I was not born to be forced. I will breathe after my own fashion. "

Good Night and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Wed., April 25, 1956

This is the news:

President Eisenhower said today that Communist Party Boss Khrushchev may have been telling the truth when he said recently that Russia would soon have a long-range hydrogen missile. But there is a big difference, Mr. Eisenhower said, "between a laboratory capacity or capability of doing something and making an instrument... a really efficient, effective instrument of war." The President told his weekly news conference that in the missiles field, this country may have reached its maximum effort. "There are only so many scientists," he said. "There are only so many facilities, and you get to a point where mere expenditures of money in a field like this does no good." He said the United States will continue to test the hydrogen bomb. It was a paradox, he said, to urge a stepped-up guided missile program and call for abolition of the hydrogen tests, "because one without the other is useless."

The President told reporters he has always believed the North Atlantic Treaty Organization could be of more than "just military usefulness."

→

And Secretary of State Dulles, he said, will discuss the possible expansion of NATO, when he meets leaders of the alliance in Paris next week.

On domestic subjects, Mr. Eisenhower said he sees no logical reason for cutting taxes this year. He said he cannot go along with some Republicans who call the 84th Congress the "do nothing" Congress. (He doesn't like to make that kind of statement.) And Vice President Nixon, he said, still has not given him an answer that he would consider "final and definitive", as to whether he... Nixon... wants to run with him on the Republican ticket.

The Senate Investigations Subcommittee issued a subpoena today for ~~threatened today to subpoena~~ Murray Chotiner, Vice President Nixon's former campaign manager. ~~unless Chotiner testifies voluntarily.~~ In Los Angeles, Chotiner said, "I have never refused to appear voluntarily, but I cannot fly across the country on a moment's notice." The subcommittee heard testimony yesterday that Chotiner... who is an attorney... received a 5-thousand-dollar fee in 1953 for representating a manufacturer accused of contract irregularities. The manufacturer... Herman Kravitz... was charged then with misappropriating material used in making parka hoods for the Army. The Senate subcommittee, investigating possible graft in the procurement of uniforms, called Kravitz today as a witness, and he refused to answer most questions put to him, on grounds of possible self-incrimination. One question he refused to answer was why he hired Chotiner as his attorney. Vice President Nixon's office said today, that Chotiner served as Nixon's national campaign manager in 1952... and managed his senatorial campaign in California in 1950. Chotiner also helped Senator Knowland in his 1952 campaign.

→

The House Judiciary Committee has approved President Eisenhower's proposals on civil rights. The measure calls for creation of a bipartisan civil rights commission, and a special division for handling civil rights cases, in the Department of Justice. The bill would also make it easier for individuals to bring their own cases into Federal Court.

~~The government announced today that living costs last month went up one-tenth of 1 percent, the first increase since November. The government said a seasonable increase in food prices is expected for the next few months.~~

Almost complete returns from yesterday's primary in Pennsylvania show President Eisenhower leading Adlai Stevenson by nearly 300-thousand votes in what amounted to a popularity contest. Returns from the Massachusetts primary... where the voting was extremely light... show Eisenhower receiving nearly 52-thousand votes to 19-thousand votes for Stevenson. Stevenson had strong competition on the Democratic ticket in Representative McCormack, running as a favorite son candidate. McCormack got about 9-thousand more votes than Stevenson. ~~Alaska also~~ had a ~~primary yesterday, and those returns have been very slow in~~ coming in. ~~With only a small fraction of Alaska's precincts reporting,~~ Eisenhower ~~has a thousand, 324 votes to a thousand, 152 votes for~~ Stevenson. ~~Kefauver, so far, has 708 votes.~~

The constitution for an international atoms-for-peace agency was made public today at United Nations headquarters. The constitution (still subject to final approval) was agreed to last week by 12 nations, including the United States and Russia. It calls... among other things... for elaborate safeguards to make sure nuclear resources of the agency are not diverted to military purposes. (I should like to discuss this development further in a few minutes).

U.N. Secretary General Hammarskjold met Jordan leaders today, in a further effort to relieve Middle East tension. A communique said "different subjects" pertaining to Hammarskjold's mission were discussed, and that the talks will continue.

The talks between British and Soviet leaders ended today in London. The results will be announced tomorrow. Soviet Premier Bulganin and Party Boss Khrushchev met Prime Minister Eden twice today... although only one meeting was scheduled. And this is taken to mean the Russians may have made some last-minute proposition, possibly dealing with disarmament. Tomorrow, the Soviet leaders will [illegible] The final communique will be issued on their return to London tomorrow night. And they're due to sail on Friday.

In Washington today, the United States expelled two of Russia's representatives at the United Nations. The State Department said the two Russians were "no longer desirable", because of their part in getting five Russian seamen, who had sought asylum in this country, to "re-defect" and go home. Witnesses have told the Senate internal security subcommittee that the seamen were "kidnapped".

Secretary of State Dulles said tonight... in a Washington speech... that Russia must ultimately be prepared to subject "the new power of modern weapons" to the common will of the community of nations. Such destructive power, he said, "ought never to be the tool of any single nation to promote its national objectives, or to permit it to defy community law and order." He said unless that concept is accepted, there can never be a dependable peace.

Edward R. Murrow: April 25, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

Though we live in a time of basic change - which the atom age surely is - the public seems to be a lap behind the news about it. It hears vague and startling things about fission and fusion bombs and inter-continental missiles; is aware of the Atomic Energy Commission, and its fabulous establishments, and knows such phrases as "atoms for peace". But it doesn't follow details about atomic changes closely. It is as though the atomic age were coming to maturity behind a curtain. Now and again it produces news that the public takes in. Even so, ~~the public does~~ Most of us do not seem to appreciate how close at hand some atomic realities are.

There was news of a revealing kind today, with disclosure of the constitution for the international agency that is to direct the world distribution of atoms for peace. This agency may be set up and actually functioning by summer of next year. It then will be on the way to becoming a multi-billion-dollar enterprise of a character never before imagined in world affairs. Its membership will be even wider than the United Nations. It may have eighty to ninety members, as against the seventy-six in the U.N. And it will function under a system of inspection and controls that the casual onlooker may believe is unattainable at the present stage of the cold war.

But it is attainable. The inspection provisions were agreed to by the Soviet Union.

The idea of atoms for peace is, of course, American in origin and was first proposed in 1953 by President Eisenhower. Its realization has occasioned a long and heated debate affecting most of the world. The constitution has turned out to be something far broader than the United States offered, or thought necessary. At the outset, the donors of atomic supplies expected to control the agency. Then a tussle developed between the atomic haves and have-nots. The have-nots won out. This happened right here in New York without attracting much attention in this country. Probably India and other have-not countries were better informed about it because India's Krishna Menon was the man who led the have-nots.

Not much attention was aroused when the Soviet Union accepted far-reaching inspection. But the constitution that provides for it is sponsored by the United States, the Soviet Union and ten other countries. It still is a blue-print, and must be adopted by a full-member conference to be held at the U.N. in September. This full conference has the right to amend it, a fact which in itself was a victory for the atomic have-nots. So in the end the constitution can be even more liberal. But it is certain not to be amended to favor the atomic haves."

The agency is to be directed by a twenty-three-nation board of governors. This will include at the start, the United States, the Soviet Union, Great Britain, France and Canada. Five more will be from other countries most advanced in atomic technology. They are to be chosen on a regional basis, and to start with will be Brazil, South Africa, India, Australia and Japan. Any of these ten can be voted out, and replaced by a country considered further ahead in atomic technology. Then three nations are to be chosen for their richness in atomic supplies. Belgium and Czechoslovakia are already assured two of these seats, and Sweden is expected to win the third. Finally, there will be ten members chosen to represent the have-nots. This turns out to be a pretty even division of power between industrialized and non-industrialized countries, and in terms of division of power, is something quite new in world affairs.

The agency is to meet once a year, and will make decisions by a majority vote, something else the Soviet Union has accepted. The agency's precise relationship to the United Nations, has yet to be spelled out. This is a highly debatable subject. The United States has not wished too close a tie-in with the U.N. But it already is assured that there is to be no veto on any of the operations of the Agency through the United Nations.

The agency can be called a kind of atomic Point Four program, with recipients having as much to say as donors. But to get this scope they have to guarantee that none of the atomic materials received is diverted to military use. Before any country can receive fissionable materials, or atomic equipment, it must agree to admit inspectors freely to all places necessary for adequate check on the use made of them. Non-compliance can result in suspension of assistance, re-call of materials and, if peace is threatened, the matter goes to the Security Council, which is the only occasion on which the veto can be used. The atom has created a new world organization.

Admission of such members as Communist China is up to the general membership, acting on recommendation of the governors. U.S. delegate James Wadsworth said invitations would go only to peace-loving states, which he though would keep Red China out. But he said it was conceivable, if unlikely, that both Nationalist and Communist China should belong.

Ambassador Lodge is now urging the U.N. Economic and Social Council to undertake a wide study of the economic aspects of atomic energy development, and is behind a resolution asking Dag Hammarskjold to prepare a report on this theme.

-Bob Dixon-

Word for Today

On the subject of atomic annihilation, Albert Einstein once gave this grim assurance. "I do not believe," he said, "that civilization will be wiped out. Perhaps two-thirds of the people of the earth might be killed. But enough people capable of thinking, and enough books, would be left to start again. And civilization would be restored."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 25, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

President Eisenhower said today that Communist Party Boss Khrushchev may have been telling the truth when he said recently that Russia would soon have a long-range hydrogen missile. But there is a big difference, Mr. Eisenhower said, "between a laboratory capacity or capability of doing something and making the instrument..a really efficient, effective instrument of war." The President told his weekly news conference that in the missiles field, this country may have reached its maximum effort. "There are only so many scientists", he said, "There are only so many facilities, and you get to a point where mere expenditures of money if a field like this does no good." He said the United States will continue to test the hydrogen bomb. It was a paradox, he said, to urge a stepped-up guided missile program and call for abolition of the hydrogen tests, "because one without the other is useless." The President told reporters he has always believed in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization could be of more than "just military usefulness." And Secretary of State Dulles, he said, will discuss the possible expansion of NATO, when he meets leaders of the alliance in Paris next week.

On domestic subjects, Mr. Eisenhower said he sees no logical reason for cutting taxes this year. He said he cannot go along with some Republicans who call the 84th Congress the "do nothing" Congress. (He doesn't like to make that kind of statement. And Vice President, Nixon, he said, still has not given him an answer that he would consider "final and definitive", as to whether he..Nixon..wants to run with him on the Republican ticket.

The Senate Investigations Cubcommittee issued a subpoena today for Murray Chotiner, Vice President Nixon's former campaign manager. In Los Angeles, Chotiner said, "I have never refused to appear voluntarily, but I cannot fly across the country on a moment's notice." The subcommittee heard testimony yesterday that Chotiner..who is an attorney,..received a 5-thousand dollar fee in 1953 for representing a manufacturer accused of contract irregularities. The manufacturer..Herman Kravitz..was charged then with misappropriating material used in making parka hoods for the Army. The Senate subcommittee investigating possible graft in the procurement of uniforms called Kravitz today as a witness, and he refused to answer most questions put to him on grounds of possible self-incrimination. One question he refused to answer was why he hired Chotiner as his attorney. Vice President Nixon's office said today that Chotiner served as Nixon's national campaign manager in 1952...and managed his senatorial campaign in California in 1950. Chotiner also helped Senator Knowland in his 1952 campaign.

The House Judiciary Committee has approved President Eisenhower's proposals on civil rights. The measure calls for creation of a bi-partisan civil rights commission and a special division for handling civil rights cases in the Department of Justice. The bill would also make it easier for individuals to bring their own cases into federal Court.

Almost complete reutrns from yesterday's primary in Pennsylvania show President Eisenhower leading Adlai Srevenson by nearly 300-thousand votes in that amounted to a popularity contest. Returns from the Massachusetts primary ..where the voting was extremely light..show Eisenhower receiving nearly 52-thousand votes to 19 thousand votes for Stevenson. Seevenson has strong competition on the Democratic ticket in Representative McCormack, running as a favorite son candidate. McCormack got about 9-thousand more votes than Stevenson.

The constitution for an international atoms - for- peace agency was made public today at United Nations headquarters. The constitution (still subject to final approval) was agreed to last week by 12 nations, including the United States and Russia. It calls..among other things..for elaborate safeguards to make sure nuclear resources of the agency are not diverted to military purposes. (I should like to discuss thie development further in a few minutes.)

The talks between British and Soviet leaders ended today in London. The results will be announced tomorrow. Soviet Premier Bulganin and Party Boss Khrushchev met Prime Minister Eden twice today..although only one meeting was scheduled. And this is taken to mean the Russians may have made some last-minute proposition, possibly dealing with disarmament.

In Washington today, the United States expelled two of Russia's representatives at the United Nations. The State Department said the two Russians were "no longer desirable", because of their part in getting five Russian seamen who had sought asylum in this country to "re-defect" and go home. Witnesses have told the Senate internal security cubcommittee that the seamen were "kidnapped."

Secretary of State Dulles said tonight..in a Washington speech..that Russia must ultimately be prepared to subject "the new power of modern weapons" to the common will of the community of nations. Such destructive power, he said, "ought tever to be the tool of any single nation to promote its national objectives, or to permit it to defy community law and order." He said unless that concept is accepted, there can never be a dependable peace.

Though we live in a time of basic change - which the atom age surely is - the public seems to be a lap behind the news about it. It hears a vague and startling things about fission and fusion bombs and inter-continental missiles; is aware of the Atomic Energy Commission, and its fabulous establishments, and knows such phrases as "atoms for peace". But it doesn't follow details about atomic changes closely. It is as though the atomic age were coming to maturity behind a curtain. Now and again to produces news that the public takes in. Even so, most of us do not seem to appreciate how close at hand some atomic realities are.

There was news of a revealing kind today, with disclosure of the constitution for the international agency that is to direct the world distribution of atoms for peace. This agency may be set up and actually functioning by summer of next year. It then will be on the way to becoming a multi-billion dollar enterprise of a character never before imagined in world afaairs. Its membership will be even wider than the United Nations. It may have eighty to ninety members as against the sevenyy - six in the U.N. And it will function under a system of inspection and controls that the casual onlooker may believe is unattainable at the present state of the cold war. But it is attainable. The inspection provisions were agreed to by the Soviet Union.

The idea of atoms for peace is, of course, American in origin and was first proposed in 1953 by President Eisenhower. Itsrealization has occasioned a long and heated debate affecting most of the world. The constitution has turned out to be something far broader than the United States offered, or thought necessary. At the outset, the donors of atomic supplies expected to control the agency. Then a tussle developed between the atomic haves and have-nots. The have-nots won out. This happened right here in New York without attracting much attention in this country. Probably India and other have- not countries were better informed about it because India's Khrishna Menon was the man who led the have-nots.

Not much attention was aroused when the Soviet Union accepted far-reaching inspection. But the constitution that provides for it is sponsored by the United States, the Soviet Union and ten other countries. It still is a blueprint, and must be adopted by a full - member conference to by held at the U.N. in September. This full conference has the right to amend it, a fact which in itself was a victory for the atomic have-nots. So in the end the constitution can be even more liberal. But it is certain not bo be amended to favor the atomic "haves".

The agency is to be directed by a twenty-three-nation board of governors This will include at the start the United States, the Soviet Union, Great Britain, France and Canada. Five more will be from other countries most advanced in atomic technology. They are to be choses on a regional basis, and to start with will be Brazil, South Africa, India, Australia and Japan. Any of these ten can be voted out, and replaced by a country considered further ahead in atomic technology. Then three nations are to be chosed for their richness in atomic supplies. Belgium and Czechoslovakia are already assured two of these seats, and Sweded in expected to win the third. Finally, there will be ten members chosed to represent the have-nots. This turns out to be a pretty even division of power between the industrialized and non-industrialized countries, and in terms of division of power is something quite new in world affairs.

The agency is to meet once a year, and will make decisions by a majority vote, something else the Soviet Union has accepted. The agency's precise relationship to the United Nations has yet to be spelled out. This is a highly debatable subject. The United States has not wished too close a tie-in with the U.N. But it already is assured that there is to be no veto on any of the operations of the agency through the United Nations.

The agency can be called a kind of atomic Point Four program, with recipients having as much to say as donors. But to get this scope they have to guarantee that none of the atomic materials received is diverted to military use. Bufore any country can receive fissionable materials, or atomic equipment, it must agree to admit inspectors freely to all places necessary for acequate check on the use made of them. Non-compliance can result in suspension of assistance, recall of materials and, if peace is threatened, the matter goes to the Security Council, which is the only occasion on which the veto can be used. The atom has created a new world organization.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today, but first, Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: On the subject of atomic annihilation, Albert Einstein once gave this grim assurance. "I do not believe", he said, "that civilization will be wiped out. Perhaps two-thirds of the people of the earth might be killed. But enough people capable of thinking, and enough books, would be left to start again. And civilization would be restored."

Good Night and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Thurs., April 26, 1956

This is the news:

Vice President Nixon said today he will seek re-election. Only yesterday, President Eisenhower told a news conference he had received no word from Mr. Nixon that he would consider "final and definitive". Mr. Nixon talked with the President today, and then told reporters: "I informed the President that in the event that the President and the delegates to the convention reached the decision that it was their desire for me to serve as the nominee of the Republican Party for Vice President, that I would be honored to accept." Mr. Eisenhower then issued a statement through White House News Secretary Hagerty, saying he was "delighted" by Nixon's decision. The President had said several weeks ago that he would be happy to run on any ticket with Nixon... but that it would be up to Nixon to chart his own course. The Republican national chairman... Leonard Hall... said tonight that Mr. Nixon has been "a great vice president". And he predicted that with the Eisenhower-Nixon ticket, the Republican Party will score a greater victory this year than in 1952. Democratic Chairman Butler attacked Nixon's record... and said he was "sure" the majority of American voters did not believe Mr. Nixon was "the type of person to be in a position from which he may succeed to the presidency."

The government eased restrictions today on the shipment of non-strategic goods to Russia and the satellite states. Under the new order, American exporters will be able to ship about 700 items to the Soviets under general license. Individual licenses will no longer be necessary for shipment of these items. These products include rubber goods, jewelry, office machines, drugs, dental equipment and toys. Secretary of Commerce Weeks said the new procedure "in no way reflects a change in the policy of barring strategic goods to the Soviet bloc." And the total embargo on shipments to Communist China, he said, remains unchanged.

A joint communique was issued in London tonight on the results of the 10-day talks between British and Russian leaders. The communique ran four pages, totaled 28-hundred words. Both nations pledged themselves to work for disarmament and peace in the Middle East. And they agreed that development of trade between Britain and Russia is desirable. But there was no hard and fast agreement on specific issues. I should like to discuss this rather remarkable meeting further, in a few minutes.

Five-power disarmament talks continued in London today. And a Western source says Russia is now ready to discuss nuclear disarmament, as well as a reduction in conventional weapons. These talks... under the sponsorship of the United Nations... have been in progress six weeks. Until now, the Russians have been proposing an arms cut, limited to weapons of the conventional type. The West has been insisting that nuclear weapons be included in any disarmament agreement. The Western source says it is too early to tell whether what happened today is a major Russian concession, or a propaganda maneuver.

At the United Nations today, a spokesman for the Russian delegation denied that Chief Soviet Delegate Sobolev... or any of his aides... had abused their diplomatic privilege, in arranging for five Russian sailors to go home. The five sailors were crewmen on a Soviet tanker, captured by the Chinese Nationalists in the Formosa Strait. They requested... and were granted... asylum in the United States. But they went home under mysterious circumstances on April 7th. Senate investigators heard testimony that Sobolev... and members of his staff... exercised threats, and yesterday the State Department ordered two of Sobolev's aides out of the country. The spokesman for the Russian delegation said today that the sailors asked that arrangements be made for them to go home. And the sailors told a news conference in Moscow, that they returned of their own free will. In Congress today, two senators... Jenner of Indiana and Welker of Idaho... demanded that Sobolev be expelled for what Jamner called the "kidnaping" of the five seamen. The State Department indicated the case is closed.

→

In Berlin, the Communist government of East Germany announced today that another 88 persons convicted of political crimes, have been SET FREE. One of the prisoners released was Max Fechner, former minister of justice, who was purged after the anti-Communist uprising in June, 1953.

In Jerusalem today, the mixed armistice commission condemned Jordan for the attack Monday, in which four Israeli civilians were killed. The ambush took place in the Negev, less than a mile from the Jordanian frontier. The commission called the action "a warlike act"... and asked Jordan to prevent a recurrence of such incidents.

The U.N. secretary general... Dag Hammarskjold... got provisional agreement from Jordan today for a cease-fire, then flew back to his temporary headquarters in Lebanon. He plans to go to Cairo for further talks this week-end.

Here in New York, an anti-trust suit against the American Newspaper Publishers Association has been settled. The association consented to an order... enjoining it from urging members to engage in advertising practices which violate the Sherman Anti-Trust Act.

In Congress, Chairman Cooley of the House Agriculture Committee says the Democrats are abandoning their plan to press for the equivalent of 90 percent of parity in the new farm bill. Cooley said the measure introduced in the House tomorrow will call for a "soil bank", without advance payment to Farmers - ~~and many non-controversial provisions in the bill that President Eisenhower vetoed. But it will not call for the so-called "compensatory payments" objectional to the Administration. These payments would have amounted to the difference between prevailing government price supports and 90 percent of parity.~~

Edward R. Murrow: April 26, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

International conferences are a little bit like marriages. It takes a year or two before anyone can tell whether they have been successful. The communique issued after the prolonged Russian-British talks contains the usual generalities. It says the talks were conducted on both sides in "a spirit of candor and realism - a full and useful exchange of views." The strengthening of Anglo-Soviet relations would be in the interests of the peoples of both countries. Both countries would like a relaxation of international tension. The British and Russians both want more "mutual confidence." Both agreed to be guided by the principles of the United Nations. Both countries say they are all in favour of respect for national independence and sovereignty, territorial integrity, and non-interference in the internal affairs of others. Britain and Russia will do their utmost to put an end to the armaments race in all parts of the world. Peace and security in Europe are of determining importance in preserving the peace of the world. And then comes a sentence of unusual candor. It reads: "But an understanding on the means to achieve that end was not reached."

Germany wasn't even mentioned.

Regarding the Middle East, both countries agree to support the United Nations in its endeavor to strengthen peace in the region of Palestine. Both agreed to support U.N. action in trying to do something about the Arab refugees. The British and Russian leaders talked about disarmament. They all thought it would be a good thing. Humanity ought to be saved from the threat of a nuclear war. Nuclear weapons ought to be prohibited, and nuclear energy used exclusively for peaceful purposes. But the communique is mute as to how this admirable objective is to be achieved.

There was also much talk about Anglo-Russian trade. They agreed that more of that would be a good thing too. Both countries would benefit. The Russians said they were willing to trade more with Britain. The British said they would like to do more trade with Russia. The Russians thought that if there were no trade restrictions or discriminations they might buy as much as three ~~thousand million~~ BILLION dollars' worth of good from Britain in the next five years. The Russians gave the British a list of the stuff they'd like to buy; a comprehensive list of machinery, equipment and ships. The British pointed out that part of this list included strategic material which could not be shipped to Russia. The Russians said if they were to buy from Britain they would have to sell to her. The British replied that their markets were open to a wide range of Soviet exports. And so now British and Russian experts are going to study the lists to see whether a deal can be made. And that's about all there is to it so far as the communique is concerned.

The language is restrained, and the good intentions expressed will be meaningful only if followed in the coming months by specific action.

Howard K. Smith cables me from London tonight that the informed British view is that the communique approves virtue and condemns evil. The British regard these sentiments as "sign posts" which the Russians agreed to, but it remains to be seen if Russian conduct will be guided by these sign posts they helped to erect. The British feel they had three great triumphs in connection with the Russian visit. None of them were mentioned in the communique. The first is the negative fact that no unfortunate incident happened to the Russians. In other words, no one tried to shoot them. And nothing happened to arouse friction between Britain and the United States. The second triumph as viewed in Britain was the model behavior of the British public. A demonstration that Britons of all parties cannot be softened or deceived by smiles, baby-kissings, or other empty gestures. The Russians gave signs of realizing for the first time that they were dealing with a pretty hard-boiled, cool-headed nation that is politically mature, and reacts calmly both to promises and to threats.

The third achievement as viewed by the British is that the Russians came to understand for the first time that the situation in the Middle East is in fact on the verge of explosion. And that Britain is prepared to move troops into that area if the explosion occurs. Smith reports that the British are firmly convinced that the Russians do not want war now, and that the men from Moscow now realize that war could happen in the Middle East as a result of Communist arms policy in that area.

Aside from this possibility that the Russians may now be more aware of the mortal danger of their policy in the Middle East, and the prospect of increased trade between the two countries, neither the Russians nor the British appear to have altered their previous positions.

Ted Pearson.

Word for Today

The communique... marking the end of talks between British and Russian leaders... deals in generalities. An old legal maxim warns, "Fraud lurks in generalities." But there is also the prospect of further negotiation. Wendell Philipps reminds us, "Every step of progress the world has made has been from scaffold to scaffold and from stake to stake."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

THURSDAY, APRIL 26, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

Vice President Nixon said today he will seek re-election. Only yesterday, President Eisenhower told a news conference he had received no word from Mr. Nixon that he would consider "final and definitive." Mr. Nixon talked with the President today, and then told reporters: "I informed the President that in the event that the President and the delegates to the convention reached the decision that it was their desire for me to serve as the nominee of the Republican Party for Vice President, that I would be honored to accept." Mr. Eisenhower then issued a statement through White House News Secretary Hagerty saying he was "delighted" by Nixon's decision. The President had said several weeks ago that he would be happy to run on any ticket with Nixon..but that it would be up to Nixon to chart his own course. The Republican National chairman...Leonard Hall..said tonight that Mr. Nixon has been "a great vice president". And he predicted that with the Eisenhower - Nixon ticket, the Republican Party will score a greater victory this year than in 1952. Democratic Chairman Butler attacked Nixon's record..and said he was "sure" the majority of American voters did not believe Mr. Nixon was "the type of person to be in a position from which he may succeed to the presidency."

The government eased restrictions today on the shipment of non-strategic goods to Russia and the satellite states. Under the new order, American exporters will be able to ship about 700 items to the Soviets under general license. Individual licenses will no longer be necessary for shipment of these items. These products include rubber goods, jewelry, office machines, drugs, dental equipment and toys. Secretary of Commerce Weeks said the new procedure "in no way reflects a change in the policy of banning strategic goods to the the Soviet bloc." And the total embargo on shipments to Communist China he said, remains unchanged.

A joint communique was issued in London tonight on the results of the 10-day talks between British and Russian leaders. The communique ran four pages, totaled 28-hundred words. Both nations pledged themselves to work for disarmament and peace in the Middle East. And they agreed that development of trace between Britain and Russia is desireable. But there was no hard and fast agreement on specific issues. I should like to discuss this rather remarkable meeting further in a few minutes.

Five-power disarmament talks continued in London today. And a Western source says Russia is now ready to discuss nuclear disarmement as well as a reduction in conventional weapons. These talks..under the sponsorship of the United Nations..have been in progress six weeks. Until now, the Russians have been proposing an arms cut limited to weapons of the conventional type. The West has been insisting that nuclear weapons be incluced in any disarmament agreement. The Western source says it is too early to tell whether what happened today is a major Russian concession, or a propaganda maneuver.

At the United Nations today, a spokesman for the Russian Delegation denied that Chief Soviet delegate Sobolev..or any of his aides..had abused their diplomatic priviledge in arranging for five Russian sailors to go home. The five sailors were crewmen on a Soviet tanker , captured by the Chinese Nationalists in the Formosa Strait. They requested..and were granted..asylum in the United States. But they went home under mysterious circumstances on April 7th. Senate investigatirs heard testimony that Sobolev ..and members of his staff.. exercised threats, and yesterday the State Department ordered two of Sobolev's aides out of the country. The spokesman for the Russian Delegation said today that the sailors asked that arrangements be made for them to go home. And the sailors told a news conference, in Moscow, that they returned home of their own free will. In Congress today, two senators. Jenner of Indiana and Welker of Idaho..demanded that Sobolev be expelled for what Jenner called the "kidnapping of the five seamen. The State Department indicated the case is closed.

In Jerusalem today, the mixed armistice commission condemned Jordan for the attack Monday in which four Israeli civilians were killed. The ambush took place in the Negev, less than a mile from the Jordanian frontier. The commission called the action "a warlike act"..and asked Jordan to prevent a recurrence of such incidents.

The U.N. secretary general..Dag Hammarskjold..got provisional agreement from Jordan today for a cease-fire, then flew back to his temporary headquarters in Lebanon. He plans to go to Cairo for further talks this weekend.

In Congress, Chairman Cooley of the House Agriculture Committee says the Democrats are abandoning their plan to press for the equivalent of 90 percent of parity in the new farm bill. Cooley said the measure introduced in the House tomorrow will call for a "soil bank" without advance payment to farmers.

International conferences are a little lit like marraiges. It takes a year or two before anyone can tell whether they have been successful. The communique issued after the prolonged Russian - British talks contains the usual generalities. It says the talks were conducted on both sides in "a spirit of candor and realism - a full and useful exchange of views," The strengthening of Anglo-Soviet relations would be in the interests of the peoples of both countries. Both countries. would like a relaxation of international tension. The British and Russians both want more "mutual confidence". Both agreed to be guided by the principles of the United Nations. Both countries say they are all im favor of respect for national independence and sovereignty, territorial integrity, and non-interference in the internal affairs of others.

Britain and Russia will do their utmost to put an end to the armaments race in all parts of the world. Peace and security in Europe are of determining importance in preserving the peace of the world. And then comes a sentence of unusual candor. It reads : "But an understanding on the means to achieve that end was not reached."

Regarding the Middle East, Germany wasn 't even mentioned. Both countries agree to support the United Nations in its endeavor to strengthen peace in the region of Palestine. Both agreed to support U.N. action in trying to do something about the Arab refugees. The British and Russian leaders talked about disarmement. They all thought it would be a good thing. Humanity ought to be saved from the threat of a nuclear war. Nuclear weapons ought to be prohibited, and nuclear energy used exclusively for peaceful purposes. But the communique is mute as to how this admirable objective is to be achieved.

There was also much talk about Anglo-Russian trade. They agreed that more of that would be a good thing. too. Both countries would benefit. The Russians said they were willing to trade more with Britain. The British said they would like to do more trade with Russia. The Russians thought that if there were no trade restrictions or discriminations they might buy as much as three billion dollars' worth of goods from Britain in the next five years. The Russians gave the British a list of the stuff they'd like to buy: a comprehensive list of machinery, equipment and ships. The British pointed out that part of this list included strategic material which could not be shipped to Russia. The Russians said if they were to buy from Britain they would have to sell to her. The British replied that their markets were open to a wide range of Soviet exports. And so now British and Russian experts are going to study the lists to see whether a deal can be made. And that's about all there is to it, so far as the communique is concerned.

The language is restrained, and the good intentions expressed will be meaningful only if followed in the coming months by specific action.

Howard K. Smith cables me from London tonight that the informed British view is that the communique approves virtue and condemns evil. The British regard these sentiments as "sign posts" which the Russians agreed to, but it remains to be seen if Russian conduct will be guided by these sign posts they helped to erect. The British feel they had three great triumphs in connection with the Russian visit. None of them were mentioned in the communique. The first is the negative fact that no unfortunate incident happened to the Russians. In other words, no one tried to shoot them. And nothing happened to arouse friction between Britain and the United States. The second triumph, as viewed in Britain, was the model behavior of the British public. A demonstration that Britons of all parties cannot be softened or deceived by smiles, baby kissings, or other empty gestures. The Russians gave signs of realizing for the first time that they were dealing with a pretty hard-boiled, cool-headed nation that is politically mature, and reacts calmly both to promises and to threats.

The third achievement, as viewed by the British is that the Russians came to undersand for the first time that the situation in the Middle East is in fact on the verge of explosion. And that Britain is prepared to move troops into that area if the explosion occurs. Smith reports that the British are firmly convinced that the Russians do not want war now, and that the men from Moscow now realize that war could happen in the Middle East as a result of Communist arms policy in that area.

Aside from this possibibity that the Russians may now be more aware of the mortal danger of their policy in the Middle East, and the prospect of increased trade between the two countries, neither the Russians nor the British appear to have altered their previous positions.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. First, here is Ted Pearson.

PEARSON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: The communique..marking the end of talks between British and Russian leaders..deals in generalities. An old legal maxim warns, "Fraud lurks in generalities." But there is also the prospect of further negotiation. Wendel Phillipps reminds us, "Every step of progress the world has made has been from scaffold to scaffold, and from stake to stake."

Goodnight and Good Luck!

Edward R. Murrow Fri., April 27, 1956

This is the news:

The Russian leaders left Britain today, after a 10-day visit. At a final news conference, Communist Party Boss Khrushchev said Russia would "welcome" a ban on arms shipments to the Middle East, if such an agreement could be negotiated with other countries. Khrushchev began his statement by claiming that Russia "does not ship arms to anybody." Then he said: "I think we would answer wrongly if we were to say that we would not sell arms to the states which urge us to do so... and the reason for that is that shipments are being made by other countries. If it were possible," Khrushchev continued, "to agree through the United Nations, or otherwise, that this would not take place, we would only welcome that... and be prepared to take part in such an undertaking." Khrushchev answered most of the questions, which were submitted in writing. He indicated he would like to visit the United States, if something were to be gained by it. And he denied any intention of driving a wedge between Britain and the United States. Premier Bulganin opened the news conference by announcing that Prime Minister Eden has accepted an invitation to visit Russia this year. The date is not definite. (Bulganin also urged that the Western embargo on shipment of strategic materials to Russia be abandoned.

→

In a broadcast to the British people, Prime Minister Eden said the discussions with the Russian leaders "could be the beginning of the beginning." He said there had been some plain speaking. There was no agreement on either German reunification or disarmament. But there had been "an encouraging measure of agreement," Eden said, on some other questions. And as examples, he cited the Russian promise to help keep peace in the Middle East and plans for expanding Anglo-Soviet trade. He said Britain will abide by the embargo on trade in strategic goods.

In Washington, two Democratic senators expressed concern today over the prospect of stepped-up British trade with Communist countries. Senator Jackson of Washington State said Britain should reveal its intentions, before Congress starts debate on foreign aid. And Senator McClellan of Arkansas said he hopes Britain will have "better wisdom" than to accept Russia's offer to buy nearly three billion dollars' worth of goods in the next five years.

A third Democratic senator... George of Georgia... said the United States should not help Egypt build the Aswan Dam. Georgia is a cotton-producing state, and Senator George said the dam might cause millions of additional acres in Egypt to be planted in cotton.

The head of the Strategic Air Command... General LeMay... told Senate investigators today that his mission is handicapped by lack of trained personnel. He said the shortage of skilled airmen is "the most critical deficiency" of SAC. And means must be found, he said, for keeping these airmen from wanting to return to civilian life. To cut down the turn-over, General LeMay proposed higher pay, more adequate family housing and restoration of post exchange privileges.

The convicted atom spy... David Greenglass... told the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee today that his sister, Ethel Rosenberg, deliberately "martyred" herself by refusing to confess. Greenglass was a key witness in the trial that resulted in the execution of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg in 1953. He told the subcommittee that while working at Los Alamos he gave Rosenberg a list of potential recruits for the spy ring... and that since then he has turned their names over to the F.B.I.

The House has approved a program... calling for construction of 40-thousand miles of highway over the next 13 years. The vote was 388 to 19. The measure provides for expenditure of fifty-one and a half billion dollars in federal and state funds, to be raised by higher taxes on gasoline, tires and trucks. Last year, the Senate approved an 18-billion-dollar program with no tax provisions. Now the two houses must work out a compromise.

Two farm bills were introduced today in the House of Representatives. Both are sponsored by Democrats. Representative Cooley of North Carolina introduced a measure containing only a few provisions distasteful to the Administration. Representative Poage of Texas introduced a bill that has most of the provisions in the Cooley measure... including the "soil bank"... plus amendments that would give farmers the equivalent of 90 percent of parity.

The United Steelworkers Union served notice on the nation's big steel producers today that negotiations on a new contract must begin by June first. The present contract expires on JUNE 30TH.

And here in New York, the International Longshoremen's Association announced that it is abandoning its alliance with the AFL-CIO Teamsters

Union. The longshoremen's association was expelled from the A.F.L. in 1953, for refusing to purge itself of gangster elements. / The teamster's union was threatened with expulsion from the AFL-CIO, because of the alliance.

In the United Nations today, Greece accused Britain of committing "crimes against humanity", in dealing with the rebellion of Greek Cypriots on the island of Cyprus. The Greek protest cited what it called "mass persecutions of civil populations."

[redacted]

And the world heavyweight boxing champion... Rocky Marciano... announced today that he is retiring "because I want to start living with my family." / Marciano, who is 32, will retire with a record of never having been defeated [redacted] rights. He has been champion since 1952. X//

Edward R. Murrow: April 27, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

It is not always easy to recognize how much of the wordage that comes out of an international conference has a hard core of meaning. The visit of the Soviet leaders to London is no exception in this respect. Until the final day, the reports of the public reception of the visitors and the official discussions were uniformly negative, and gave no hint that any progress was being made. Then at the close the conferees came out with a lot of wordage that sounded as though the meeting had been productive. But the hard core of meaning wasn't there. What came out was just a final flurry of courtesy. Now it is clear that there was more meaning to things that happened earlier in the week.

Two occurrences will not be soon forgotten. One is the Khrushchev boast of soon having the ability to drop a missile with a hydrogen warhead on any place in the world. The other was the noisy collision between the Soviet guests and Labor Party leaders. The wrangle at their private dinner was over imprisoned social democrats, anti-semitism in theSoviet Union and Britain's role in the war. The Russians were so ruffled that according to one report, Prime Minister Eden had to placate them to keep the conference from breaking up.

It is not necessary to say which of these events was more important.

Both of them reduced Soviet influence and damaged Soviet policy. One can ask what neutralist leaders - Nehru, for one - thought of Khrushchev brandishing the hydrogen bomb. For Nehru, the darkest feature of United States policy has been the threat implied in our nuclear weapons, and particularly in the strong things sometimes said in Washington about them. Mr. Nehru liked the Soviet leaders for always stressing peaceful intentions and for denouncing our nuclear build-up. Now in a single sentence in a speech, Khrushchev turned Soviet advantage into disadvantage. That is not saying Nehru and other neutralists will now become pro-American. But they now can understand why Washington is so concerned with nuclear development for defense. Whether Khrushchev said what he did about the hydrogen warhead after careful forethought, or merely lost his temper over British unfriendliness, makes little difference. The result is the same in either case.

The meeting with the Labor Party leaders may have an even more significant result. A full report of that explosive dinner party has not been made. We know that George Brown, a future Labor Cabinet member, set off the fireworks. Khrushchev said something about the Soviet Union having been responsible for the defeat of Nazi Germany. Mr. Brown could not contain himself until he told the guests that Britain had been fighting the Nazis while the Soviet Union was still allied with Hitler. Angry words ensued, and they grew angrier, when Labor leaders urged the release of imprisoned Social Democrats in Soviet Russia and the satellite countries. Khrushchev launched into an abuse of the social democrats as the enemies of the working classes. He refused to release the prisoners or even to receive a list of those imprisoned. The anger rose even higher when questions were asked about anti-semitism in ~~XXXXXXXX~~ the Soviet Union.

~~The Labor people had mild qualms of conscience as hosts who had been rough with their guests, and Hugh Gaitskill went around to call on the visitors to try to mend matters. But Khrushchev refused to shake hands with George Brown at the House of Commons Speaker's dinner. And it can be reported that Mr. Gaitskill, in his final call, again urged the release of Socialist prisoners.~~

The Labor Party has a considerable faction that has tended to favor the Soviet Union as against the United States. Now this faction will be less effective. But the consequences in the European continent will be even greater. Now it can be recognized that the gulf between communists and socialists has not been bridged, and the new Kremlin doctrine of a united front is as easy to renounce as to proclaim. My colleague Dick Hottelet cables me that among communist slogans for May Day in East Germany is one addressed to social democratic "comrades" and trade union "colleagues" in West Germany, promising that if united they will be invincible. This slogan won't be worth a plugged nickel in West Germany next Tuesday.

The new Soviet program for Europe has been based on the collaboration with socialists, and it is no secret that the potential power of the propaganda has worried Western governments no end. Now many socialists are beginning to recognize that communists simply cannot understand or respect the value of political opposition as the West practises it. Nor are communists interested, as Western workers are, in human problems and values, such as men wrongly imprisoned, or persecuted because of their race. So the outlook for a United Front in Europe certainly is dimmer. And that hardly can be what the Russians intended when they went to London.

Word for Today

Soviet policy would seem to be... more and more... the policy of Khrushchev. And the stamp of his personality on what Russia does, recalls the observation of Thomas Carlyle that "history is the essence of innumerable biographies." Khrushchev ~~is~~ may be clever. He is also rather obvious. As Will Rogers said, "Diplomacy is a great thing, if it wasn't transparent."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

FRIDAY, APRIL 27, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

The Russian leaders left Britain today, after a 10-day visit. At a final news conference, Communist Party Boss Khurshchev said Russia would "welcome" a ban on arms shipments to the Middle East, if such an agreement could be negotiated with other countries. Khrushchev began his statement by claiming that Russia "does not ship arms to anybody." Then he said: "I think we would answer wrongly if we were to say that we would not sell arms to the states which urge us to do so and the reason for that is that shipments are being made by other countries. It if were possible" Khrushchev continued, "to agree through the United Nations or otherwise that this would not take place, we would only welcome that and be prepared to take part in such an undertaking." Khrushchev answered most of the questions, which were submitted in writing. He indicated he would like to visit the United States, if something were to be gained by it. And he denied any intention of driving a wedge between Britain and the United States. Premier Bulganin opened the news conference by announcing that Prime Minister Eden has accepted an invitation to visit Russia this year. The date is not definite. Bulganin also urged that the Western embargo on shipment of strategic materials to Russia be abandoned.

In a broadcast to the British people, Prime Minister Eden said the discussions with the Russian leaders "could be the beginning of the beginning." He said ther has been some plain speaking. Ther was no agreement on either German reunification of disarmament. But there had been "an encouraging measure of agreement," Eden said, on some other questions. And as examples, he cited the Russian promise to help keep peace in the Middle East and plans for expandin Anglo-Soviet trade. He said Britain will abide by the embargo on trade in strategic goods.

In Washington, two democratic senators expressed concern today over the prospect of stepped - up British trade with Communist countries, Senator Jackson of Washington State said Britain whould reveal its intentions, before Congress starts debate on foreign aid. And Senator McClellan of Arkansas said he hopes Britain will have "better wisdom" than to accept Russia's offer to buy nearly three billion dollars worth of goods in the next five years.

A third Democratic senator..George of Georgian said the United States should not help Egypt build the Aswan Dam. Georgia is a cotton-producing state, ens Senator George said the dam might cause million of additional acres in Egypt to be planted in cotton.

The head of the Strategic Air Command..General LeMay..told Senate investigators today that his mission is handicapped by lack of trained personnel. He said the shortage of skilled airmen is "the most critical deficiency" of SAC. And means must be found he said, for keeping these airmen from wanting to return to civilian life. To cut down the turn-over, General LeMay proposed higher pay, more adequate family housing, and resotration of post exchange provileges.

The convicted atom spy, David Greenglass..told the Senate Internal Secruity Subcommittee today that his sister, Ethel Rosenberg, deliberately "martyred" herself by refusing to confess. Greenglass was a key witness in the trial that resulted in the execution of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg in 1953. He told the subcommittee that while working at Los Alamos he gave Rosenberg a list of potential recruits for the spy ring..and that since then he has turned their names over to the F.B.I.

The House has approved a program calling for construction of 40-thousand miles of highway over the next 13 years. The vote was 388 to 19. The measure provides for expenditure of fifty-one and a half billion dollars in federal and state funds, to be raised by higher taxes on gasoline, tires and trucks. Last year, the Senate approved an 18-billion - dollar program with no tax provions. Now the two houses must work out a compromise.

Two farm bills were introduced today in the House of Representatives. Both are sponsored by Democrats. Representative Cooley of North Carolins introduced a measure containing only a few provisions distasteful to the Administration. Representative Poage of Texas introduced a bill that most of the provisions in the Cooley measure including the "soil bank" plus amendments that would give farmers the equivalent of 90 percent of parity.

The United Steelworkers Union served notice on the nation's big steel producers today that negotiations on a new contract must begin by June first. The presnnt contract expires on June 30th.

And here in New York, the International Longshoremen's Association announced that it is abandoning its alliance with the AFL-CIO Teamsters Union. The longshoremenn's association was expelled from the A.A.L in 1953, for refusing to purge itself of gangster elements. The teamster's union was threatened with with expulsion from the AFL-CIO, because of the alliance.

And the world heavywieght boxing champion..Rocky Marciano..announced today that he is retiring "because I want to start living with my family." Marciano, who is 32, will retire with a record of never having been defeated.

It is not always easy to recognize how much of the wordage that comes out of an international converence has a hard core of meaning. The visit of the Soviet leaders to London is no exception in this respect. Until the final day, the reports of the public reception of the visitors and the official discussions were uniformly negative, and gave no hint that any progress was being made. Then at the close the conferees came out with a lot of wordage that sounded as though the meeting had been productive. The the hard core of meaning wasn't there. What came out was just a final flurry of courtesy. Now it is clear that there was more meaning to things that happened earlier in the week.

Two occurances will not be soon forgotten. One is the Khurshchev boast of soon having the ability to drop a missile with a hydrogen warhead on any place in the world. The other was the noisy collision between the Soviet guests and Labor party leaders. The wrangle at their private dinner was over imprisoned social democrats, anti-semitism in the Soviet Union and Britain's role in the war. The Russians were so ruffled that according to one report, Prime Minister Eden had to placate them to keep the conference from breaking up.

It is not necessary to say which of these events was more important.

Both of them reduced Soviet influence and damaged Soviet policy. One can ask what neautralist leaders - Nehru, for one - thought of Khrushchev brandishing the hydrogen bomb. For Nehru, the darkest feature of United States policy has been the threat implied in our nuclear weapons, and particularly in the strong things sometimes said in Washington about them. Mr. Nehru liked the Soviet leaders for always stressing peaceful intentions and for denouncing our nuclear build - up. Now in a single sentence in a speech, Khrushchev turned Soviet advantage into disadvantage. That is not saying Nehru and other neautralists will now become pro-American. But they now can understand why Washington is so concerned with nuclear development for defense. Whether Khrushchev said what he did about the hydrogen warhead after careful forethought, or merely lost his temper over British unfriendliness, makes little difference,. The result is the same in either case.

The meeting with the Labor Party leaders may have bn even more significant result. A full report of that explosive dinner party has not been made. We know that George Brown, a future Labor Cabinet member, set off the fireworks. Khrushchev said something about the Soviet Union having been responsible for the defeat of Nazi Germany. Mr. Brown could not contain himself until he told the guests that Britain had been fighting the Nazis while the Soviet Union was still allied with Hitler. Angry words ensued, and they grew angrier, when Labor leaders urged the release of imprisoned Social Democrats in Soviet Russia and the satellite countries. Khrushchev launched into an abuse of the social democrats as the enemies of the working classes. He refused to release the prisoners or even to receive a list of those imprisoned. The anger rose even higher when questions were asked about anti-semitisim in the Soviet Union.

The Labor Party has a considerable faction that has tended to favor the Soviet Union as against the United States. Now this faction will be less effective. But the consequences in the European continent will be even greater. Now it can be recognized that the gulf between the communists and socialists has not been bridged, and the new Kremlin doctrine of a United front is as easy to renounce as to proclaim. My colleague Dick Hottelet cables me that among Communist slogans for May Day in East Germany is one addressed to social democratic "comrades" and trade union "colleagues". in East Germany, promising that if united they will be invincible. This slogan won't we orth a plugged nickel in West Germany next Tuesday.

The new Soviet program for Europe has been based on the collaboration with socialists, and it is no secret that the potential power of the propaganda has worried Western governments no end. Now, many socialists are beginning to recognize that communists simply cannot understand or respect the value of political opposition as the West practices it. Nor are Communists interested, as Western workers are, in human problems and values, such as men wrongly imprisoned, or persecuted because of their race. So the outlook for a United Front in Europe certainly is dimmer. And that hardly can be what the Russians intended when they went to London

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

Soviet policy would seem to be...more and more.. the policy of Khrushchev. And the stamp of his personality on what Russia does recalls the observation of Thomas Carlyle that "history is the essence of innumerable biographies." Khrushchev may be clever. He is also rather ovvious. As Will Rogers said, "Diplomacyis a great thing, it it wasn't transparent."

Goodnight and good luck!

Edward R. Murrow Mon., April 30, 1956

This is the news:

Senator Alben W. Barkley died today of a heart attack. The former Vice President had just finished addressing a mock political convention at Washington and Lee University... in Lexington, Kentucky... when he suddenly collapsed. Death was pronounced a few minutes later at Stonewall Jackson Memorial Hospital. He was 78 years old.

President Eisenhower discussed his foreign aid program today with the leaders of Congress having most to do with foreign policy. Earlier in the day, Secretary of State Dulles testified in favor of the aid program before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Mr. Dulles urged Congress to approve the long-term features of the program. He called long-term foreign aid "an indispensible part" of our foreign policy.

General LeMay, commander of the Strategic Air Command, testified again today before the Senate subcommittee investigating the state of American air power. LeMay said on the basis of present programs Russia "will enjoy a numerical advantage in long-range bombers in the period 1958-1960." And he proposed that the number of B-52 bombers planned for his command be increased. LeMay said, "We believe we now have the capability of winning any war the Soviets might start. We are not capable of winning it without this country receiving very serious damage."

President Eisenhower told the convention of the United States Chamber of Commerce today that the policies of his administration have created record prosperity. "We must now find more ways," he said, "to assist less flourishing segments of our economy to share more equitably in this abundance. We must continue to champion fiscal integrity and promote healthy economic growth."

The House Agriculture Committee approved a new farm bill today. The new measure contains the soil bank... favored by the Administration... but no provision for paying farmers in advance for taking surplus crop acreage out of production. Committee approval was unanimous, after a Republican effort to insert the pre-payment feature was defeated on a vote that followed party lines. The effort is certain to be renewed when the measure reaches the House floor. No action was taken on a companion bill that would provide subsidies, so as to raise prices to the equivalent of 90 percent of parity.

A Senate subcommittee approved a bill designed to cut down the illegal traffic in drugs. Under its provisions, a person convicted of selling heroin to youngsters under 18 could be sentenced to death. A person convicted of smuggling marijuana into the United States would be subject to 5-to-10 years imprisonment, instead of the 1-to-5 year term provided under present law.

The Supreme Court has postponed a ruling on the constitutionality of the Internal Security Act of 1950. By a 6-to-3 decision, it remanded the case to the Subversive Activities Control Board to determine whether perjured testimony led to the board's finding... in 1953... that the Communist Party in the United States is a tool of Moscow and consequently must register under terms of the act. The party has contended that former Communist Harvey Matusow and other ex-Communists lied to the board in the course of the hearings. It has also challenged the constitutionality of the act. In a dissenting opinion... in which Justices Reed and Minton concurred... Justice Clark said, "Never before have mere allegations of perjury, so flimsily supported, been considered grounds for reopening a proceeding or granting a new trial." As a result of today's majority decision, the Supreme Court cannot rule on the constitutionality of the Internal Security Act before next year.

United Nations Secretary General Hammarskjold flew to Jerusalem today... from Cairo... for a final round of talks with Israeli leaders. Hammarskjold met informally tonight with Israeli Foreign Minister Sharett. And tomorrow he is expected to see Premier Ben Gurion. Hammarskjold is seeking practical arrangements for enforcing the cease-fire agreed to by Israel and Egypt on April 18th. Israel accused Egypt today of breaking that agreement. A Foreign Office spokesman reported two Israelis killed yesterday in incidents along the Gaza Strip.

In North Africa, French troops today battled a strong rebel force only 12 miles from Algiers. According to unofficial reports, 83 rebels were killed in Algeria in the last 24 hours. French losses were unreported.

The Russian leaders returned to Moscow today from their 10-day visit in Britain. Both Soviet Premier Bulganin and Communist Party Boss Khrushchev praised British hospitality... and said their visit had been profitable. "Strange as it may seem," Khrushchev said, the only organization which tried to spoil the atmosphere was the Labor Party." Khrushchev was referring to the request... by some Laborites... of information on the fate of Socialists who had disappeared behind the → Iron Curtain. He said the Soviet Union favors the establishment of good relations with the United States. He said, "We shall do everything in that direction."

In Washington, the State Department told the Polish ambassador today "to cease immediately"... trying to pressure Polish refugees into going back behind the Iron Curtain. The State Department note said it had learned that officials of the Polish Embassy had been "seeking out Polish nationals in this country" and trying... by various methods... to prevail upon them to go home.

Edward R. Murrow: April 30, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

In the woods, when a great and ancient tree that has weathered many storms suddenly comes crashing down, there is the noise of smaller trees snapping back into position, the rustle and the cries of small creatures, and the descending noise of twigs, branches and bits of moss falling to the ground. And then there is silence, more complete and oppressive than any silence that went before. Frequently this happens on a dead calm day, for no apparent reason. So it was today with Senator Alben Barkley of Kentucky. He was making the keynote speech at Washington and Lee University. The occasion was their mock democratic convention. The Senator had just said: "I would rather be a servant in the House of the Lord than sit in the seat of the mighty." He collapsed and was pronounced dead ten minutes later.

It was altogether typical of the man that he devoted his last hour to politics and to youth. He was a man without cant, without rancor; a politician respected and admired, even by his opponents. In defeat he was resolute, and in victory indeed magnanimous. Few men have ever so endeared themselves in the hearts of their fellow-men. He had humor, but seldom used it to hurt. He was a man who wore both power and popularity loosely, almost carelessly, like an old cloak. He was tolerant of most things, except intolerance. He had been in politics since 1905. He was helpful to young men. He was a tireless political campaigner. And he was an orator of what is generally called "the old school". Anyone who heard his keynote speech at Philadelphia in 1948, or his brilliant performance at Chicago in 1952, heard political oratory at its best. At Chicago he had thought the presidential nomination to be within his grasp. He lost it - knew he had lost it - and then went before the Convention, shrugged his broad shoulders and proceeded to demonstrate how a good politician, and a good loser should act and speak.

He served as Vice President under Mr. Truman, became known as "The Veep", and was always the Gentleman from Paducah. He loved the cut and thrust of parliamentary debate. He was known during his years in the Senate as "the Ready Man", ready at the drop of a gavel to deliver a brilliant and lengthy speech, without benefit of notes or ghost writers. While he was Vice President he refused to have a bodyguard, saying: "I'm a big boy now, and who would want to harm a young man like me, anyway?"

He was loyal to his Party, but did not hesitate to break with Roosevelt in 1944 when the President vetoed a Tax Bill.

He was a man with manners, who liked people, who enjoyed good stories, some of them were old, but they were re-invigorated by the Barkley telling. After he finished his term as Vice President, he spent a couple of years in Kentucky and then went back to politics. He was elected the state's Junior Senator for the term beginning in January of last year. So he went back to Congress where he had first arrived as a Representative in 1913. He once said he hoped to keep on politicking to the end - and he did.

The tributes, the expressions of shock and sorrow, are already coming in. Senator Knowland of California says: "The country and Kentucky have lost a great citizen and a great senator." Senator Lehman of New York says: "Senator Barkley's death is a great shock to me, and a national disaster. His place in history is secure, but his place in our hearts will never be filled." McClellan of Arkansas: "The nation has lost a great man; one of the most beloved men in America". Ellender of Louisiana: "He was a great American and a great statesman. We have suffered a very grievous loss." Former President Truman called him "a citizen that the United States can always be proud of." President Eisenhower said: "The nation is the poorer by this tragic event."

To this reporter, Senator Barkley was always a man who took his duties and his responsibilities seriously, but who was always able to laugh, both at himself and his opposition. There will be many tributes to his ability, his loyalty and his humor. Some of them will be eloquent. But mostly they will resemble the sound of smaller trees snapping upright, branches, twigs and moss falling to the ground - after a giant tree has come crashing down.

Word for Today

~~Through reason, [illegible] of circumstances~~... American policy is being transformed. William Congreve called reason the power to guess at right and wrong. In every change of national policy, there is risk. But James B. Conant once observed, "Behold the turtle. He makes progress only when he sticks his neck out." (Can Bentley would have agreed,

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

MONDAY, APRIL 30, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

Senator Alben W. Barkley died today of a heart attack. The former Vice President had just finished addressing a mock political convention at Washington and Lee University..in Lexington, Virginia..when he collapsed. Death was pronounced a few minutes later at Stonewall Jackson Memorial Hospital. He was 78 years old.

President Eisenhower discussed his foreign aid program today with the leaders of Congress having most to do with foreign policy. Earlier in the day, Secretary of State Dulles testified in favor of the aid program before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Mr. Dulles urged Congress to approve the long-term features of the program. He called long-term foreign aid "an indispensible part" of our foreign policy.

General LeMay, commander of the Strategic Air Command, testified again today before the Senate subcommittee investigating the state of American air power. LeMay said on the basis of present programs Russia "will enjoy a numerical advantage in long-range bombers in the period 1958-1960." And he proposed that the number of B-52 bombers planned for his command be increased. LeMay said, "We believe we now have the capability of winning any war the Soviets might start. We are not capable of winning it without this country receiving very serious damage."

President Eisenhower told the convention of the United States Chamber of Commerce today that the policies of his administration have created record prosperity. "We must now find more ways," he said, "to assist less flourishing segments of our economy to share more equitably in this abundance. We must continue to champion fiscal integrety and promote healthy economic growth.

The House Agriculture Committee approved a new farm bill today. The new measure contains the soil bank..favored by the Administration..but no provision for paying farmers in advance for taking surplus crop acreage our of production. Committee approval was unanimous , after a Republican effort to insert the pre-payment feature was defeated on a vote that followed party lines. The effort is certain to be renewed then the measure reached the House floor. No action was taken on a companion bill that would provide subsidies, so as to raise prices to the equivalent of 90 percent of parity.

A Senate subcommittee approved a bill designed to cut down the illegal traffic in drugs. Under its provisions, a person convicted of selling heroin to youngsters under 18 could be sentenced to death. A person convicted of smuggling marijuana into the United States would be subject to 5 - to - 10 years imprisonment, instead of 1 - to - 5 year term provided under present law.

The Supreme Court has postponed a ruling on the constitutionality of the Internal Security Act of 1950. By a 6 - to - 3 decision, it remanded the case to the Subversive Activities Control Board to determine whether perjured testomony led to the board's finding..in 1953..that the Communist Party in the United States is a tool of Moscow and consequently must register under terms of the act. The party has contended that former Communist Harvey Matuso and other ex-Communists lied to the board in the course of the hearings. It has also challenged the constitutionality of the act. In a dissenting opinion..in which Justices Reed and Minton concurred. Justice Clark said, "Never before have more allegations of perjury, so flimsily supported, been considered grounds for repoening a proceeding or granting a new trial." As a result of today's majority decision, the Supreme Court cannot rule on the constitutionality of the Internal Security Act before next year.

United Nations Secretary General Hammarskjold flew to Jerusalem today.. from Cairo..for a final round of talks with Israeli leaders. Hammarskjold met informally tonight with Israeli Foreign Minister Sharett. And tomorrow he is expected to see Premier Ben Gurion. Hammarskjold is seeking practical arrangements for enforcing the cease - fire agreed to by Israel and Egypt on April 18th. Israel accused Egypt today of breaking that agreement. A Foreign Office spokesman reported two Israelis killed yesterday in incidents along the Gaza Strip.

In North Africa, French troops today battled a strong rebel force only 12 miles from Algiers. According to unofficial reports, 83 rebels were killed in Algeria in the last 24 hours. French losses were unreported.

The Russian leaders returned to Moscow today from their 10-day visit in Britain. Both Soviet Premier Bulganin and Communist Party Boss Khrushchev praised British hospitality and said their visit had been profitable. "strange as it may seem," Khrushchev said, "the only organization which tried to spoil the atmosphere was the Labor Party". Khrushchev was referring to the request ..by some Laborites..of information on the fate of Socialists who had disappeared behind the Iron Curtain. He said the Soviet Union favors the establishment of good relations with the United States. He said, "We shall do everything in that direction."

In Washington, the State Department told the Polish Ambassador today to cease immediately"..trying to pressure Polish refugees into going back behind the Iron Curtain. The State Department note said it has learned that officials of the Polish Embassy had been "seeking out Polish nationals in this country" and trying..by various methods..to prevail upon them to go home.

In the woods, when a great and ancient tree that has weathered many storms suddenly comes crashing down, there is the noise of smaller trees snapping back into position, the rustle and cries of small creatures, and the descending noise of twigs. branches and bits of moss falling to the ground. And then there is silence, more complete and oppressive than any silence that went before. Frequently this happens on a dead calm day, for no apparent reason. So it was today with Senator Alben Barkley of Kentucky. He was making the keynote speech at Washington and Lee Univeristy. The occasion was their mock democratic convention. The Senator had just said: "I would rather be a servant in the House of the Lord than sit in the seat of the mighty." He collapsed and was pronounced dead ten minutes later.

It aas altogether typical of the man that he devoted his last hour to politics and to youth. He as a man without cant, without rancor; a politician respected and admired, even by his opponents. In defeat he was resolute, and in victory indeed magnanimous. Few men have ever so endeared themselves in the hearts of their fellow - men. He had humor, but seldom used it to hurt. He was a man who wore both power and popularity loosely, almost carelessly, like an old cloak. He was tolerant of most things, except intolerance. He had been in politics since 1905. He was helpful to young men. He was a tireless political campaigner. And he was an orator of what is generally called "the old shcool." Anyone who heard his keynote speech in Philadelphia in 1948, or his brilliant performance at Chicago ln 1952, heard political oratory at its best. At Chicago he had thought the presidential nomination to be within his grasp. He lost it - knew he had lost it - and then went before the Convention, shrugged his broad shoulders and proceeded to demonstrate how a good politician and a good loser should act and speak.

He served as Vice President under Mr. Truman, became known at "The Veep", and was always the Gentleman from Paducah. He loved the cut and thrust of parliamentary debate. He was known during his years in the Senate as "the Ready Man", ready at the drop of a gavel to deliver a brilliant and lengthy speech, without benefit of notes or ghost writers. While he was Vice President he refused to have a bodyguard, saying: "I'm a big boy now, and who would want to harm a young man like me, anyway?"

He was loyal to his Party, but did not hesitate to break with Roosevelt in 1944 when the President vetoed a Tax Bill.

He was a man with manners, whol liked people, who enjoyed good stories, some of them were old, but they were re- invigorated by the Barkley telling. After he finished his term as Vice President, he spent a couple of years in Kentucky and then went back to politics. He was elected the states Junior Senator for the term beginning in January of last year. So he went back to Congress where he had first arrived as a Representative in 1913. He once said he hoped to keep on politicking to the end - and he did.

The tributes, the expressions of shock and sorrow, are already coming in. Senator Knowland of Calfiornia says: "The country and Kentucky have lost a great citizen and a great senator." Senator Lehman of New York says: "Senator Barkley's death is a great shock to me, and a national disaster. His place in history is secure, but his place in our hearts will neve be filled." McClellan of Arkansas: "The nation has lost a great man: one of the most beloved men in America." Allender of Louisiana: "He was a great American and a great statesman. We have suffered a very grievous loss." Former President Truman called him "a citizen that the United States ann always be proud of." President Eisenhower said; "The nation is the poorer by this tragic event."

To this reporter Senator Barkley was always a man who took his duties and his responsibilities seriously, but who was always able to laugh, both at himself and his opposition. Ther will be many tributes to his ability , his loyalty and his humor. Some of them will be eloquent. But mostly they will resemble the sound of smaller trees snapping upright, branches, twigs and moss falling to the ground - after a giant tree has some crashing down.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: American policy is being transformed. William Congreve called reason the power to guess at right and wrong. In every change of national policy there is risk. But James B. Conant once observed, "Behold the turtle. He makes progress only when he sticks his neck out." Senator Barkley would have agreed.

Good Night and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Tues., May 1, 1956

This is the news:

Israel and Egypt have agreed to a United Nations plan for policing the Gaza frontier. / The agreement... announced by Secretary General Hammarskjold... calls for establishment of U.N. observer posts along the demarcation line between Israel and the Gaza Strip, and for 20 or 30 more truce observers to patrol the area. / My colleague, Winston Burdett, cables from Jerusalem that these observers will not have full freedom of movement. Burdett says that while observers may visit their fixed border posts whenever they wish, they must travel to them along designated routes and accompanied, should either side request it, by Israeli or Egyptian officers. / Israel had expected Hammarskjold would also announce the agreement of three Arab states... Jordan, Syria and Lebanon... to a cease-fire, patterned after the one agreed to by Egypt and Israel on April 18th. / That announcement, Burdett says, may still be forthcoming.

A Dutch aircraft... chartered by the Egyptian government... was forced down by an Israeli fighter plane today, and the Dutch crew detained for questioning. An Egyptian flier was also held. Israel says the airplane was intercepted over the Negev. Cairo insists it was flying over Egyptian territory.

Russia staged its annual May Day parade today in Moscow's Red Square. The new Soviet bombers, which foreign observers expected to be displayed, did not appear. An improved model of the Mig-17 fighter was displayed. But it had been shown publicly last summer. The military parade lasted only 42 minutes. The principal speaker, Marshal Zhukov, charged that "reactionary circles" are continuing to follow the policy of the cold war. He also said, "Our people want to live in peace and friendship with the peoples of all the world."

The new Communist army of East Germany paraded today in Berlin. Dick Hottelet... who was there... says this is the first time East German troops have appeared in Berlin, bearing arms.

In Rome, Pope Pius urged "the whole world of labor" to turn to Christ. The occasion was the first celebration of the Feast of St. Joseph, honoring the carpenter husband of the Virgin Mary.

Harold Stassen said in London today that progress has been made in the current disarmament talks... but that "the areas of disagreement remain more important than the areas of agreement." Stassen... who has been representing the United States... said Russia has refused to accept mutual air inspection. In the House of Commons, Prime Minister Eden described the five-power talks as being in a "tangled state". But he said he hopes they will continue.

Secretary of State Dulles took off for Paris today, for a meeting of the foreign ministers of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Before leaving, Mr. Dulles issued a statement, saying the NATO countries are held together "by sentiments far more profound than fear, and by objectives far more fundamental, than military strength." The secretary has suggested that the political and economic role of NATO be expanded. (I should like to discuss this further, in a few minutes).

Secretary of Defense Wilson told a news conference today, that Russia is outstripping the United States in the production of intercontinental jet bombers. "They are currently building," he said, "at a faster rate." Wilson said the Air Force plans to expand its B-52 bomber wings from 30 aircraft, to 45. This is made possible, he said, by the recent order stepping up production.

→

General Pate, commandant of the Marine Corps, told Congress today that Staff Sergeant Matthew McKeon has been charged with manslaughter. On April 8th, McKeon marched a platoon of 78 recruits into a tidal stream near the Marine base at Parris Island, South Carolina. Six Marines drowned. Pate told the House Armed Services Committee a court of inquiry found McKeon had been drinking vodka, before ordering the march, and that it recommended a general court martial. Secretary of the Navy Thomas has approved the recommendation. General Pate said he has ordered the boot training program overhauled. Major General Burger will be relieved as commanding officer of the Parris Island base... and transferred to command the Marine barracks at Camp Lejeune, where there is no recruit training. At the time of the tragedy, McKeon said he ordered the march as a disciplinary measure, and was not aware of the danger. The House committee says, that in view of General Pate's full report, it will take no further action at this time.

A special Senate committee began hearings today, in its investigation of lobbying practices. The first witness was Maston Nixon of

Corpus Christi, Texas. Nixon identified himself as chairman of the General Gas Committee, an organization opposed to federal controls on natural gas producers. Nixon said his group made no campaign contributions and reported its activities in support of the natural gas bill... later vetoed by President Eisenhower... "in scrupulous compliance" with the federal lobbying law. ~~He said nearly 120 thousand dollars was spent, and that most of it went for staff salaries and literature.~~

Republican congressional leaders conferred with President Eisenhower today about a farm bill. Representative Halleck indicated afterward that Mr. Eisenhower might accept a measure that does not provide advance payments for the soil bank.

Edward R. Murrow: May 1, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

This week's meeting of the NATO Council is getting the advance treatment usually accorded ~~to~~ a great historic event. A transformation of the alliance may be in the works that will give it a tremendous political or economic importance, or both. Secretary Dulles contributed one of his typical phrases to the build-up. That is that he will be glad to talk about advancing NATO to its "totality of meaning." Newsmen failed to extract from the Secretary a fill-in on this "totality of meaning", and he did not produce a blueprint of it for the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

NATO has always had an acknowledged if limited political function, and Section Two of the treaty provides that the signatories "will seek to eliminate conflict in their economic policies, and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them." It also says that members are to "promote conditions of stability and well-being", a clause that would entitle them to undertake almost anything they wished.

Both political and economic activity have been receiving attention. Council meetings always set aside time for political consultation. And this went further last year before the Geneva conference, when the Big Three laid their policies for that meeting before the Council for approval. As a result they went to Geneva feeling that they were speaking for fifteen nations as well as themselves.

Economically NATO already is an agency, in a small way, for distributing military aid. American dollars have gone to finance defense production in single countries for the use and benefit of other members. Thereby the United States not only finances its own exports, but the exports of the producing European country. Now a possibility will be discussed of developing this small start into a big system, producing capital goods for under-developed countries.

This has been picturesquely called a "NATO Aid Club." It would provide for groups of industries in NATO countries sharing in the manufacture of the capital goods. The cost would be privately financed by loans that would bear low interest guaranteed by the United States. This is different from the Marshall Plan, which was not financed by loans, and which primarily helped the NATO countries. The "NATO Aid Club" would benefit NATO countries by stimulating their production and exports. But the aid would go to non-members in Eastern Europe, Africa, the Middle East and the Far East. The idea of the Aid Club was recently laid before Washington by the German industrialist Herr Krupp von Bohlen.

Since West Germany has the most thriving industrial establishment in Europe, its desire to play a big part in world-wide economic aid is understandable. So is its reliance on the United States to guarantee interest on the loans, since no other country could do it. However, Germany's competitors are against NATO becoming an Aid Club. Britain wants NATO's economic activities limited to consultation. France does not think NATO a suitable agency to conduct aid throughout the world and wants this function turned over to the United Nations. The French argue this would assure Soviet co-operation and thus take economic aid out of the cold war. A similar argument was put forward by our U.N. Ambassador Lodge for extending the use of the United Nations for distributing aid. His statement presumably means that the Administration is not for transforming NATO into a vast economic agency. Secretary Dulles told the Foreign Relations Committee that he did not favor making NATO into a supervisory organ for economic aid. Senator George also has spoken out against it. So the promoters of the Aid Club already have received a jolt from the one country that could underwrite it financially. However they argue that the Soviet Union with its veto power could dominate or stifle world-wide aid if it was confined to the U.N. And they point out that if it were kept there Germany could have no big part, since it is not a member.

The economic planners yesterday found Canada against them. Lester Pearson in a London speech opposed developing wide economic powers for NATO, and stressed instead the need of it exercising greater political powers. He held out the hope of NATO becoming an Atlantic Community, and pleaded for more frequent ministerial meetings and an accepted custom of member nations never taking action that affected other members, politically or economically, without prior discussion at NATO meetings. ~~He did urge a shift in emphasis from military to non-military co-operation, so as to disprove the Kremlin's thesis that NATO is an aggressive military alliance directed against the Soviet Union.~~

The development of modern weapons, Mr. Pearson said, has made military superiority almost meaningless and armament races irrevelant. "It surely does not take much hard thinking" he declared, to come to the conclusion that in their own interests nation states should work together toward supra-national communities."

It will be generally recognized at the Paris meeting that a military alliance needs to unite for something to remain dynamic, if the military threat that brought it into existence is diminishing. Its members may not be agreed on what they are for. But they are thinking about it, and that has to come first.

Ted Pearson. -

Word for Today

Mr. Dulles has left for Paris to consult with our NATO allies. He takes with him no complete, pre-arranged plan. Sidney Hook once said, "As a creature of time, man must approach his problems piecemeal. When he does so, he finds that good conflicts with good, and that we pay a price for every step of progress."

Goodnight and good luck!

This is the news:

Israel and Egypt have agreed to a United Nations plan for policing the Gaza frontier. The agreement... announced by Secretary General Hammarskjold... calls for establishment of U.N. observer posts along the demarcation line between Israel and the Gaza Strip, and for 20 or 30 more truce observers to patrol the area. My colleague, Winston Burdett, cables from Jerusalem that these observers will not have full freedom of movement. Burdett says that while observers may visit their fixed border posts whenever they wish, they must travel to them along designated routes and accompanied, should either side request it, by Israeli or Egyptian officers. Israel had expected Hammarskjold would also announce the agreement of three Arab states... Jordan, Syria and Lebanon... to a cease-fire patterned after the one agreed to by Egypt and Israel on April 18th. That announcement, Burdett says, may still be forthcoming.

A Dutch aircraft... chartered by the Egyptian government... was forced down by an Israeli fighter plane today and the Dutch crew detained for questioning. An Egyptian flier was also held. Israel says the airplane was intercepted over the Negev. Cairo insists it was flying over Egyptian territory.

Russia staged its annual May Day parade today in Moscow's Red Square. The new Soviet bombers, which foreign observers expected to be displayed, did not appear. An improved model of the Mig-17 fighter was displayed. But it had been shown publicly last summer. The military parade lasted only 42 minutes. The principal speaker, Marshal Zhukov, charged that "reactionary circles" are continuing to follow the policy of the cold war. He also said, "Our people want to live in peace and friendship with the peoples of all the world."

The new Communist army of East Germany paraded today in Berlin. Dick Hottelet... who was there... says this is the first time East German troops have appeared in Berlin, bearing arms.

In Rome, Pope Pius urged "the whole world of labor" to turn to Christ. The occasion was the first celebration of the Feast of St. Joseph, honoring the carpenter husband of the Virgin Mary.

30

Harold Stassen said in London today that progress has been made in the current disarmament talks... but that "the areas of disagreement remain more important than the areas of agreement." Stassen... who has been representing the United States... said Russia has refused to accept mutual air inspection. In the House of Commons, Prime Minister Eden described the five-power talks as being in a "tangled state". But he said he hopes they will continue.

Secretary of State Dulles took off for Paris today, for a meeting of the foreign ministers of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Before leaving, Mr. Dulles issued a statement, saying the NATO countries are held together "by sentiments far more profound than fear, and by objectives far more fundamental than military strength." The secretary has suggested that the political and economic role of NATO be expanded. (I should like to discuss this further in a few minutes).

Secretary of ~~State~~ Defense Wilson told a news conference today that Russia is outstripping the United States in the production of intercontinental jet bombers. "They are currently building," he said, "at a faster rate." Wilson said the Air Force plans to expand its B-52 bomber wings from 30 aircraft, to 45. This is made possible, he said, by the recent order stepping up production.

41 →

General Pate, commandant of the Marine Corps, told Congress today that Staff Sergeant Matthew McKeon has been charged with manslaughter. On April 8th, McKeon marched a platoon of 78 recruits into a tidal stream near the Marine base at Parris Island, South Carolina. Six Marines drowned. Pate told the House Armed Services Committee a court of inquiry found McKeon had been drinking vodka, before ordering the march, and that it recommended a general court martial. Secretary of the Navy Thomas has approved the recommendation. General Pate said he has ordered the boot training program overhauled. Major General Burger will be relieved as commanding officer of the Parris Island base... and transferred to command the Marine barracks at Camp Lejeune, where there is no recruit training. At the time of the tragedy, McKeon said he ordered the march as a disciplinary measure, and was not aware of the danger. The House committee says that in view of General Pate's full report, it will take no further action at this time.

A special Senate committee began hearings today, in its investigation of lobbying practices. The first witness was Maston Nixon of

Corpus Christi, Texas. Nixon identified himself as chairman of the General Gas Committee, an organization opposed to federal controls on natural gas producers. Nixon said his group made no campaign contributions and reported its activities in support of the natural gas bill... later vetoed by President Eisenhower... "in scrupulous compliance" with the federal lobbying law. He ~~said nearly 120-thousand dollars was spent,~~ and ~~that most of it went for staff salaries and literature.~~

Republican congressional leaders conferred with President Eisenhower today about a farm bill. Representative Halleck indicated afterward that Mr. Eisenhower might accept a measure that does not provide advance payments for the soil bank.

Edward R. Murrow: May 1, 1956. 7:45 p.m.

11:15
6:15
5:50

This week's meeting of the NATO Council is getting the advance treatment usually accorded to a great historic event. A transformation of the alliance may be in the works that will give it a tremendous political or economic importance, or both. Secretary Dulles contributed one of his typical phrases to the build-up. That is that he will be glad to talk about advancing NATO to its "totality of meaning." Newsmen failed to extract from the Secretary a fill-in on this "totality of meaning", and he did not produce a blueprint of it for the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

NATO has always had an acknowledged if limited political function, and Section Two of the treaty provides that the signatories "will seek to eliminate conflict in their economic policies, and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them." It also says that members are to "promote conditions of stability and well-being", a clause that would entitle them to undertake almost anything they wished.

Both political and economic activity have been receiving attention. Council meetin s always set aside time for political consultation. And this went further last year before the Geneva conference, when the Big Three laid their policies for that meeting before the Council for approval. As a result they went to Geneva feeling that they were speaking for fifteen nations as well as themselves.

Economically NATO already is an agency, in a small way, for distributing military aid. American dollars have gone to finance defense production in single countries for the use and benefit of other members. Thereby the United States not only finances its own exports, but the exports of the producing European country. Now a possibility will be discussed of developing this small start into a big system, producing capital goods for under-developed countries.

This has been picturesquely called a NATO Aid Club. It would provide for groups of industries in NATO countries sharing in the manufacture of the capital goods. The cost would be privately financed by loans that would bear low interest guaranteed by the United States. This is different from the Marshall Plan, which was not financed by loans, and which primarily helped the NATO countries. The NATO Aid Club would benefit NATO countries by stimulating their production and exports. But the aid would go to non-members in Eastern Europe, Africa, the Middle East and the Far East. The idea of the Aid Club was recently laid before Washington by the German industrialist Herr Krupp von Bohlen.

Since West Germany has the most thriving industrial establishment in Europe, its desire to play a big part in world-wide economic aid is understandable. So is its reliance on the United States to guarantee interest on the loans, since no other country could do it. However, Germany's competitors are against NATO becoming an Aid Club. Britain wants NATO's economic activities limited to consultation. France does not think NATO a suitable agency to conduct aid throughout the world and wants this function turned over to the United Nations. The French argue this would assure Soviet co-operation and thus take economic aid out of the cold war. A similar argument was put forward by our U.N. Ambassador Lodge for extending the use of the United Nations for distributing aid. His statement presumably means that the Administration is not for transforming NATO into a vast economic agency. Secretary Dulles told the Foreign Relations Committee that he did not favor making NATO into a supervisory organ for economic aid. Senator George also has spoken out against it. So the promoters of the Aid Club already have received a jolt from the one country that could underwrite it financially. However they argue that the Soviet Union with its veto power could dominate or stifle world-wide aid if it was confined to the U.N. And they point out that if it were kept there Germany could have no big part, since it is not a member.

The economic planners yesterday found Canada against them. Lester Pearson in a London speech opposed developing wide economic powers for NATO, and stressed instead the need of it exercising greater political powers. He held out the hope of NATO becoming an Atlantic Community, and pleaded for more frequent ministerial meetings and an accepted custom of member nations never taking action that affected other members, politically or economically, without prior discussion at NATO meetings. He did urge a shift in emphasis from military to non-military co-operation, so as to disprove the Kremlin's thesis that NATO is an aggressive military alliance directed against the Soviet Union.

The development of modern weapons, Mr. Pearson said, has made military superiority almost meaningless and armament races irrevelant. "It surely does not take much hard thinking" he declared, to come to the conclusion that in their own interests nation states should work together toward supra-national communities."

It will be generally recognized at the Paris meeting that a military alliance needs to unite for something to remain dynamic, if the military threat that brought it into existence is diminishing. Its members may not be agreed on what they are for. But they are thinking about it, and that has to come first.

Word for Today

Mr. Dulles has left for Paris, to consult with our NATO allies. He takes with him no complete, pre-arranged plan. Sidney Hook once said, "As a creature of time, man must approach his problems piecemeal. When he does so, he finds that good conflicts with good, and that we pay a price for every step of progress."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

TUESDAY, MAY 1, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

Israel and Egypt have agreed to a United Nations plan for policing the Gaza frontier. The agreement..announced by Secretary General Hammarskjold... calls for establishment of U.N. observer posts along the demarcation line between Israel and the Gaza Strip, and for 20 or 30 more truce observers to patrol the area. My colleague, Winston Burdett, cables from Jerusalem that these observers will not have full freedom of movement. Burdett says that while observers may visit their fixed border bosts whenever they wish, they must travel to them along designated routes and accompanied, should either side request it, by Israeli or Egyptian officers. Israel had expected Hammarskjold would also announce the agreement of three Arab states ..Jordan, Syria and Lebanon..to a cease-fire patterned after the one agreed to by Egypt and Israel on April 18th. That announcement, Burdett says, may still be forthcoming.

A Dutch aircraft..chartered by the Egyptian government..was forced down by an Israeli fighter plane today and the Dutch crew detained for questioning. An Egyptian flier was also held. Israel says the airplane was intercepted over the Negev. Cairo insists it was flying over Egyptian terriorry.

Russia staged its annual May Day parade today in Moscow's Red Square. The new Soviet bombers, which foreign observers expected to be displayed, did not appear. An improved model of the Mig-17 fighter was displayed. But it had been shown publicly last summer. Them military parade lasted only 42 minutes. The principal speaker, Marshal Zhukov, charged that "reactionary circles" are continuing to follow the policy of the cold war. He also said, "Our people want to live in peace and friendship with the peoples of all the world."

The new Communist army of East Germany paraded today in Berlin. Dick Hottelet..who was there..says this is the first time East German troops have appeared in Berlin bearing arms.

In Rome, Pope Pius urged "the whole world of labor" to turn to Christ. The occasion was the first celebration of the Feast of St. Joseph, honoring the carpenter husband of the Virgin Mary.

Secretary of State Dulles took off for Paris today, for a meeting of the foreign ministers of the North Atlantic Treaty Oragnization. Before leaving, Mr. Dulles issued a statement saying the NATO countries are held together "by sentiments far more profound than fear, and by objectives far more fundamental then military strength." The secretary has suggested that the political and economic role of NATO be expanded. (I should like to discuss this further in a few minutes.)

Secretary of Defense Wilson told a news conference today that Russia is outstripping the United States in the production of intercontinental jet bombers. "They are currently building," he said, "at a faster rate." Wilson said the Air Force plans to expand its B-52 bomber wings from 30 aircraft to 45. This is made possible, he said, by the recent order stepping up production.

General Pate, Commandant of the Marine Corps, told Congress today that Staff Sergeant Matthew McKeon has been charged with manslaughter. On April 8th, McKeon marched a platoon of 78 recruits into a tidal stream near the Marine base at Parris Island, South Carolina. Six Marines drowned. Pate told the House Armed Services Committee a court of inquiry found McKeon had been drinking vodka, before ordering the march, and that it recommended a general court martial. Secretary of the Navy Thomas has approved the recommendation. General Pate said he has ordered the boot training program overhauled. Major General Burger will be relieved as commanding officer of the Parris Island base..and transferred to command the Marine Barracks at Camp Lejeune, where there is no recruit training. At the time of the tragedy, McKeon said he ordered the march as a disciplinary measure and was not aware of the danger. The House committee says that in view of General Pate's full report, it will take no further action at this time.

A special Senate committee began hearings today in its investigation of lobbying practices. The first witness was Maston Nixon of Corpus Christi , Texas. Nixon identified himself as chairman of the General Gas Committee, an organization opposed to federal controls on natural gas producers. Nixon said his group made no campaign contributions and reported its activities in support of the natural gas bill..later vetoes by President Eisenhower..."in scrupulous compliance" with the federal lobbying law.

Republican congressional leaders conferred with President Eisenhower today about a farm bil . Representative Halleck indicated afterward that Mr. Eisenhower might accept a measure that does not provide advance payments for the soil bank.

This week's meeting of the NATO Council is getting the advance treatment usually accorded a great historic event. A transformation of the alliance may be in the works that will give it a tremendous political or economic importance, or both. Secretary Dulles contributed one of his typical phrases to the build-up. That is that he will be glad to talk about advancing NATO to its "totality of meaning." and he did not produce a blueprint of it for the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

NATO has always had an acknowledged, if limited, political function, and Section Two of the treaty provides that the signatories "well seek to eliminate conflict in their economic policies, and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them." It also says that members are to "promote conditions of stability and well-being" a clause that would entitle them to undertake almost anything they wished.

Both political and economic activity have been receiving attention. Council meetings always set aside time for political consultation. And this went further last year before the Geneva conference, when the Big Three laid their policies for that meeting before the Council for approval. As a result they went to Geneva feeling that they were speaking for fifteen nations as well as themselves.

Economically NATO already is an agency, in a small way, for distributing military aid. American dollars have gone to finance defense production in single countries for the use and benefit of other members. Thereby the United States not only finances its own exports, but the exports of the producing European country. Now a possibility will be disucssed of developint this small start into a big system, producing capital goods for under-developed countries.

This has been picturesquely called a "NATO Aid Club." It would provide for groups of industries in NATO countries sharing the manufacture of the capital goods. The cost would be privately finacced by loans that would bear low interest guaranteed by the United States. This is different from the Marshall Plan, which was not financed by loans, and which primarily helped the NATO countries. The "NATO Aid Club" would benefit NATO countries by stimulating their productiom and exports. But the aid would go to non-members in Eastern Europe, Africa, the Middle East and the Far East. The idea of the Aid Club was recently laid before Washington by the German industrialist Herr Krupp von Bohlen.

Since West Germany has the most thriving industrial establishment in Europe, its desire to play a big part in world-wide economic aid is understandable. So is its reliance on the United States to guarantee interest on the loans, since no other country could do it. However, Germany's competitors are against NATO becoming an Aid Club. Britain wants NATO's economic activities limited to consultation. France does not think NATO a suitable agency to conduct aid throughout the world and wants this function turned over to the United Nations. The French argue this would assure Soviet co-operation and thus take economic aid out of the cold war. A similar argument was put forward by our U.N. Ambassador Lodge for extending the use of the United Nations for distributing aid. His statement presumably means that the Administration is not for transforming NATO into a vast economic agency. Secretary Dulles told the Foreign Relations Committee that he did not favor making NATO into a supervisory or an for economid aid. Senator George also has spoken out against it. So the promoters of the Aid Club already have received a jolt from the one country that could underwrite it financially. However they argue that the Soviet Union with its veto power could cominate or stifle world-wide aid it it was confined to the U.N. And they point out that if it were kept there Germany could have no big part, since it is not a member.

The economic planners yesterday found Canada against them.Lester Pearson in a London speech opposed developing wide economic powers for NATO, and stressed instead the need of it exercising greater political powers. He held out the hope of NATO becoming an Atlantic Community, and pleaded for more frequent ministerial meetings an an accepted custom of member nations never taking action that affected other members, politically or economically, without prior discussion at NATO meetings.

The development of modern wapons, Mr. Pearson said, has made military supiority almost meaningless and armament races irrevelant. "It surely does not take much hard thinking he declared, to come to the conclusion that in their own interests nation states should work together toward supra-national communities."

It will be generally recognized at the Paris meeting that a military alliance needs to unite for something to remain dynamic, if the military threat that brought it into existence is diminishing. Its members may not be agreed on what they are for. But they are thinking about it, and that has to come first.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Ted Pearson.

PEARSON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: Mr. Dulles has left for Paris to consult with our NATO allies. He takes with him no complete, pre-arranged plan. Sidney Hook once said, "As a creature of time, man must approach his problems peicemenal. When he does so, he finds that good conflicts with good, and that we pay a price for every step of progress."

Good Night and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Wed., May 2, 1956

This is the news:

The head of the Strategic Air Command... General LeMay... told a Senate committee today that only two out of seventeen B-52 bombers produced in the last three months have been accepted by the Air Force. LeMay said most of the aircraft were rejected "because of a component failure for which we now have a solution." He reported that 41 of 57 long-range jet bombers produced before January first were accepted. Four B-52's were produced and accepted in January.

The House opened debate today on a new farm bill. The measure calls for the soil bank... requested by the Administration... but does not contain the pre-payment feature President Eisenhower asked for. Under that feature, farmers would be paid this year for acreage they agree to withdraw from production next year. In today's debate, Republican Representative Hope of Kansas called the bill "95 percent non-controversial." Representative Halleck of Indiana said there is a good chance the Administration will still get the authority it wants to make advance payments. He said he has been discussing the issue with influential Democrats... and that there might be some sort of compromise.

→

Funeral services were held in Washington today for Senator Alben Barkley. President Eisenhower and other Government leaders, and friends, attended services conducted by the Senate chaplain, Dr. Frederick Brown Harris. Dr. Harris said that Senator Barkley was "one who counted it as part of his religion, to help see that his country was well-governed... a man who found constant fun in living, and reveled in laughter." The burial will be tomorrow in Paducah, Kentucky.

Moscow has rejected an American protest against two Soviet diplomats, accused of pressuring FIVE Russian seamen into going home. The FIVE seamen had requested asylum in the United States, but went back to Russia under mysterious circumstances. The State Department accused two members of the Russian delegation at the United Nations, of applying pressure, and ordered the two diplomats out of the country. Moscow calls the American accusation "without foundation".

Secretary of State Dulles arrived in Paris today for the meeting, later this week, of the NATO council of foreign ministers. Shortly after his arrival, Mr. Dulles had a two-hour talk with French Foreign Minister Pineau. Diplomatic sources say the discussion covered a wide range of subjects, including the possible expansion of NATO in the political and economic fields.

In London, the five-power disarmament talks [redacted] entered their final phase. The conference has asked its secretariat to prepare a report on the discussions, and the talks are expected to end without agreement on Friday. At today's session, the possibility of limiting stockpiles of nuclear weapons was again discussed.

U.N. Secretary General Hammarskjold flew to Damascus today to confer with Syrian leaders. Syria has said it will not agree to a cease-fire with Israel, unless Israel promises not to resume work on the Jordan River power and irrigation project. [redacted] Jordan and Lebanon have taken the same position. Israel says it will not make such a promise. And Hammarskjold went to Syria today to try to break the deadlock. After a long talk with the Syrian premier and defense minister, he flew back to Jerusalem. He would not say whether today's mission was a success.

Israel said today that it is releasing the Dutch airplane intercepted yesterday over the Negev, along with its Dutch crew. The aircraft had been chartered by the Egyptian government. The Israeli announcement did not mention the Egyptian flier who was also aboard the plane when it was forced down.

The Egyptian government announced today that Premier Nasser has accepted an invitation to visit Italy. No date has been set. Italy is said to feel such a visit might contribute to a long-term settlement of the Palestine problem.

President Tubman of Liberia said today that he has turned down a Soviet bid to go to Moscow.

And in Bonn, the West German government rejected a Russian offer of a trade treaty. A West German spokesman said such an agreement is impossible as long as Germany is divided.

In Algeria, the Nationalist revolt has entered its 19th month. Scattered fighting continues, and a curfew has been extended to eight towns near Algiers.

The Marine Corps today appointed Major General David M. Shoup to the newly created post of inspector general for training. [redacted] a combat commander in World War Two and wears the Congressional Medal of Honor. In his new job, he will supervise recruit training, [redacted] The appointment is a result of the "disciplinary march" at Parris Island, South Carolina, [redacted] The staff sergeant who ordered the march has been charged with [redacted] manslaughter and faces a general court martial.

Returns from the Alabama primary show State Representative Charles McKay easily defeating Governor Folsom in the race for Democratic national committeeman. McKay, [redacted] a strong advocate of racial segregation, [redacted] had accused Folsom of being luke-warm on the subject. Senator Lister Hill won easy renomination. Only a few more than half the returns are in from the primary in the District of Columbia. These returns show supporters of Adlai Stevenson holding a wide lead over delegates supporting Senator Kefauver.

In Minneapolis, the general conference of the Methodist Church today adopted a statement of racial principles, asking that segregation

Edward R. Murrow: May 2, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

The defense against an inter-continental missile with a hydrogen warhead appears to be tied up with the problem of how to gain a matter of four-and-a-half minutes of time. Without this much time, there may be no defense. With it, there may be. This statement may sound like a passage from science fiction. But it is the studied opinion one of the eminent military figures of the world, Field Marshal Viscount Montgomery, deputy commander of Supreme Headquarters of NATO. He propounded the problem to newsmen at SHAPE, basing his estimate on the development of a 5,000 mile missile by 1961. When - or if - it comes, the present defense concepts based on jet bombers, will have been just a transition stage. He said the inter-continental missile will become the main instrument of war.

Lord Montgomery forecast the development of a missile that can fly five thousand miles in fifteen minutes. The only defense against it, he indicated, would be a counter-missile, one that could stop it somewhere on the way. And for this to be possible, there must be a counter-missile of adequate range, and there must be the means to detect the in-coming weapon. And this is where the need of the few minutes comes in. It arises from the fact that the earth's surface is curved. According to Monty, take any place on earth, launch a five thousand mile missile, and you find that the radar detecting device at the potential target cannot pick up the approaching missile until it is at least halfway on its journey. If the missile can complete the journey in fifteen minutes, the defensive action can't begin for seven-and-a-half minutes. This obviously is not enough.

Lord Montgomery said that the solution of the problem is to place the detecting device halfway between the launching site and the intended target, that is, 2,500 miles from each. Then it could pick up the aggressor and launch a counter-missile while the original missile had gone only fifteen to twenty percent of the way. The defense would then have about twelve minutes instead of seven-and-a-half.

This talk by Monty, which was reported by the Paris correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor, obviously points to the importance of Europe's NATO members, who are about halfway between the Soviet launching site and the target across the Atlantic. The nature of war may be changing, along with the role of armies, navies and air forces. But detecting devices in NATO countries could save the four-and-a-half minutes needed to launch a defensive weapon, another reason to keep NATO from breaking up.

Montgomery granted that armies, navies and air forces still would have functions in the new kind of war, but he said there no longer would be justification to keep them as separate services. The cost of the inter-continental missiles would be so great, he thought, that no country could afford separate services, with their duplications, overlaps and inefficiency. So he said he favored setting up integration of the services as a definite goal. Otherwise, he added, with a typical Monty phrase: "We might well muck up the whole chance of survival."

Field Marshal Montgomery's comments are not offered as the last word on the subject; in fact they are close to being first words. It is only a few days since the world first heard that a hydrogen warhead could be used on an inter-continental missile. Nikita Khrushchev spilled the secret in an outburst in a speech in England. Our own experts have since told Congress that a scientific break-through had been made and we too can make such an hydrogen warhead. The five thousand mile missile still hasn't been perfected. Much of the nervousness in Washington lately has been due to the fear that the Russians will have it first. If by then we don't have a counter-missile, the nuclear stalemate with the Soviet Union will have ended, and the Russians will have a nuclear superiority.

Lord Montgomery spoke of a counter-missile that would bring down the original missile. That of itself sounds like science fiction. But radar development, linked with the new electronic computing machines, works miracles that would permit just this kind of accuracy, and go beyond the science fiction dreams of only a short while back. However, Monty might just as well have said - which he didn't - that if one side sends a hydrogen weapon that is detected on the way over, that would be an act of war to which the defense almost surely would respond in kind. It not only would try to stop the weapon part way, but it also would want to cripple the aggressor country as much as possible at the very start of the war.

~~As a footnote to these speculations, let me add that the DEW line - the Distant Early Warning line - which we are helping to build in northern Canada to deal with nuclear attacks over the Arctic, apparently belongs to what Monty called the transitional stage. As far as can be judged from published material, the DEW Line is designed to detect planes but not rocket missiles, which move ten to fifteen times faster than jet bombers. If that is true, and if Lord Montgomery is right in his assumptions, this costly line could become obsolete in five years.~~ the Radar - in the arctic

Word for Today

The services for Senator Barkley were marked by tribute to the man's integrity. John Morley once observed, "Those who would treat politics and morality apart will never understand the one or the other." And Daniel O'Connell said, more than a hundred years ago, "Nothing is politically right which is morally wrong."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NEWS

WEDNESDAY, MAY 2, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.D.S.T.

This is the news:

The head of the Strategic Air Command..General LeMay...told a Senate committee today that only two out of seventeen B-52 bombers produced in the last three months have veen accepted by the Air Force. LeMay said most of the aircraft were rejected "because of a component failure for which we now have a solution." He reported that 41 of the 57 long-range jet bombers produced before Jaunuary first were accepted. Four B-52's were produced and accepted in January.

The House opened debate today on a new farm bill. The measure calls for the soil bank..requested by the Administration..bot does not contain the prepayment feature President Eisenhower asked for. Under that feature, farmers would be paid this year for acreage they agree to withdraw from production next year. In today's debate, Republican Representative Hope of Kansas called the bill "95 percent non-controversial." Representative Halleck of Indiana said there is a good chance the Administration will still get the authority it wants to make advance payments. He said he has been discussing the issue with influential Democrats..and that there might be some sort of compromise.

Feneral services were held in Washington today for Senator Alben Barkley. President Eisenhower and other Government leaders, and friends, attended services conducted by the Senate chaplain, Dr. Frederick Brown Harris. Dr. Harris said that Senator Berkley was "one who counted it as part of his religion to help see that his country was well-governed..a man who found constant fun in living and reveled in laughter." The burial will be tomorrow in Paducah, Kentucky.

Moscow has rejected an American protest against two Soviet diplomats accused of pressuring five Russian seamen into going home. The five seamen had requested asylum in the United States but went back to Russia under mysterious circumstances. The State Department accused two members of the Russian delegation at the United Nations of applying pressure, and ordered the two diplomats out of the country. Moscow calls the American accusation "without foundation."

Secratary of State Dulles arrived in Paris today for the meeting later this week of the NATO council of foreign ministers. Shortly after his arrival, Mr. Dulles had a two-hour talk with French Foreign Minister Pineau. Diplomatic sources say the discussion covered a wide range of subject, including the possible expansion of NATO in the political and economic fields.

In London, the five- power disarmamanct talks entered their final phase. The conference has asked its secretariat to prepare a report on the disucssion and the talks are expected to end without agreement on Friday. At today's session, the possibility of limiting stockpiles of nuclear weapons was again discussed.

U.n. Secretary General Hammarskjold flew to Damascus today to confer with Syrian leaders. Syria has said it will notagree to a cease-fire with Israel, unless Israel promises not to resume work on the Jordan River power and irrigation project Jordan and Lebanon have taken the same position. Israel says it will not make such a promise. And Hammarskjold went to Syria today to try to break the deadlock. After a long talk with the Syrian premier and defense minister, he flew back to Jerusalem. He would now say whether today's mission was a success.

Israel said today that it is releasing the Dutch airplane intercepted yesterday over the Negev, along with its Dutch crew. The aircraft has been chartered by the Egyptian government. The Israeli announcement did not mention the Egyptian flier who was also aboard the plane when it was forced down.

The Egyptian government announced today that Premier Nasser has accepted an invitation to visit Italy. No date has been set. Italy is said to feel such a visit might contribute to a long-term settlement of the Palestine problem.

President Tubman of Liberia said today that he has turned down a Soviet bid to go to Moscow. And in Bonn, the West German government rejected a Russian offer of a trade treaty. A West German spokesman said such an agreement is impossible as long as Germany is divided.

In Algeria, the Nationalist revolt has entered its 19th month. Scattered fighting continues, and a curfew has been extended to eight towns near Algiers.

The Marine Corps today appointed Major General David M. Shoup to the newly created post of inspector general for training.

Returns from the Alabama primary show State Representative Charles McKay easily defeating Governor Folson in the race for Democratic national committeeman. McKay, a strong advocate of racial segregation, had accused Folson of being luke-warm on the subject. Senator Lister Hill won easy renomination. Only a few more than half the returns are in from the primary in the District of Columbia. These returns show supporters of Adlai Stevenson holding a wide lead over delebates supporting Senator Kefauver.

The defense against an inter-continental missile with a hydrogen warhead appears to be tied up with the problem of how to gain a matter of four - and - a - half minutes of time. Without this much time, there may be no defense. With it, there may be. This statement may sound like a passage from science fiction. But it is the studied opinion of one of the eminent military figures of the world, Field Marshal Viscount Montgomery, deputy commander of Supreme

Headquarters of NATO. He propounded the problem to newsmen at SHAPE, basing his estimate on the development of a 5,000 mile missile by 1961. When - or if - it comes, the present defense concepts based on jet bombers, will have been just a transition state. He said the inter - continental missile will become the main instrument of war.

Lord Montgomery forecast the development of a missile that can fly five thousand miles in fifteen minutes. The only defense against it, he indicated, would be a counter-missile, one that could stop it somewhere on the way. And for this to be possible, there must be a counter - missile of adequate range, and there must be the means to detect the in-coming weapon. And this is where the need of the few minutes comes in. It arises from the fact that the earth's surface is curved. According to Monty, take any place on earth, launch a five thousand mile missile, and you find that the radar detecting device at the potential target cannot pick up the approaching missile until it is at least halfway on its journey. If the missile can complete the journey in fifteen minutes, the defensive action can't begin for seven - and - a- half minutes This obviously is not enough.

Lord Montgomery said that the solution of the problem is to place the detecting device halfway between the launching site and the intended target, that is, 2,5000 miles from each. Then it could pick up the aggressor and launch a counter missile while the original missile had gone only fifteen to twenty percent of the way. The defense would then have about twelve minutes instead of seven - and - a - half.

This talk by Monty, which was reported by the Paris correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor, obviously points to the importance of Europe's NATO who are about halfway between the Soviet launching site and the target across the the Atlantic. The nature of war may be changing along with the role of armies, navies and air forces. But detecting devices in NATO countries could save the four-and-a-half minutes needed to launch a defensive weapon, another reason to keep NATO from breaking up.

Montgomery granted that armies, navies and air forces still would have functions in the new kind of war, but he said there no longer would be justification to keep them as separate services. The cost of intercontinental missiles would be so great, he thought, that no country could afford separate services, with their duplications, overlaps and inefficiency. So he said he favored setting up integration of the services as a definite goal. Otherwise, he added, with a typical Monty phrase: "We might well muck up the whole chance of survival."

Field Marshall Montgomery's comments are not offered as the last word on the subject; in fact they are close to being his first words. It is only a few days since the world first heard that a hydrogen warhead could be used on an inter-continental missile. Nikita Khrushchev spilled the secret in an outburst in a speech in England. Our own experts have since told Congress that a scientific breakthrough had been made and we too can make such a hydrogen warhead. The five thousand mile missile still hasn't been perfected. Much of the nervousness in Washington lately has been due to the fear that the Russians will have it first. If by then we don't have a counter-missile, the nuclear stalemate with the Soviet Union will have ended, and the Russians will have a nuclear superiority.

Lord Montgomery spoke of a counter missile that would bring down the original missile. That of itself sounds like science fiction. But radar development, linked with the new electronic computing machines, worked miracles that would permit just this kind of accuracy, and beyond science fiction dreams of only a short while back. However, Monty might just as well have said - which he didn't - that if one side sends a hydrogen weapon, that it is detected on the way over, that would be an act of war to which the defense almost surely would respond in kind. It not only would try to stop the weapon part way, but it also would want to cripple the aggressor country as much as possible at the very start of the war.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, her is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: The services for Senator Barkley were marked by tribute to the man's integrity. John Morley once observed, "Those who would treat politics and morality apart will never understand the one or the other." and Daniel O'Connell said, more than a hundred years ago, "Nothing is politically right which is morally wrong."

Goodnight and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Thurs., May 3, 1956

This is the news:

The House passed a new farm bill today, and sent it to the Senate. The measure contains the soil bank, but denies President Eisenhower the authority he wanted to make advance payments this year under the soil bank program. The debate was bitter. Democratic representatives denounced the pre-payment feature as an attempt to "buy" votes next fall. Republican congressmen denied politics had anything to do with it. By a margin of four votes, the Democrats rammed through an amendment adding grazing land to the soil bank program. ~~And this year's price supports on the principal feed grains were raised by 16 percent.~~ The entire measure finally was passed, 314 to 78.

The Senate committee investigating charges of graft in the procurement of military uniforms heard the testimony today of Murray Chotiner, a California lawyer who once served as Vice President Nixon's campaign manager. Chotiner has said that... in 1953... he received a fee of 6-thousand dollars from Herman Kravitz, a uniform manufacturer convicted of embezzling government property. Last week, Kravitz refused to answer questions regarding his relationship with Chotiner. Chotiner said today that the relationship was that of attorney and client... and that he never used Mr. Nixon's name on Spoke to Nixon- in dealing with government agencies on behalf of any of his clients. He revealed that one of those clients...sometime between 1953 and 1955... was Marco Reginelli, identified by committee counsel as a Philadelphia racketeer who was also in the uniform manufacturing business. Chotiner said he represented Reginelli in a deportation case and received a one-thousand-dollar fee. Chotiner admitted that... at one time... two White House officials had made telephone calls on behalf of his clients. But these calls, he said, had nothing to do with either Reginelli or Kravitz. He identified the officials as Max Rabb, a White House adviser on minority affairs, and Charles Willis, a former White House adviser on patronage. He said the phone calls were made to determine the status of a case, or to arrange an appointment for him with the government agency concerned.

White House News Secretary Hagerty has issued a statement... saying there was nothing "improper" in the contacts between Chotiner and the two presidential assistants. Hagerty said in both instances, Chotiner was representing airlines seeking favorable rulings from the Civil Aeronautics Board, and that in each instance, the board subsequently ruled against the airlines involved.

The chairman of the investigating committee... Senator McClellan... said late today that he believed the Justice Department had ordered its attorneys to deal "cautiously" with Chotiner. He said he intends to ask the Justice Department for a copy of the order.

The House Appropriations Committee voted today to give the Defense Department 33-billion, 600-million dollars in the next fiscal year. That's half a billion less than President Eisenhower requested... but nearly one and three-quarter billion dollars more than the armed forces had to spend this year. The Air Force gets the largest share---almost 15 and a half billion dollars. The committee said it is concerned with Russia's growing strength in the air.

→

In London, the United Nations disarmament subcommittee voted unanimously today, to break off its deadlocked talks. The delegates from the United States, Britain, Russia, Canada and France will hold a final session tomorrow, then report back to United Nations headquarters, here in New York.

The United Nations secretary general... Dag Hammarskjold... announced today that cease-fire agreements have been reached between Israel and the three Arab states---Jordan, Syria and Lebanon. He said the agreements are unconditional, except for the reservation of each country, to the right of self-defense. Last month, Hammarskjold announced a similar cease-fire between Israel and Egypt. His announcement today said nothing of Israel's demand that the Egyptian blockade of the Suez Canal be lifted. Nor did it mention Syria's demand that Israel must not resume work... unilaterally... on the Jordan River power and irrigation project. Tonight, Hammarskjold was scheduled to hold a final meeting with Egyptian Premier Nasser, and then fly to Rome on his way back to New York. He will make a full report to the Security Council next week.

Reports from Paris say that France and Germany have reached full agreement, that the question of disarmament must be tied in with reunification of Germany./ French leaders had proposed, that the big powers consider disarmament before German reunification./ Secretary of State Dulles conferred with British Foreign Secretary Selwyn Lloyd today, on the eve of the meeting of the NATO council of foreign ministers. They agreed that NATO should assist... but not try to collect or distribute... economic aid to the under-developed countries. #

Edward R. Murrow: May 3, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

The French ideas on how to meet the new Soviet political and economic challenge in the Middle East and Asia have been given to Secretary Dulles in Paris and transmitted to Washington for White House study. They come in a ten-page document, prepared by Foreign Minister Christian Pineau. Monsieur Pineau presented it to Mr. Dulles last night.

My colleague David Schoenbrun learns from a high-level American source that Mr. Dulles was impressed with the French thesis and recommended continuous study of it in Washington. There may be differences over methods but Mr. Dulles concurs with the need for a dramatic transformation of the Western alliance.

Judging from Mr. Schoenbrun's summary of the French proposal, it is lively and hard-hitting. It starts with the assertion that Soviet economic penetration in the Middle East and East Asia, and the goodwill tours to uncommitted and neutral nations, have been far more effective than Western leaders have admitted publicly. We may ridicule "Baldy and Bulgie", the French said, but the sad fact is that we look more ridiculous than they do in the eyes of small nations. For obviously Russia has been changing its policy and tactics, while Western leaders still are singing the old song about the hateful Russians and the need to build military blocs.

While it is true that the West's economic program has been going a long time, and its aid is much greater than anything the Russians have offered, the French said that it is an unfortunate rule of human nature that credit doesn't last very long, and that we will be judged by what we are doing and shall do, rather than what we have done. Further, we have almost always tied our economic aid to military programs, demanding that recipients join pacts such as NATO, SEATO and Bagdad, and have threatened to cut off aid if the recipients traded with Russia or Red China. Neutral nations, the French argued, don't want aid with strings attached. Burma already has refused American aid for that reason. Thailand last week accepted $28,000,000 of economic aid from China in defiance of the terms of the American aid program. Neutral countries insist more and more on the right to remain neutral, and to trade with both East and West. We must ~~XXXXXX~~ respect this neutralist position, the French insisted, and respect it politically as well as economically. The small uncommitted nations as well as the big ones, as for example India, want to be treated as equals. The very phrase "backward nations" offends many of them, and we must respect their sensitiveness. They may be young and under-developed, but they are not backward. We must watch our language, the French warned, and learn to think and feel with these nations. For their pride, they point out, may be more dangerous than their hunger.

The nub of the French argument is that needed economic aid must, however, not be funnelled through NATO, since that must always be a military alliance, at least in part. Any aid from NATO, the French argued, inevitably would appear to be a recruiting job for mercenaries. Economic aid, said Monsieur Pinaud, must feed people's hunger and not the cold war. We must stop trying to buy allies, which not only is immoral, but doesn't work. Indeed, the NATO members joined for their own defense, not merely because America gave dollars.

The French called it tragic that the communists have been able to exploit the charge that Europeans have become American mercenaries. They attribute it to Congressional debates, and the Administration's constant need to "sell" the aid program on the ground that the United States was acquiring allies. The new program they proposed should be global in nature, they said, and without strings attached. They suggested that it operate through the United Nations, but did not insist dogmatically on that point. A new agency may have to be created, they admitted.

The French said they are not cooling off on NATO. They recognize its achievements. But the fact that the Soviet Union has changed the locale and nature of the cold war makes it necessary for NATO to evolve with the times. There should be closer and regular consultation between NATO members, and closer co-ordination of political and economic policies.

"You can't be partner in an alliance one day, they said, and stick knives into his back another day in another place. [Obviously they were thinking of troubles they have had in North Africa and the British have had in Cyprus, and of the Anglo-American creation of the Bagdad pact behind their backs, and contrary to ~~their~~ French advice.]

Mr. Schoenbrun has been given to understand that Mr. Dulles is ready to enter into global economic planning arrangements with our allies, either through NATO or some new agency. He concludes that NATO has reached its most important turning point since its creation, and while big decisions are not to be expected in the present two-day session, the meeting could be the "conception conference" that will re-kindle the waning hope and faith of free peoples in the merits of alliance.

Ted Pearson

Word for Today

The House has passed a new farm bill... but not without much argument. Plutarch said, "It is a thing of no great difficulty to raise objection against another man's oration, but to produce a better in its place is extremely troublesome." Charles Dudley Warner was prophetic when he said, "Blessed be agriculture, if one does not have too much of it."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

THURSDAY, MAY 3, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

The House passed a new farm bill today and sent it to the Senate. The measure contains the soil bank, but denies President Eisenhower the authority he wanted to make advance payments this year under the soil bank program. The debate was bitter. Democratic representatives denounced the pre-payment features as an attempt to "buy" votes next fall. Republican congressmen denied politics had anything to do with it. By a margin of four votes, the Democrats rammed through an amendment adding grazing land to the soil bank program. The entire measure finally was passed, 314 to 78.

The Senate committee investigating charges of graft in the procurement of military uniforms heard the testimony today of Murray Chotiner, a California lawyer who once served as Vice President Nixon's campaign manager. Chotiner has said that..in 1953..he received a fee of 65 thousand dollars from Herman Kravitz, a uniforn manufacturer convicted of embezzling government property. Last week, Kravitz refused to answer questions regarding his relationship with Chotiner. Chotiner said today that the relationship was that of attorney and client..and that he never used Mr. Nixon's name or spoke to Nixon in dealing with government agencies on behalf of any of his clients. He revealed that one of those clients..sometime between 1953 and 1954..was Marco Reginelli, identified by committee counsel as a Philadelphia racketeer who was also in the uniform manufacturing business. Chotiner said he represented Reginelli in a deportation case and received a one thousand dollar fee. Chotiner admitted that ..at one time..two White House officials had made telephone calls on behalf of his clients. But these calls, he said, had nothing to do with either Reginelli or Kravitz. He identified the officials as Max

Rapb, a White House adviser on minority afairs, and Charles Willis, a former White House adviser on patronage. He said the phone calls were made to determine the status of a case, or to arrange an appointment for him with the government agency concerned.

White House News Secretary Hagerty has issued a statement..saying there was nothing "improper" in the contacts between Chotiner and the two presidential assistints. Hagerty said in both instances Chotiner was representing airlines seeking favorable rulings from the Civil Arronautics Board, and that in each instance, the board subsequently ruled against the airlines involved.

The chairman of the investigating committee Senator McClellan said late today that he believed the Justice Department had ordered its attorneys to deal "cautiously" with Chotiner. He said he intends to ask the Justice Department for a copy of the order.

The House Appropriations Committee voted today to give the Defense Department 33-billion, 600 - million doolars in the next fiscal year. That's half a billion less than President Eisenhower requested..but nearly one and three-quarter billion dollars more than the armed forces had to spend this year. The Air Force gets the largest share..almost 15 and a half billion dollars. The committee said it is concerned with Russia's growing strength in the air.

In London, The United Nations disarmament subcommittee voted unani ously today to break off its deadlocked talks. The delegates from the United States, Britain, Russia, Canada and France will hold a final session tomorrow, then report back to United Nations headquarters here in New York.

The United Nations secretary general..Dag Hammarskjold..announced today that cease-fire agreements have been reached between Israel and the three Arab states -- Jordan, Syria and Lebanon. He said the agreements are unconditional, except for the reservation of each country to the right of self-defense. Last month, Hammarskjold announced a similar cease-fire between Israel and Egypt. His announcement today said nothing of Israel's demand that the Egyptian blockade of the Suez Canal be lifted. Nor did it mention Syria's demand that Israel must not resume work..unilaterally..on the Jordan River power and irrigation project. Tonight, Hammarskjold was scheduled to hold a final meeting with Egyptian Premier Nasser and then fly to Rome on his way back to New York. He will make a full report to the Security Council next week.

Reports from Paris say that France and Germany have reached full agreement that the question of disarmement must be tied in with reunification of Germany. French leaders had proposed that the big powers consider disarmament before German reunification. Secretary of State Dulles conferred with British Foreign Secretary Selwyn Lloyd today on the eve of the meeting of the NATO council of foreign ministers. They agreed that NATO should assist ..but not try to collect or distribute ..economic aid to the under-developed countries.

The French ideas on how to meet the new Soviet political and economic challenge in the Middle East and Asia have been given to Secretary Dulles in Paris and transmitted to Washington for White House study. They come in a ten-page document, prepared by Foreign Minister Christian Pineau. Monsieur Pineau presented it to Mr. Dulles last night.

My colleague David Schoenburn learns from a high-level American source that Mr. Dulles was impressed with the French thesis and recommended continuous study of it in Washington. There may be differenced over methods but Mr. Dulles concurs with the need for a dramatic transformation of the Western alliance.

Judging from Mr. Schoenbrun's summary of the French proposal, it is lively and hard-hitting. It starts with the assertion that Soviet economic penetration in the Middle East and East Asia, and the goodwill tours to uncommitted and neautral nations, have been far more effective than Western leaders have admitted publicly. We may ridicule "Baldy" and Bulgic", the French said, but the sad fact is that we look more ridiculous that they do in they eyes of small nations. For obviously Russia has been changing its policy and tactics, while Western leaders still are singing the old song about the hateful Russians and the need to build military blocs.

While it is true that the West's economic program has been going a long time, and its said is much greater than anything the Russians have offered, the French said that it is an unfortunate rule of human nature that credit doesn't last very long, that we will be judged by what we are doing and shall do, rather than what we have done. Further, we have almost always tied our economic aid to military programs, demanding that recipient join pacts such as NATO, SEATO and Baghdad, and have threatened to cut off aid if the recipients trated with Russia or Red China. Neautral nations, the French argued, don't want aid with strings attached. Burma already has refused American aid for that reason. Thailand last week accepted $28,000,000 of economic aid from China in defiance of the terms of the American aid program. Neautral countriss insist more and more on the right to remain neautral, and to trade with both East and West. We must respect this neautralist position, the French insisted, and respect it politically a well as economically, The small uncommitted nations as well as the big ones, as for example India, want to be treated as equals. The very phrase "backward nations" offends many of them, and we must respect their sensitiveness. They may be young and under-developed, but they are not backward. We must watch out language, the French warned, and learn think and feel with these nations. For their pride, they point out may be more dangerous than their hunger.

The nub of the French argument is that needed economic aid must, however, not be funnelled through NATO, since that must always be a military alliance, at least in part. Any aid from NATO, the French argued, inevitably would appear to be a recruiting job for mercenaries. Economic aid, said Monsieur Pineaud, must feed people's hunger and not the cold war. We must stop trying to buy allies, which not only is immoral, but doesn't work. Indeed, the NATO members joined for their own defense, not merely because America gave dollars.

The French called it tragic that the communists have been able to exploit the charge that Europeans have become American mercenaries. They attribute it to Congressional debates, and the Administration's constant need to "sell" the aid program on the ground that the United States was acquiring allies. The new program they proposed should be global in nature, they said, and without strings attached. They suggested that it operate through the United Nations, but did not insist dogmatically on that point. A new agency may have to be created, they admitted.

The French said they are not cooling off on NATO. They recognize its achievements. But the fact that the Soviet Union has changed the locale and nature of the cold war makes it necessary for NATO to evolve with the times. There should be closer and regular consultations between NATO members, and closer coordination of political and economic policies.

"You can't be partner in an alliance one day, they said, and stick knives into his back another day in another place". Obviously they were thinking of troubles they have had in North Africa and the British have had in Cyprus, and of the Anglo-American creation of the Baghdad pact behind their backs, and contraty to French advice.

Mr. Schoenbrun has been given to understand that Mr. Dulles is ready to enter into global economic planning arrangements with our allies, either through NATO or some new agency. He concludes that NATO has reached its most important turning point since its creation, and while big decisions are not to be expected in the present two-day session, the meeting could be the "conception conference" that will re-kindle the waning hope and faith of free peoples in the merits of alliance.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Ted Pearson.

PEARSON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: The House has passed a new farm bill..but not without much argument. Plutarch said, "It is a thing of no great difficulty to raise objection against another man's oration, but to produce a better in its place is extremely troublesome." Charles Dudley Warner was prophetic when he said, "Blessed be agriculture, if one does not have too much of it."

Good Night and Good Luck."

Edward R. Murrow Fri., May 4, 1956

This is the news:

President Eisenhower said today that the United States is stronger... militarily... than most people think. He told his weekly news conference the public will feel better when it has the "full picture". Mr. Eisenhower was referring to testimony, before a Senate committee, that Russia is surpassing the United States in the production of intercontinental jet bombers. For one thing, the President said, we have the most powerful navy in the world. He said, "There is no navy that even approaches it in power. And it features one thing---air power." He also pointed out that the United States has bases around the world, established for "the particular purpose of using the medium bomber."

Disarmament talks in London ended today in disagreement. But the western delegations... made up of the United States, Britain, Canada and France... issued a statement reaffirming their "determination to seek agreement on a developing program of disarmament, in accordance with their mandate from the United Nations." They said,

"A settlement is still possible and necessary." President Eisenhower said at his news conference that the whole Western world is disappointed by Russia's unwillingness to accept adequate inspection measures. He said there must be inspection. "If we don't know anything more about what's inside the Iron Curtain than we do today," he said, "then we are not going to reduce anything. That's all there is to it."

A reporter asked the President about the testimony of Murray Chotiner, who said yesterday that two White House aides had made telephone calls for him in connection with his law practice. Chotiner was Vice President Nixon's campaign manager in 1952. He testified yesterday that he had never "traded" on his association with Mr. Nixon, on behalf of his clients. Mr. Eisenhower said today he has no reason to believe that Chotiner's contact with the White House officials violated his rule against members of the White House staff submitting to influence. In no case, the President said, did any connection Chotiner had with the White House "benefit him one bit."

Regarding his health, President Eisenhower said his doctors have told him he can continue his present schedule of work indefinitely.

The foreign ministers of the fifteen NATO countries, opened their two-day meeting in Paris. The delegates agreed that greater emphasis be placed on political and economic cooperation. And France proposed that a new agency be created for global economic development, to operate under the United Nations. Secretary of State Dulles suggested that a committee of two or three NATO foreign ministers be set up... to work out practical ways for strengthening the alliance, in the economic and political fields. He suggested this committee report back to the full council of foreign ministers in the fall.

The French resident minister for Algeria... General Lacoste... flew back to Algiers today, from Paris, with a promise that substantial reinforcements will soon be on the way. // French troops are reported to have killed another 34 Algerian rebels, in the last 24 hours. / French casualties, if any, are unreported.

In Morocco, a curfew has been imposed on the Arab quarter of Marrakesh... after two days of rioting, in which 42 persons died.

Israel reported two border incidents today. / It said an Israeli patrol encountered Jordanian infiltrators last night in the Gilboa Hills... and that one "intruder" was killed. To the south... near the Gaza strip... Egyptian infiltrators crossed the armistice line, and took crops belonging to the Israeli settlement of Nahal Ozz. At Nahal Ozz, there was no military action.

Lebanon criticized Syria today, for agreeing to a cease-fire with Israel, without extracting an Israeli promise not to divert the waters of the Jordan River. / Dispatches say it took a "grim" hour of discussion, between the Syrian and Lebanese premiers in Beirut, to make the Lebanese government feel that it had not been betrayed.

Moscow announced today that special laws used to get convictions in the purge trials of 1936-38 have been revoked. The action was taken by the presidium of the Supreme Soviet on April 19th, about the same time the Russian press was denouncing "trial by confession" as practised under Stalin. The announcement said that, henceforth, prosecution will be "guided by standards established by the criminal and judicial codes."

An atomic device was exploded today at Eniwetok, in the South Pacific. It was the first of a series of nuclear tests, to be culminated by an air drop of a hydrogen bomb. The device set off today was in the "small" category... equivalent, perhaps, to 20- thousand tons of T.N.T. It may have been an atomic warhead.

The Army issued a draft call today for 13-thousand men in July. That's a thousand more than the draft quota announced for June.

The Civil Aeronautics Administration announced today that it will deny federal funds for construction of segregated airport facilities. The order also applies to the remodeling and repair of existing facilities, from which persons would be barred for reasons of race, creed, or color.

Secretary of Agriculture Benson said today that the new farm bill passed by the House is better than the first measure vetoed by the President... but that two provisions should be eliminated when the bill comes up for Senate action. Benson said he was referring to the mandatory increase in price supports for grain and the addition of grazing lands to the acreage eligible for the soil bank. Mr. Eisenhower told his news conference today there are some parts of the bill he doesn't like, but that he is withholding final judgment.

Here in New York tonight, doctors announced that labor columnist Victor Riesel... who had acid thrown in his face by an unknown assailant a month ago... has lost the sight of both eyes. The attack occurred on the street, after Riesel had made a broadcast dealing with labor racketeers. The syndicate which handles Riesel's column said tonight, "The gangs can blind one newspaperman, but they cannot blind a nation's entire press."

Today... in Bonn, Germany... my colleague Richard Hottelet got an exclusive interview with West German Chancellor Konrad Adenauer. Much of the interview concerned the future role of NATO... where do we go from here? Here... by recording... Hottelet puts his first question.

(tape runs 4:08, ends on (cue: "Now back to Ed Murrow
(in New York."

That was the report by Dick Hottelet, on his exclusive interview today with the West German chancellor, Konrad Adenauer.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. (pause) But first, here is Bob Dixon.

Word for Today

Will Rogers covered a disarmament conference in London in 1930, only he called it "a disagreement conference... nothing but a Democratic convention with a silk hat on." He quoted Henry L. Stimson as saying, "You go back home, Will, and announce that one of America's muchly advertised talents has been overestimated. We are not the masters of bunk."

Goodnight and good luck!

CBS RADIO DIVISION

E. R. MURROW

Friday, May 4, 1956
7:45 - 8:00 P.M.

MURROW: ... Today in Bonn, Germany, my colleague, Richard Hottelet, got an exclusive interview with West German Chancellor Konrad Adenauer. Much of the interview concerned the future role of NATO: Where do we go from here? Here by recording - Hottelet puts his first question.

HOTTELET: We asked the Chancellor how he would define the problems presently confronting NATO. He replied NATO was founded at a time when there was immediate danger of hot war. This danger has now receded. The Soviets are now employing different tactics and NATO must adapt itself to these tactics. The Chancellor believes that NATO's most urgent need is the coordinatedviews on important questions of foreign policy effecting the Soviet Union. Lack of coordination, he said, has weakened the West even though Russia has not grown stronger. And the Chancellor urged specific action in the political field and in the field of information. No new agencies would be required. He proposed that the various delegations to NATO and the NATO ambassadors be made stronger, that they be given the instructions and directives which are now, as he put it, sadly lacking. As for information, the Chancellor said "I believe that NATO must make known what it is and what it does. The Soviets are much talked about. They travel around. But the really good efforts of the West are discussed much too little and NATO has too little to say for itself. It's also my impression," the Chancellor went on "that the necessary military aspect of NATO is still rather too prominent. The erroneous belief is widespread that NATO and SHAPE, its military headquarters in Europe, are identical and that NATO has only military functions. Let me sum up: The military aspect of NATO remains, but the non-military aspect which must be alterable and flexible, must take its placebeside the military aspect with the same vigor. Foreign policy must be coordinated as far as possible. The world must know that a NATO exists, that it has power, and it must know what NATO does." We asked the Chancellor if the anti-Stalin campaign behind the Iron Curtain gives the West an opening for political action. Dr. Adenauer's reply was very definite. "No," he said, "I see no such opening. The Soviet Union's goal remains unaltered world domination." He attached no great importance to the campaign against Stalinism. On the contrary, he pointed out with a smile that Lenin and Stalin had in their time both attacked the so-called personality cult. He went on "If one condemned Stalin and on the other hand calmly permits Stalin's deeds to continue, it is quite clear that nothing has changed in the Soviet's inner motives. Therefore," he declared, "I think it absolutely essential to be vigilant, to remain vigilant and to be so strong that one will not be attacked. But, in addition, let me emphasiz there must be new tactics of the peoples united in the Atlantic pact to meet the new tactics of the Soviets."

We asked the Chancellor if as part of these new tactics there should be direct talks between Moscow and Bonn on German reunification. He faced me squarely and said, slowly, "One should never forget that there are four responsible powers in the question of reunification. Individual talks have no point. They only arouse suspicion. Naturally, we must enlighten the Russians about our point of view. But the Four Powers must carry out their obligation of bringing about German reunification in peace and freedom."

Various German quarters have recentlydemanded direct action between Bonn and Moscow, and we asked the Chancellor whether these demands had any political significance. He replied "I attach no importance to these demands. They are made only by individuals. The Soviet leaders' negotiations in London have shown with absolute clarity that Soviet Russia simply does not want German reunification, at least not at the present time. Itdoes not want reunification in peace and freedom."

The interview brought out one other important fact. At the age of 80, on the eve of Germany's first anniversary as a sovereign nation, after a tough and active year, the Chancellor is vigorous in body and mind. These are the views which will for some time dominate German foreign policy.

Now back to Ed Murrow in New York.

MURROW: That was a report by Dick Hottelet, on his exclusive interview today with West German Chancellor Konrad Adenauer. This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the word for today. Now, here is Bob Dixon.

ANNOUNCER: (C O M M E R C I A L) ...

(30)

Ed. trans. P. O.

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

FRIDAY, MAY 4, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

President Eisenhower said today that the United States is stronger..militarily..than most people think. He told his weekly news conference the public will feel better when it has the "full picture." Mr. Eisenhower was referring to testimony, before a Senate committee, that Russia is surpassing the United States in the production of intercontinental jet bombers. For one thing, the President said, we have the most powerful navy in the world. He said, "There is no navy that even approaches it in power. And it features one thing-- air power." He also pointed out that the United States has bases around the world, established for "the particular purpose of using the medium bomber."

Disarmament talks in London ended today in disagreement. But the Western delegations..made up of the United States, Britain, Canada and France..issued a statement reaffirming their determination "to seek agreement on a developing program of disarmement, in accordance with their mandate from the United Nations." They said, "A settlement is still possible and necessary." President Eisenhower said at his news conference that the whole Western world is disappointed by Russia's unwillingness to accept adequate inspection measures.

He said there must be inspection. "If we don't know anything more about what's inside the Iron Curtain than we do today," he said, "then we are not going to reduce anything. That's all there is to it."

A reporter asked the President about the testimony of Murray Chotiner, who said yesterday that two White House aides had made telephone calls for him in connection with his law practice. Chotiner was Vice President Nixon's campaign manager in 1952. He testified yesterday that he had never "traded on his association with Mr. Nixon, on behalf of his clients. Mr. Eisenhower said today he has no reason to believe that Chotiner's contact with the White House officials violated his rule against members of the White House staff submitting to influence. In no case, the President said, did any connection Chotiner had with the White House "benefit him one bit."

Regarding his health, President Eisenhower said his doctors have told him he can continue his present schedule of work indefinitely.

The foreign ministers of the fifteen NATO countries opened their two-day meeting in Paris. The delegates agreed that greater emphasis be placed on political and economic cooperation. And France proposed that a ne agency be created for global economic development, to operate under the United Nations. Secretary of State Dulles suggested that a committee of two or three NATO foreign ministers be set up to work out practical ways for strengthening the alliance in the economic and political fields. He suggested this committee report back to the full council of foreign ministers in the fall.

The French resident minister for Algeria..General Lacoste..flew back to Algiers today from Paris with a promise that substantial reinforcements will soon be on the way.

French troops are reported to have killed another 234 Algerian rebels in the last 24 hours. French casualties, if any, are unreported.

In Morocco., a curfew was been imposed on the Arab quarter of Marrakesh.. after two days of rioting in which 42 persons died.

Israel reported two border incidents today. It said an Israeli patrol encountered Jordanian infilatators last night in the Gilboa Hills..and that one "intruder" was killed. To the south..near the Gaza strip..Egyptian infiltrators crossed the armistice line and took crops belonging to the Israeli settlement of Nahal Ozz. At Nahal Ozz, there was no military action.

Moscow announced today that special laws used to get convictions in the purge trials of 1936-38 have been revoked. The action was taken by the presedium of the Supreme Soviet on April 19th, about the same time the Russian press was denouncing "trial by confession" as practiced under Stalin. The announcement said that, henceforth, prosecution will be "guided by standards established by the criminal and judicial codes."

As atomic device was exploded today at Eniwetok, in the South Pacific. It was the first of a series of nuclear tests, to be cumminated by an air drop of a hydrogen bomb. The device set off today was in the "small" category... equivalent, perhaps, to 20 thousand tons of T.N.T. It may have been an atomic warhead.

The Army issued a draft call today for 13-thousand men in July. That's a thousand more than the draft quota announced for June.

The civil Aeronautics Administration announced today that it will deny federal funds for construction of segregated airport facilities. The order also applies to the remodeling and repair of existing facilities, from which persons would be barred for reasons of race, creed, or color.

Secretary of Agriculture Benson said today that the new farm bill passed by the House is better than the first measure vetoed by the President..but that two provisions should be eliminated when the bill comes up for Senate action. Benson said he was referring to the mandatory increase in price supports for grain and the addition of grazing lands to the acreage eligible for the soil bank. Mr. Eisenhower told his news conference today there are some parts of the bill he doesn't like, but that he is withholding final judgement.

Here in New York tonight, doctors announced that labor columnist Victor Riesel..who had acid thrown in his face by an unknown assailant a month ago.. has lost the sight of both eyes. The attack occurred on the streed, after Riesel had made a broadcast dealing with labor racketeers. The syndicate which handles Riesel's column said tonight, "The gangs can blind one newspaperman, but they cannot blind a nation's entire press."

Today..in Bonn, Germany..my colleague Richard Hottelet got an exclusive interview with West German Chancellor Konrad Adenauer. Much of the interview concerned the future role of NATO..where do we go from here? Her....by re - cording..Hottelet puts his first question.

HOTTELET: We asked the Chancellor how he would define the problems presently confronting NATO. He replied NATO was founded at a time when there was immediate danger of hot war. This danger has now receded. The Soviets are now employing different tactics and NATO must adapt itself to these tactics. The Chancellor believes that NATO's most urgent need is the coordinated views on important questions of foreign policy effecting the Soviet Union. Lack of coordination he said, has weakened the West even though Russia has not grown stronger. And the Chancellor urged specific action in the political field and in the field of information. No new agencies would be required. He proposed that the various delegations to NATO and the NATO ambassadors be made stronger, that they be given the instructions and directives which are now, as he put it, sadly lacking. As for information, the Chancellor said " I believe that NATO must make known what it is and what it does. The Soviets are much talked about. They travel around. But the really good efforts of the West are discussed much too little and NATO has too little to say for itslef. It's also my impression, " the Chancellor went on "that the necessary military aspect of NATO is still rather too prominent. The erroneous belief is widespread that NATO and SHAPE, its military headquarters in Europe, are identical and that NATO has only military functions. Let me sum up: The military aspect of NATO remains, but the non-military aspect which must be alterable and flexible, must take its place beside the military aspect with the same vigor. Foreign policy must be coordinated as far as possible. The world must know that a NATO exists, that it has power, and it must know what NATO does." We asked the Chancellor if the anti-Stalin campaign behind the Iron Curtain gives the west an opening for political action. Dr. Adenauer's reply was very definite. "No", he said, "I see no such opening. The Soviet Union's goal remains ulaltered world domination." He attached no great importance to the campaing against Stalinism. On the contrary, he pointed out with a smile that Lenin and Stalin had in their time both attacked the so-called personality cult. He went on "If one condemned Stalin and on the other hand calmly permits Stalin's deeds to continue, it is quite clear that nothing has changed in the Soviet's inner motives. Therefore," he declared, "I think it is absolutely essential to be vigilant, to remain vigilant and to be so strong that one will not be attacked. But, in addition, let me empahaize there must be new tactics of the peoples united in the Atlantic pact to meet the new tactics of the Soviets.

We asked the Chancellor if as part of these new tactics there should be direct talks between Moscow and Bonn on German reunification. He faced me squarely and said, slowly, "One should never forget that there are four responsible powers in the question of reunification. Individual talks have no point. They only arouse suspicion. Naturally, we must carry out their obligation of bringing about our point ov view. But the Four Powers must carry out their obligation of bringing about German reunification in peace and freedom."

Various German quarters have recently demanded direct action between Bonn and Moscow, and we asked the Chancellor whether these demands had any political significance. He replied "I attach no importance to these demands. They are made only by individuals. The Soviet leaders' negotiations in London have shown with absolute clarity that Soviet Russia simply does not want German reunification at least not at the present time. It does not want reunification in peace and freedom."

The interview brought out one other important fact. At the age of 80, on the eve of Germany's first anniversary as a sovereign nation, after a tough and active year, the Chancellor is vigorous in body and mind. These are the views which will for some time dominate German foreign policy.

Now back to Ed Murrow in New York.

MURROW: That was a report by Dick Hottelet, on his exclusive interview today with West German Chancellor Konrad Adenauer. This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for today. Now, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: Will Rogers covered a disarmament conference in London in 1930, only he called it "a disagreement conference..nothing but a Democratic convention with a silk hat on." He quoted Henry L. Stimsonas saying, "You go back home Will, and announce that one of America's muchly advertised talents had been overestimated. We are not the masters of bunk."

Goodnight and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Mon., May 7, 1956

This is the news:

President Eisenhower told Congress today that the United States plans to supply its partners of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization with new weapons. He indicated ~~that~~ these weapons might include guided missiles and 280-millimeter guns "with an atomic capability". He said, "Many European countries are now able to finance a greater share of the cost of maintaining their existing forces. A greater proportion of United States assistance can therefore be used in helping them acquire the new weapons necessary for strengthening the common defense effort." ~~Immediately~~ He said... in his semi-annual report on the mutual security program... that in six years the United States has shipped other countries nearly 12 and a half billion dollars' worth of military goods. Mr. Eisenhower again urged Congress to give him authority for long-term economic aid. Such authority is needed, he said, to counter the "sharply increased activity by the Soviet Union in barter trade, and in economic and military assistance to nations outside the Communist bloc."

The director of the International Cooperation Administration... John Hollister... testified on the aid program today before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Hollister said the new program... calling for expenditure of nearly 5-billion dollars... is needed to keep up the free world defenses. He explained that authority for long-range economic aid is essential in order to provide "flexibility" in administering the program. "And the power requested," he said, "does not amount to binding contract authority." Actual appropriations could still be made on a year-to-year basis. Hollister said most of the 5-billion dollars would still go for military assistance. He said, "Although today Soviet tactics are placing greater emphasis on economic overtures to the less developed nations, defense efforts cannot be relaxed in any degree." In Korea and around Formosa, he said, there is always danger of Communist attack.

→

Secretary of State Dulles returned to Washington today from the Paris meeting of NATO foreign ministers. Dulles called the meeting "a turning point" for the Atlantic alliance. "It was recognized," he said, that the unity of the Atlantic community must be further developed, if it is to surmount the shifting tactics of international Communism... and if it is to serve the needs of this and coming generations."

The White House today announced the appointment of Vice Admiral Robert Briscoe to succeed Admiral William Fechteler as commander-in-chief of Allied forces in Southern Europe. Briscoe has been serving as deputy chief of naval operations in Washington. Fechteler is due for retirement.

The Senate Agriculture Committee voted today to take up the House-approved farm bill on Wednesday. Democratic Senator Humphrey said he will offer some amendments. One of them would give the secretary of agriculture authority to make direct payments, to make up the difference between a support price and ~~[illegible]~~ 90 percent of parity. Republican Senator Young said he will try to have parity prices frozen at their present levels for two years.

The Supreme Court ruled today that... in some instances... an employer claiming inability to pay higher wages must open his books to union inspection. The decision was split, 6 to 3. It upheld an order by the National Labor Relations Board requiring the Truitt Manufacturing Company of Greensboro, North Carolina, to let a union auditor examine its books. The majority opinion emphasized that the court was not laying down a rule for all collective bargaining cases. It said, "The inquiry must always be whether under the circumstances of the particular case the statutory obligation to bargain in good faith has been met." The minority opinion was that the case in question should have been remanded for further study.

In another action, the Supreme Court denied Louisiana State University a review of a lower court ruling, requiring it to admit a Negro as an undergraduate. Negroes already are enrolled in the university's graduate schools.

Here in New York, Secretary General Hammarskjold began a round of private talks today with United Nations representatives. He also continued work on a report on his recent ~~peace~~ mission to the Middle East. (I ~~should like to discuss the Hammarskjold mission further, in a few minutes).~~

In London today, Great Britain and Russia wound up the first phase of their talks, aimed at preserving peace in Indo-China. A Foreign Office spokesman said "some progress" had been made. The armistice ending the Indo-China War called for elections throughout Vietnam, to determine the future of the country. The Communist government of North Vietnam is insisting that the election be held, since the Reds have an idea they will gain by it. The government of South Vietnam opposed the election, on grounds it was not a party to the armistice agreement.

Western Algeria was struck today by a new wave of violence. Nationalist guerrillas attacked more than 40 farms. / Twenty-five persons on the farms are reported killed. Many of the farm buildings were burned. Twenty of the dead are identified as Europeans.

Marshal Tito of Yugoslavia arrived in Paris today for a six-day state visit. Tonight... at a dinner party... Tito called on the East and West "to seek out new paths", in order to spare the world the catastrophe of nuclear war. Mankind, he said, must not permit "a group of individuals to play with the fate of the world." / Tito did not identify the "group of individuals".

The Pulitzer Prizes were announced today. The prize for the best novel went to "Andersonville", by Mackinlay Kantor. The winning drama was "The Diary of Anne Frank". The national reporting award went to Charles L. Bartlett, Washington correspondent of the Chattanooga Times, "for the original disclosures that led to the resignation of Harold Talbott as secretary of the Air Force." The prize for international reporting was shared by William Randolph Hearst, Jr., Kingsbury Smith and Frank Conniff, for a series of exclusive interviews with Soviet leaders.

I have asked my colleague, David Schoenbrun, to give us a report on the results of [redacted] last week's NATO meeting. We switch by recording now [redacted] to Paris and David Schoenbrun.

runs 5:08

returns on cue: "--to Ed Murrow in NY."

That was my colleague David Schoenbrun, giving us a [redacted] [redacted] report on the [redacted] results of last week's NATO meeting.

Word for Today

We are encompassed with grave problems. The enemy has resorted to new tactics, to which we must adapt. Joseph Conrad said, "The sight of human affairs deserves admiration and pity. And he is not insensible who pays them the undemonstrative tribute of a sigh which is not a sob, and of a smile which is not a grin."

Goodnight and good luck!

CBS RADIO DIVISION

EDWARD R. MURROW

Monday, May 7, 1956
7:45 - 8:00 P.M.

MURROW: ... I have asked my colleague David Schoenbrun to give us a report on the results of last week's NATO meeting. We switch by recording now to Paris and David Schoenbrun.

SCHOENBRUN: "Much has been said, little has been done." In that short, sharp phrase, the French paper L' Monde tonight expresses the consensus in this key country of the Atlantic alliance that the alliance itself is dying on the vine. Unless there be any doubt of its opinion, the paper's front-page editorial adds with somber, obituary-like finality: "If the Atlantic alliance ever really existed, it is now no more than a word." This is a harsh judgment. The fact that it is made without even a word of regret is in itself even harsher. Is it, however, a true judgment? Is NATO, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, now no more than just a set of initials? Were the billions of dollars poured into Europe, poured after all, into a sewer? Are the soldiers, airmen and sailors of the Western defense forces only toys? If so, if NATO is only a word, if the Foreign Ministers of fifteen nations - totalling some 500,000,000 peoples, controlling more than 60% of theworld's trade - if all of this is now an empty illusion, then can freedom survive in the world? Can this thing called Western civilisation survive? These are grave questions. No responsible man would put them lightly. Yet they have been put, repeatedly, insistently, here in Paris these past four days as the fifteen Foreign Ministers of NATO met for what was billed, in advance, as one of the most important, if not "the" most important, conference of the alliance since its inception seven years ago.

These questions were asked by such men as Paul Henri Spaak, of Belgium, a small nation but a big man. They've been asked by one of the most dynamic foreign ministers of the West, Lester Pearson of Canada, and they've been asked, too, by our own Secretary of State - John Foster Dulles. It's a dangerous question for Mr. Dulles to ask in an election year,when a debate is underway about the Administration's success, or failure, in foreign policy. Yet, Mr. Dulles did raise these grave questions here in Paris and with considerable courage, knowing, I'm sure, from talks I've had with him, that he himself might be blamed for the weaknesses, for the shortcomings of the Western alliance.

This NATO Conference, which ended here in Paris yesterday, did not come up with any answers to these questions. But it was, I would suggest, a most important and a useful conference - nonetheless - if only because for the first time in years it did have the courage to put these questions frankly and bluntly, to recognize officially what many observers have been saying for a long time, that the alliance of the Western world has lost momentum. Is in need of new inspiration. Does need to undergo the agonizing reappraisal - to use a Dulles phrase in a different context.- For what Mr. Dulles himself has now learned is that the reappraisal is no longer an American threat to pull out of the alliance but an American and an Allied need, in common, to take a new look at our alliance. We're all in this together and we may all sink together if the dangerous trend of the past year is not halted. What has happened isthat the world has changed; changed greatly since the inception of NATO in 1949. NATO was conceived in fear and in hope, seven years ago; in fear of a Soviet aggression in Europe; in hope that a united defense front might not only discourage that aggression but might also lead to a greater community of the Atlantic peoples. In short, that NATO might be "for" something as well as "against" something. The positive aim being the promotion of freedom and greater prosperity for the member peoples. Neither the hopes nor the fears have materialized. Soviet aggression was discouraged thanks to NATO. But the Soviet potential for aggression is greater than ever. If we put our guard down now it may be an invitation to them to start punching again. As for the hopes of NATO, they fell miserably to reach fruition. Any objective man must agree with the stimate that NATO is not a community of the Atlantitoday. It is only a word. The partners quarrel among themselves: Greece, Britain and Turkey over Cyprus; America and France and Britain failed to reach a common policy on the Middle East or on North Africa. What to do about it? No one really knows. But at least - and I believe that this is an achievement - all have agreed that something must be done. That's why they appointed this so-called "wise men's committee of three" to report back in the Fall with a new plan. If you know that you are sick, then, perhaps, you're half way on the road to recovery.

This is David Schoenbrun reporting from Paris. Now, back to Edward R. Murrow in New York.

MURROW: That was my colleague, David Schoenbrun, giving us a report on the result of last week's NATO meeting.

(30)

Ed. trans. P. O.

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

MONDAY, MAY 7, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

President Eisenhower told Congress today that the United States plans to supply its partners of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization with new weapons. He indicated these weapons might include guided missiles and 280-millimeter guns "with an atomic capability". He said, "Many European countries are now able to finance a greater share of the cost of maintaining their existing forces. A greater proportion of United States assistance can therefore be used in helping them acquire the new weapons necessary for strengthening the common defense effort." He said..in his semi-annual report on the mutual security program..that in six years, the United States has shipped other countries nearly 12 and a half billion dollars' worth of military goods. Mr. Eisenhower again urged Congress to give him authority for long term economic aid. Such authority is needed, he said, to counter the "sharply increased activity by the Soviet Union in barter trade and in economic and military assistance to nations outside the Communist bloc."

The director of the International Cooperation Administration..John Hollister ..testified on the aid program today before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Hollister said the new program..calling for expenditure of nearly 5-billion dollars..is needed to keep up the free world defenses. He explained that authority for long-range economic aid is essential in order to provide "flexibility" in administering the program. "And the power requested", he said, "does not amount to binding contract authority". Actual appropriations could still be made on a year-to year basis. Hollister said most of the 5-billion dollars would still go for military assistance. He said, "Although today Soviet tactics are placing greater empahais on economic overtures to the less developed nations, defense efforts cannot be relaxed in any degree." In Korea and around Formosa, he said, there is always danger of Communist attack.

Secretary of State Dulles returned to washington today from the Paris meeting of NATO foreign ministers. Dulles called the meeting "a turning point" for the Atlantic alliance. "It was recognized", he said, "that the unity of the Atlantic community must be further developed, if it is to surmount the shifting tactics of international Communism..and if it is to serve the needs of this and coming generations.

The White House today announced the appointment of Vice Admiral Robert Briscoe to succeed Admiral William Fechteler as commander - in - chief of Allied forces in Sotthern Europe. Briscoe has been serving as deputy chief of naval operations in Washington. Fechteler is due for retirement.

The Senate Agriculture Committee voted today to take up the House - approved farm bill on Wednesday. Democratic Senator Humphrey said he will offer some amendments. One of them would give the secretary of agriculture authority to make direct payments to make up the difference between a support price and 90 percent of parity. Republican Senator Young said he will try to have parity prices forzen at their present levels for two years.

The Supreme Court ruled today that..in some instances..an employer claiming inability to pay higher wages must open his books to union inspection. The decision was split, 6 to 3. It upheld an order by the National Labor Relations Board requiring the Truitt Manufacturing Company of Greensboro, North Carolina, to let a union auditor examine its books. The majority opinion empahaized that the court was not laying down a rule for all collective bargaining cases. It said, "The inquiry must always be whether under the circumstances of the particular case, the statutroy obligation to bargain in good faith has not been met." The minority opinion was that the case in question should have been remanded for further study.

In another action, the Supreme Court denied Louisiana State University a review of a lower court ruling, requiring it to admit a Negro as an undergratuate. Negroes already are enrolled in the university's graduate schools.

In London today, Great Britain and Russia would up the first phase of their talks aimed at preserving peace in Indo-China. A Foreign Office spokesman said "some progress had been made. The armistice ending the Indo-China War called for elections throughout Vietnam, to determine the future of the country. The communist government of North Vietnam is insisting that the election be held since the Reds have an idea they will gain by it. The government of South Vietnam opposed the election, on grounds it was not a party to the armistice agreement.

Western Algeria was struck today by a new wave of violence. Nationalist guerillas attacked more than 40 farms. Twenty-five persons on the farms are reported killed. Many of the farm buildings were burned. Twenty of the dead are identified as Europeans.

Marshal Tito of Youoslavia arrived in Paris today for a six-day state visit. Tonight..at a dinner party..Tito called on the East and West "to seek out new paths", in order to spare the world the catastrophe of nuclear war. Mankind, he said, must not permit "a group of individuals to play with the fate of the world." Tito did not identify the "group of individuals."

The Pulitzer Prizes were announced today. Thr prize for the best novel went to "Andersonville", by Mackinlay Kantor. The winning drama was "The Diary of Anner Frank." The prize for international repo ting as shared by William Randolph Hearst, Jr., Kingsbury Smith and Frank Conniff, for a series of exclusive interviews with Soviet leaders.

I have asked my colleague David Schoenburn to give us a report on the results of last week's NATO meeting. We switch by recording not to Paris and David Schoenbrun.

SCHOENBRUN: "Much has been said, little has been done." In that short, sharp phrase, the French paper L'Monde tonight expresses the consensus in this key country of the Atlantic alliance that the alliance itself is dying on the vine. Unless there be any doubt of its opinion, the paper's front-page editorial adds with somber, obituary-like finality:"If the Atlantic alliance ever really existed, it is not no more than a word." This is a harsh judgment. The fact that it is made without even a word of regret is in itself even harsher. Is it, however, a true judgment? Is NATO, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, now no more than just a set of initials? Were the billions of dollars poured into Europe, poured after all, into a sewer? Are the soldiers, airmen and sailors of the Western defense forces only toys? If so, if NATO is only a word, if the Foreign Ministers of fifteen nations - totalling some 500,000,000 peoples, controlling more than 60% of the world's trade - if all of this is now an empty illusion, then can freedom survive in the world? Can this thing called Western civilization survive? These are grave questions. No responsible man would put them lightly. Yet they have been put, repeatedly insistently, here in Paris these past four days as the fifteen Foreign Ministers of NATO met for what was billed, in advance, as one of the most important, if not "the" most important, conference of the alliance since its inception seven years ago.

These questions were asked by such men as Paul Henri Spaak, of Belgium, a small nation but a big man. They've been asked by one of the most dynamic foreign ministers of the West, Lester Pearson of Canada, and they've been asked, too, by our own Secretary of State - John Foster Dulles. It's a dangerous question for Mr. Dulles to ask in an election year, when a debate is underway about the Administration's success, or failure, in foreign policy.

Yet, Mr. Dulles did raise these grave questions here in Paris and with considerable courage, knowing, I'm sure, from talks I've had with him, that he himself might be blamed for the weaknesses, for the shortcomings of the Western alliance.

This NATO conference, which ended here in Paris yesterday, did not come up with any answers to these questions. But it was, I would suggest, a most important and useful conference - nonetheless - if only because for the first time in years it did have the courage to put these questions frankly and bluntly, to recognize officially that many observers have been saying for a long time, that the alliance of the Western world has lost momentum. Is in need of new inspiration. Does need to undergoe the agonizing reappraisal - to use a Dulles phrase in a different context - For what Mr. Dulles himslef has now learned is that the reappraisal is no longer an American threat to pull out of the alliance but an American and and Allied need, in common, to take a new look at our alliance. We're all in this together and we may all sink together if the dangerous trend of the past year is not halted. What has happened is that the world has changed; changed greatly since the inception of NATO in 1949. NATO was conceived in fear and in hope, seven years ago; in fear of a Soviet aggression in Europe; in hope that a united defense front might not only discourage that aggression but might also lead to a greater community of the Atlantic peoples. In short, that NATO might be "for" something as well as "against something. The positive aim being the promotion of freedom and the greater prosperity for the member peoples. Neither the hopes nor the fears have materialized. Soviet aggression was discouraged thanks to NATO. But the Soviet potential for aggression is greater than ever. If we put our guard down now it may be an invitation to them to start punching again. As for the hopes of NATO, they fell miserably to reach fruition. Any objective man must agree with the statemate that NATO is not a community of the Atlantic today. It is only a word. The partners quarrel among themselves: Greece, Britain and Turkey over Cyprus; America and France and Britain failed to reach a common policy on the Middle East or on North Africa. What to do about it? No one really knows. But at least - and I bleieve that this is an achievement - all have agreed that something must be done. That's why they appointed this so-called "wise men's committee of three" to report back in the Fall with a new plan. If you know that you are sick, then, perhaps, you're half way on the road to recovery.

This is David Schoenbrun reporting from Paris. Now, back to Edward R. Murrow in New York.

That was my colleague, David Schoenbrun, giving us a report on the result of last week's NATO meeting.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: We are encompassed with grave problems. The enemy has resorted to new tactics, to which we must adapt. Joseph Conrad said, "The sight of homan affairs deserves admiration and pity. And he is not insensible who pays them the undemonstrative tribute of a sigh which is not a sob, and of a smile which is not a grin."

Good Night and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Tues., May 8, 1956

This is the news:

Secretary of State Dulles reported tonight... in a Washington speech... on the results of last week's meeting of NATO foreign ministers in Paris. The decision to make NATO something more than a military alliance, he said, was "of historic importance." Mr. Dulles said the Atlantic community still is not organized adequately to deal with questions like the problem of Cyprus. He accused Russia of ignoring its promise... made at the summit conference at Geneva... to seek German reunification through free elections. But Russia, Mr. Dulles said, "seems increasingly aware of the dangerous consequences of reckless action in the Middle East." He said this has given the NATO countries "Grounds For Hope" that the United Nations may be able to solve the Palestine problem.

Harold Stassen today gave President Eisenhower a personal briefing on the London disarmament conference./ Stassen headed the American delegation to the conference, which ended in disagreement./ He said the President told him, the United States will continue "patiently and persistently" to seek a sound agreement. "I believe," Stassen said, "the day of agreement will come." He said he thought Soviet Premier Bulganin might send a new message on disarmament to the President soon.

Secretary of Defense ~~Dulles~~ Wilson told a Senate committee today, that stories that Russia "is far outstripping the United States in terms of air power" are not true. Last week, General Lemay, the head of the Strategic Air Command, testified that of the seventy-eight B-52's produced to date, only 46 have been accepted by the Air Force./ Wilson said today that B-52 production is going to be stepped up./ "We are now proposing," he said, "to increase the peak rate to 20 per month, and to achieve the peak substantially earlier than planned."/ The present schedule calls for production of twelve B-52's a month./ Wilson said, "There is no logical reason why the United States should pattern its defense program directly on that of the U.S.S.R." And like President Eisenhower last week, he stressed the importance of naval air power.

→

He noted that the Navy has 15 large carriers, "all of which carry aircraft with an atomic capability."

In Paris today, Marshal Tito of Yugoslavia continued his talks with French leaders. Premier Mollet said after today's meeting, that Tito favors the French plan, calling for creation of a United Nations agency to administer aid to underdeveloped countries. They also discussed France's North African policy.

The French moved sizable reinforcements into Western Algeria today, in an action aimed at wiping out the guerrilla forces that massacred more than 20 European farmers. French troops killed a hundred guerrillas in the last 24 hours. Another 100 were taken prisoner.

In Algiers, thousands of Frenchmen rioted in protest against the failure of France to put down the rebellion. The demonstration broke out during ceremonies marking the 11th anniversary of V-E Day. Police guarding the French resident-minister, Robert LaCoste, were pelted with tomatoes. LaCoste asked the demonstrators why they were not at the front.

In Rabat, the Moroccan cabinet met in emergency session, to discuss possible effects of the new fighting in Algeria. And in Beirut, the capital of Lebanon, a crowd marched through the streets... protesting French measures in Algeria and calling for a boycott of France.

→

On Cyprus today, the British governor confirmed the death sentence for two Cypriots... convicted of violence in the union-with-Greece movement.

In Strasbourg, the Council of Europe announced that Greece has filed a petition with the human rights commission, accusing Britain of "violations of the European convention for the safeguard of human rights and fundamental freedoms." The Greek government also protested to the British and American ambassadors in Athens.

In Washington, the government reported today that 63-million, 990-thousand persons had jobs last month, a new April record and an increase of 900-thousand jobs over March. Seasonal factors... such as increased farm employment... were responsible for most of the gain.

George Meany, president of the AFL-CIO, told a Senate committee today that the federal minimum wage law should be liberalized to include employes of large department stores, hotels, chain stores and laundries. Meany called extension of coverage "sound and necessary from every economic and practical viewpoint." The present minimum wage is a dollar an hour.

The Navy tested its new Aerobee-Hi rocket again today at the White Sands proving ground in New Mexico. The rocket climbed 116 and a half miles---42 miles short of a new record. Last week, the rocket rose only 10-thousand feet, due to engine failure.

Virtually complete returns from yesterday's primary in Maryland show Millard Tydings winning the Democratic nomination for senator by 8-thousand votes. Tydings' opponent... George Mahoney... still has not conceded. ~~If Tydings holds his lead, his opponent in November will~~ be Republican Senator Butler, who defeated him with ~~Senator McCarthy's~~ support in 1950. ~~At that time, Tydings already had served in the Senate~~ for 24 years and was ~~seeking a fifth~~ term.

Primary elections were held today in five states---Indiana, Ohio, Florida, West Virginia and New Mexico. Except in Florida and West Virginia, voting was light. Early, scattered returns show no significant trends.

Edward R. Murrow: May 8, 1956. 7. 45 p.m.

When U.N. Secretary General Hammarskjold returned from the Middle East his language was restrained. He said: "It is for others to evaluate the results." Today Israel's Prime Minister Ben-Gurion said Hammarskjold had brought about a cease-fire "at least for the time being", adding that the basic danger of war still exists, because there is no sign that any of the Arab states really want peace. Egyptian incursions in the Gaza strip since the cease-fire have caused Ben-Gurion to doubt that Egypt's Nasser is either willing or able to maintain order in the area. Israel today has officially protested what it calls "the renewed outbreak of violence along the Egyptian and Jordan borders."

In Washington the State Department's Middle Eastern expert, George Allen, testified that the communist arms for Egypt had "increased the frightening prospect of a devastating arms race, or even a war in the area." He divulged nothing about our policy in the area, except to repeat that "we would like a peaceful and equitable settlement of Arab-Israel differences."

Mr. Hammarskjold's accomplishment does nothing to reduce or eliminate the apparently irreconcilable conflict between Israel and her neighbors. The blockade by Egypt of the Suez Canal and the Gulf of Akaba continues. To appreciate what this means, it would be necessary to imagine that the Canadians had blockaded San Francisco and the Panama Canal, while at the same time they were digesting, and learning to use, large quantities of communist-built aircraft and armor.

There are many flashpoints around the frontiers of Israel, where the shooting could begin. None is more critical than the Jordan River Valley project. The Israeli's contend that this development, both for power and for irrigation, is vital to the economic success of their state. Each season lost without work holds back Israel's long-range development plans. Early this year the Israeli's completed all but a mile-and-a-half of the vital canal. This is in a de-militarized area, and Israel contends she has the right to complete it. Syria has said officially that if the Israeli's start digging, it will mean war. And Egypt and Jordan are linked to Syria with a military alliance. When Mr. Hammarskjold was talking to the Syrians they at first said they wouldn't sign a cease-fire agreement unless Israel agreed not to resume work on the Jordan diversion. The Syrians finally agreed, but with an obvious mental reservation on the Jordan River dispute, and in fact sent Mr. Hammarskjold a separate letter on the subject.

The disputed area lies in a swamp south of Lake Huleh, and north of the Sea of Galilee. The Israeli's claim it is their sovereign property, de-militarized and under U.N. control, and they have a perfect legal right to resume work any time they want to. They stopped work on it because of a U.N. Security Council resolution in November of 1953, which ordered suspension of the work, so that an "urgent examination" of the situation could be carried out. Two-and-a-half years have elapsed, nothing has happened, and the Israeli's claim they are now legally free to go ahead. The Jordan water would be shared by Israel and Syria, but the Syrians haven't agreed. They don't recognize the existence of Israel, regard it as an illegal enemy state. Israeli officials leave no doubt that in due course they propose to proceed with the project.

It may be that the British, during their talks with the Russian leaders in London, convinced them that Arab aggression against Israel would end up by being a big war. It is possible that the Russians may do what they indicated in London, namely cut down the supply of arms to the Arab nations. They have already created an imbalance in aircraft, armor and heavy guns. Israel is attempting to adjust the balance by purchasing defensive weapons wherever she can. Our government will not say Yes, and it won't say No. We are urging Canada, France and even Italy to make arms available to Israel. The fighters they have received from France, the Mystere Mark 4, are inferior to the Russian MIGs. The Egyptians have a considerable number of Russian Ilyucion bombers. The Israeli's aren't even attempting to buy bombers, regarding them quite ~~XXXXXX~~ rightly as offensive weapons.

It is reasonable to ask why Israel would not accept a joint guarantee of her frontiers by the Western Powers. The answer they give is simple. They saw what happened to Poland and to Czechoslovakia, and to small nations in the shadow of the Soviet. They have concluded, rightly or wrongly, that their defense must be based upon weapons in hand, and not upon guarantees of any kind. They contend that by the time their guarantors had assembled, debated and resolved, the whole thing would be academic because Israel would have ceased to exist.

Mr. Hammarskjold, after much to-ing and fro-ing, has made a very small dent in a massive problem. And until it is resolved it will continue to threaten the peace of the entire world.

Ted Pearson-

Word for Today

The basic conflict between Israel and her neighbors still exists. Even the cease-fire is not being observed altogether, though Napoleon counseled nations desiring peace "to avoid the pin-pricks that precede the cannon-shots of war." Real peace remains to be achieved. But as J.N. Maffitt said, "We lose much by fearing to attempt."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

TUESDAY, MAY 8, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

Secretary of State Dulles reported tonight..in a Washington speech.. on the results of last week's meeting of NATO foreign ministers in Paris. The decision to make NATO something more than a military alliance, he said, was "of historic importance." Mr. Dulles said the Atlantic community still is not organized adequately to deal with questions like the problem of Cyprus. He accused Russia of ignoring its promise ..made at the summit conference at Geneva..to seek German reunification through free elections. But Russia, Mr. Dulles said, "seems increasingly aware of the dangerous concequences of reckless action in the Middle East. He said this has given the NATO countries "grounds for hope" that the United Nations may be able to solve the Palestine problem.

Harold Stassen today gave President Eisenhower a personal briefing on the London disarmament conference. Stassen headed the American delegation to the conference, which ended in disagreement. He said the President told him the United States will continue "patiently and persistently" to seek a sound agreement. "I believe", Stassen said, "the day of agreement will come." He said he thought Soviet Premier Bulganin might send a new message on disarmament to the President soon.

Secretary of Defense Wilson told a Senate committee today that stories that Russia "is far outstripping the United States in terms of air power" are not true. Last week, General Lemay, the head of the Strategic Air Command, testified that the seventy-eight B-52's produced to date, only 4 have been accepted by the Air Force. Wilson said today that B-52 production is going to be stepped up. "We are now proposing", he said, "to increase the peak rate to 20 per month, and to acheive the peak substantially earlier than planned." The present schedule calls for pooduction of twelve B-52's a month. Wilson said, "There is no logical reason why the United States should pattern its defense program directly on that of the U.S.S.R." And like President Eisenhower last week, he stressed the importance of naval air power. He noted that the Navy has 15 large carriers, "all of which carry aircraft with an atomic capability."

In Paris today, Marshal Tito of Yugoslavia continued his talks with French leaders. Premier Mollet said after today's meeting that Tito favors the French plan, calling for creation of a United Nations agency to administer aid to underdeveloped countries. They also discussed France's North African policy.

The French moved sizable reinforcements into Western Algeria today, in an action aimed at wiping out the guerilla forces that massacred more than 20 European farmers. French troops killed a hundred guerillas in the last 24 hours. Another 100 were taken prisoner.

In Algiers, thousands of Frenchmen rioted in protest against the failure of France to put down the rebellion. The demonstration broke out during ceremouies marking the 11th anniversary of V-E Day. Police guarding the French resident-minister, Robert LaCoste, were pelted with tomatoes. LaCoste asked the demonstrators why they were not at the front.

In Rabat, the Moroccan cabinet met in emergency session to discuss possible effects of the new fighting in Algeria. And in Beirut, the capital of Lebanon, a crowd marched through the streets..protesting French measures in Algeria and calling for a boycott of France.

On Cyprus today, the British governor confirmed the death sentence for two Cypriots..convicted of violence in the Union-with-Greece movement.

In Strasbourg, the Council of Europe announced that Greece has filed a petition with the human rights commission, accusing Britain of "violations of the European convention for the safeguard of human rights and fundamental freedoms." The Greek government also protested to the British and American ambassadors in Athens.

In Washington, the government reported today that 63-million, 990 thousand persons had jobs last month, a new April record and an increase of 900-thousand jobs over March. Seasonal factors..such an increased farm employment..were responsible for most of the gain.

George Meany, president of the AFL-CIO, told a Senate committee today that the Federal minimum wage law should be liberalized to include employees of large department stores, hotels, chain stores and laundries. Meany called extension of coverage "sound and necessary from every economic and practical viewpoint." The present minimum wage is a dollar an hour.

The Navy tested its new Aerobee - Hi rocket again today at the White Sands proving ground in New Mexico. The rocket climbed 116 and a half miles ---42 miles short of a new record. Last week, the rocket rose only 1-thousand feet, due to engine failure.

Virtually complete returns from yesterday's primary in Maryland show Millard Tydings winning the Democratic nomination for senator by 8-thousand votes. Tydings opponent..George Mahoney..still has not conceded.

Primary elections were held today in five states -- Indiana, Ohio, Florida, West Virginia and New Mexico. Except in Flirida and West Virginia, voting was light. Early, scattered returns show no significant trends.

When U. N. Secretary General Hammarskjold returned from the Middle East his language was restrained. He said: "It is for others to evaluate the results." Today Israel's Prime Minister Ben-Gurion said Hammarakjold had brought about a cease-fire "at least for the time being", adding that the basic danger of war still exists, because there is no sign that any of the Arab states really want peace. Egyptian incursions in the Gaza strip since the cease - fire have caused Ben Gurion to doubt that Egypt's Nasser is either willing or able to maintain order in the area. Israel today has officially protested what it calls "the renewed outbreak of violence along the Egyptian and Jordan borders."

In Washington the State Department's Middle Eastern expert, George Allen testified that the communist arms for Egypt had "increased the frightening prospect of a devastating arms race, or even a war in the area." He divulged nothing about our policy in the area, except to repeat that "we would like a peaceful and equitable settlement of Arab-Israel differences."

Mr. Hammarakjold's accomplishment does nothing to reduce or eliminate the apparently irreconcilable conflict between Israel and her nieghbors. The blockade by Egypt of the Suez Canal and the Gulf of Akaba continues. To appreciate what this means, it would be necessary to imagine that the Canadians had blockaded San Francisco and the Panama Canal, while at the same time they were digesting, and learning to use, large quantities of communist-built aircraft and armor.

There are many flashpoints around the frontiers of Israel, where the shooting could begin. None is more critical than the Jordan River Valley project. The Israeli's contend that this developemnt, both for power and irrigation, is vital to the economic success of their state. Each season lost without work holds back Israel's long-range development plans. Early this year the Israeli's completed all but a mile-and-a-half of the vital canal. This is in a de-militarazed area, and Israel contends she has the right to complete it. Syria has said officially that if the Israelis start digging, it will mean war. And Egypt and Jordan are linked to Syria with a military alliance. When

Mr. Hammarskjold was talking to the Syrians they at first said they wouldn't sign a cease-fire agreement unless Israel agreed not to resume work on the Jordan diversion. The Syrians finally agreed, but with an obvious mental reservation on the Jordan River dispute, and in fact sent Mr. Hammarskjold a separate letter on the subject.

Israel stopped work on the canal because of a U. N. Security Council resolution in November of 1953, which ordered suspension of the work, so that an "urgent examination" of the situation could be carried out. Two-and-a-half years have elapsed, nothing has happened, and the Israeli's claim they are now legally free to go ahead. The Jordan water would be shared by Israel and Syria, but the Syrians haven't agreed. They don't recognize the existence of Israel, regard it as an illegal enemy state. Israeli officials leave no doubt that in due course they propose to proceed with the project.

It may be that the British, during their talks with the Russian leaders in London, convinced them that Arab aggression against Israel would end up by being a big war. It is possible that the Russians may do what they indicated in London, namely cut down the supply of arms to the Arab nations. They have already created an imbalance in aircraft, armor and heavy guns. Israel is attempting to adjust the balance by purchasing defensive weapons wherever she can. Our government will not say Yes, and it won't say No. We are urging Canada, France and even Italy to make arms available to Israel. The fighters they have received from France, the Mystere Mark 4, are inferior to the Russian MIGs. The Egyptians have a considerable number of Russian Illyucion bombers. The Israelis aren't even attempting to buy bombers, regarding them quite rightly as offensive weapons.

It is reasonable to ask why Israel would not accept a joint guarantee of her frontiers by the Western powers. The answer they give is simple. They saw what happened to Poland and to Czechoslovakia, and to small nations in the shadow of the Soviet. They have concluded, rightly or wrongly, that their defense must be based upon weapons in hand, and not upon guarantees of any kind. They contend that by the time their guarantors had assembled, debated and resolved, the whole thing would be academic because Israel would have ceased to exist.

Mr. Hammarskjold, after much to-ing, and fro-ing, has made a very small dent in a massive problem. And until it is resolved it will continue to threaten the peace of the entire world.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Ted Pearson.

PEARSON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: The basic conflict between Israel and her neighbors still exists. Even the cease-fire is not being observed altogether, though Napoleon counseled nations desiring peace "to avoid the pin-pricks that precede the cannon -shots of war." Real peace remains to be achieved. But as J.N. Maffit said, "We lose much by fearing to attempt."

Goodnight and Goodluck.

Edward R. Murrow Wed., May 9, 1956

This is the news:

President Eisenhower said today that he will enter Walter Reed Hospital tomorrow evening for "a major medical check-up, from head to toe." The President told his weekly news conference that it would be the routine examination he has been having every year for the past few years... and not directly related to his heart attack in September. The heart specialist, Dr. Paul Dudley White, gave Mr. Eisenhower a brief examination today, and said afterward that the President seems to be in good health.

It was pointed out to Mr. Eisenhower... at his news conference... that returns from yesterday's Indiana primary showed him getting better than 60 percent of the vote, over Senator Kefauver. It was suggested that, on the basis of these returns, the farmers were not in revolt against the Administration. Mr. Eisenhower expressed gratification at the results. He said it would be "stretching a point" to regard the victory of Democratic Senator Lyndon Johnson, in Texas, as a repudiation of his administration. Last week, Johnson won control of the state Democratic organization from Governor Shivers, who supported Mr. Eisenhower in the 1952 campaign. The President said it looked to him like "an internal conflict among Democrats."

→

Democratic Senator George announced today that he will not seek re-election. George is the dean of the Senate, having served as senator from Georgia for nearly 34 years. And he is chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Senator George gave no specific reason for his retirement..although his physician called the decision wise, in view of a minor heart ailment. George is also suffering from a mild form of diabetes. His retirement appears to leave the field open for Herman Talmadge, former governor of Georgia, to succeed him in the Senate. Talmadge already has declared his candidacy.

President Eisenhower said today that he has offered Senator George an appointment as his personal representative to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. George indicated he will accept.

Mr. Eisenhower again discussed the question whether this country has a sufficient number of intercontinental bombers. He said some education needed to be done on the subject. "If we are going to depend entirely on long-range strategic bombers," he asked, "why do we have all these forward bases that are costing so many billions to build and sustain?" [redacted]

He said, when you put American planes on forward bases, "you obviously don't need planes that can fly from the middle of St. Louis to the middle of the Eurasian continent." He also stressed the importance of naval air power.

Admiral Radford... chairman of the joint chiefs of staff... told a Senate committee today that the nation's defense forces are adequate. They are capable, he said, "of performing all essential tasks in the initial stage of a shooting war, global or otherwise." The Army chief of staff... General Maxwell Taylor... told the same committee [redacted] there are "a number of soft spots" in the Army program. However, he said, "our present capabilities do permit us to perform our most important tasks as we now see them. He said the adequacy of the present military program is largely a matter of judgment.

→

The worst rioting in twelve years broke out in Athens today, in protest against the scheduled execution of two Cypriots convicted of violence in the movement to unite Cyprus with Greece. Four persons died in the demonstrations. Nearly 200 persons were injured. And windows in the United States Information Office were smashed. The British governor of Cyprus refused yesterday to commute the two death sentences. One of the condemned youths killed a policeman; the other shot and wounded a British businessman.

Egypt and Israel accused each other today of causing a new incident on the Gaza Strip. The Egyptians said an Israeli patrol opened fire on a group of Arab villagers. The Israelis said Egyptian infiltrators crossed the demarcation line into Israeli territpry. There were no casualties.

France today ordered 50-thousand more troops moved to Algeria, in an effort to put down the Arab rebellion. Twenty thousand additional troops will be called up immediately. The rest will be in uniform by the end of the month. Today, in Eastern Algeria, rebel forces smashed at 46 villages. At least 14 persons were killed.

The French cabinet decided today to authorize the establishment of a "home guard" in Algeria, to help protect farms and crops from rebel attacks.

In Morocco today, an official of the Moroccan Party of Democratic Independence... a moderate Nationalist group... was assassinated. The assassin, who used a revolver, apparently escaped.

~~Marshal Tito broke off his diplomatic talks in Paris today, to go sightseeing at Versailles. Security precautions were undiminished. Even in the gardens of the former French kings, police helicopters hovered overhead.~~

~~In Moscow today, the army newspaper Red Star challenged recent statements that Stalin... by his bad judgment... left Russia unprepared for Nazi attack. The charge that Stalin failed to take necessary~~ precautions has appeared in the official magazine of the Soviet Defense Ministry, and the rebuttal in Red Star took Western observers in Moscow by surprise. Red Star called the charge "absolutely wrong". It said the Defense Ministry... headed by Marshal Zhukov... "crudely distorted" the facts, under the pretext of the struggle against the personality cult. It said: "There is no putting up with the state of affairs when, under the pretext of exposing this cult, the role of our party and people are played down." Western observers noted that Red Star did not defend Stalin by name.

Japan and the Philippines signed a reparations agreement today, for losses suffered by the Philippines during World War Two. Under the terms of the agreement, Japan will provide 550-million dollars' worth of goods and services, over a period of 20 years. It will also lend the Philippines an additional 250-million dollars.

In Montgomery, Alabama, a circuit judge today ordered the bus line operating in Montgomery to rescind its policy of racial integration. The judge said it is his interpretation that the Supreme Court has not outlawed segregation on buses "where carriage of passengers is solely intra-state."

Edward R. Murrow: May 9, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

The disappearance of Commander Lionel Crabb, Royal Navy retired, is assuming fantastic proportions. Commander Crabb was a frogman - one of Britain's best, an authentic hero. He was last seen in Portsmouth Harbor, not far from the Russian heavy cruiser that had brought Bulganin and Khrushchev to Britain. Nine days later the Admiralty announced that Crabb was missing, presumed dead. This bare announcement produced a whirlwind of speculation. What was the retired British Commander doing in the water near the Soviet cruiser.? Was he protecting it, or inspecting it? Had the Russians killed him, or captured him? Why had the police torn several sheets out of the hotel register where he was staying in Portsmouth? Who was Crabb's companion at the hotel? He signed the register as Matthew Smith. Why was no search made for Commander Crabb's body? The Russian Embassy in London said it was "enthralled" by the mystery, but knew nothing about it except that a Russian look-out had seen a frogman in Portsmouth Harbor on April 19th.

Commander Crabb's wife and some of his friends insisted he was still alive, but offered no evidence.

And then today there occurred a most unusual scene in the House of Commons, when Prime Minister Sir Anthony Eden was questioned about Commander Crabb's disappearance. He said it would not be in the public interest to disclose the circumstances in which Commander Crabb is presumed to have met his death. And he added: "I think it necessary in the special circumstances of this case to make it clear that what was done, was done without the authority or the knowledge of Her Majesty's ministers." In other words, the British Government didn't know anything about it. Eden said: "Appropriate disciplinary steps are being taken." He was asked: "Against whom?" Why was the Commander diving near the Soviet cruiser? Was he on an espionage mission? Eden didn't answer. The Labour Party wanted an immediate debate, but the Speaker ruled them out of order.

Eden's cryptic answer was widely regarded as one of the most extraordinary statements ever made by a British Prime Minister.

My colleague Alexander Kendrick cables me from London that Eden's stonewall refusal to divulge any information has converted into virtual certainty previous rumors that the British frogman was actually engaged in some sort of espionage relating to the Soviet cruiser. It has also strengthened parallel rumors that an American Intelligence agency was involved in Commander Crabb's last dive. Eden's statement that the British Government didn't know anything about the mission would seem to indicate that British Naval Intelligence, or some other hush-hush outfit, was acting on its own. Kendrick reports that the feeling is widespread in London that they were acting in concert with an American agency, interested in knowing something about Soviet naval devices or construction. And who was the Matthew Smith, Crabb's companion who signed that hotel register? He is now, rightly or wrongly, believed to have been an American.

In British parliamentary language, the phrase that Eden used, "not in the public interest", generally means that an answer would embarrass Britain's relations with a friendly foreign power. Labour leaders are claiming tonight that Eden's refusal to answer was an effort to cover up a very grave blunder. It is certain that both grave and unusual circumstances must exist for Eden to have taken the line he did, to assume full responsibility but to refuse all information. The Speaker's ruling preventing debate put a lid on the mystery, so far as the House of Commons is concerned. But Kendrick reports that the public reaction is explosive. Many political observers of both Parties believe Eden made a major boner - he left no brick undropped. Every member of the public may now confirm his wildest speculation.

The Russians, of course, would like nothing better than continued speculation that Commander Crabb's last mission was sinister, and that some United States agency was behind it. That is the way the speculation is running now in Britain, and Eden will have no one to blame but himself if the rumors get wilder and wilder. And if an American agent, or agency, was not involved, then there would seem to be no reason why our government should continue to remain mute while the rumor mills in England go on ~~continue to~~ grinding out material which will substantially damage Anglo-American relations.

All efforts to secure comment or denial from responsible naval and intelligence sources in Washington have so far been futile.

Word for Today

Prime Minister Eden has refused to divulge details of the disappearance of Commander Crabb. Espionage was never a ~~reputable~~ fashionable profession, but it is necessary. One recalls the ancient saying, "The spy is the king's eye, and he who hath him not is blind." And the careers of spies are usually hidden. As George Herbert said, "The life of spies is to know, not to be known."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

WEDNESDAY, MAY 9, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

President Eisenhower said today that he will enter Walter Reed Hospital tomorrow evening for a "major medical check-up, from head to toe." The President told his weekly news conference that it would be the routine examination he had been having every year for the past few years..and not directly related to his heart attack in September.

The heart specialist, Dr. Paul Dudley White, gave Mr. Eisenhower a brief examination today, and said afterward that the President seems to be in good health.

It was pointed out to Mr. Eisenhower..at his news conference..that returns from yesterday's Indiana primary showed him getting better than 60 percent of the vote over Senator Hefauver. It was suggested that, on the bases of these returns, the farmers were not in revolt against the Administration. Mr. Eisenhower expressed gratification at the results. He said it would be "stretching a point" to regard the victory of Democratic Senator Lyndon Johnson, in Texas, as a repudiation of his administration. Last week, Johnson won control of the state Democratic organization from Governor Shivers, who supported Mr. Eisenhower in the 1952 campaign. The President said it looked to him like "an internal conflict among Democrats."

Democratic Senator George announced today that he will not seek reelection George is the dean of the Senate, having served as a senator from Georgia for nearly 34 years. And he is chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Senator George gave no specific reason for his retirement although his physician called the dedision wise, in view of a minor heart ailment. George is also suffering from a mild form of diabetes. His retirement appears to leave the field open for Hemman Talmadge, former governor of Georgia, to succeed him in the Senate. Talmadge already has declared his candidacy.

President Eisenhower said today that he has offered Senator George an appointment as his personal representative to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. George indicated he will accept.

Mr. Eisenhower again discussed the question whether this country has a sufficient number of intercontinental bombers. He said some education needed to be done on the subject. "If we are going to depend entirely on long-range strategic bombers," he asked,"why do we have all these forward bases that are costing so many billions to build and sustain?" He said, when you put American planes on forward bases, "you obviously don't need planes that can fly from the middle of St. Louis to the middle of the Eurasian continent. " He also stressed the importance of naval air power.

Admiral Radford..chairman of the joint chiefs of staff..told a Senate committee today that the nation's defense forces are adequate. They are capable he said, "of performing allessential tasks in the initial stage of a shooting war, global or otherwise." The Army chief of staff..General Maxwell Taylor.. told the same committee there are "a number of soft spots" in the Army program. However, he said, "our present capabilities do permit us to perform our most important tasks as we now seem them. He said the adequacy of the present military program is largely a matter of judgement.

The worst rioting in twelve years broke out in Athens today, in protest against the scheduled execution of two Cypriots convicted of violence in the movement to unite Cyprus with Greece. Four persons died in the demonstrations. Nearly 200 persons were injured. And windows in the United States Information Office were smashed. The British governor of Cyprus refused yesterday to commute the two death sentences. One of the condemned youths killed a policemen; the other shot and wounded a British businessman.

France today ordered 50-thousand more troops moved to Algeria, in an effort to put down the Arab rebellion. Twenty thousand additional troops will be called up immediately. The rest will be in uniform by the end of the month. Today, in Eastern Algeria, rebel forces smashed at 16 villages. At least 14 persons were killed.

The French cabinet decided today to authorize the establishment of a "home guard" in Algeria, to help protect farms and crops from rebel attacks.

In Morocco today, an official of the Moroccan party of Democratic Independence..a moderate Nationalist group..was assassinated. The assassin, who used a revolver, apparently escaped.

Japan and the Philippines signed a reparations agreement today, for losses suffered by the Philippines during World War Two. Under the terms of the agreement, Japan will provide 550-billion dollars' worth of goods and services over a period of 20 years. It will also lend the Philippines an additional 250-million dollars.

In Montgomery, Alabama, a circuit judge today ordered the bus line operating in Montgomery to rescind its policy of racial integration. The judge said it is his interpretation that the Supreme Court has not outlawed segregation on buses "where carriage of passengers is solely intra-state."

The disappearance of Commander Lionel Crabb, Royal Navy retired, is assuming fantastic proportions. Commander Crabb was a frogman - one of Britain's best, an authentic hero. He was last seen in Portsmouth Harbor, not far from the Russian heavy cruiser that had brought Bulganin and Khrushchev to Britain. Nine days later the Admiralty announced that Crabb was missing, presumed dead. This bare announcement produced a whirlwind of speculation. What was the retired British Commander doing in the water near the Soviet cruiser? Was he protecting it, or inspecting it? Had the Russians killed him, or captured him?

Why had the police town several sheets out of the hotel register where he was staying in Portsmouth? Who was Crabb's companion at the hotel? He signed the register as Matthew Smith. Why was no search made for Commander Crabb's body? The Russian Embassy in London said it was "enthraled" by the mystery, but knew nothing about it except that a Russian look-out had seen a frogman in Portsmouth Harbor on April 19th.

Commander Crabb's wife and some of his firends insisted he was still alive, but offered no evidence.

And then today there occurred a most unusual scene in the House of Commons, when Prime Minister Sir Anthony Eden was questioned about Commander Crabb's disappearance. He said "it would not be in the public interest to disclose the circumstances in which Commander Crabb is presumed to have met his death." And he added: "I think it necessary in the special circumstances of this case to make it clear that what was done, was done without the authority or the knowledge of Her Majesty's ministers." In other words, the British Government didn't know anything about it. Eden said: "Appropriate disciplinary steps are being taken." He was asked:"Against whom?" Why was the Commander diving near the Soviet cruiser? Was he on an expionage mission? Eden didn't answer. The Labour Party wanted an immediate debate, but the Speaker ruled them out of order.

Eden's cryptic answer was widely regarded as one of the most extraordinary statements ever made by a British Prime Minister.

My colleague Alexander Kendrick cables me from London that Eden's stonewall refusal to divulge any information has converted into virtual certainty previous rumors that the British frogman was actually engaged in some sort of espionage relating to the Soviet cruiser. It has also strengthenen parallel rumors that an American Intelligence agency was involved in Commander Crabb's last dive. Eden's statement that the British Government didn't know anything about the mission would seem to indicate that British Naval Intelligence, or some other hush-hush outfit, was acting on its own. Kendrick reports that the feeling is widespread in London that they were acting in concert with an American agency, interested in knowing something about Soviet naval devices or construction. And who was Matthew Smith, Crabb's companion who signed that hotel register? He is now, rightly or wrongly, believed to have been an American.

In British parliamentary language, the phrase that Eden used, "not in the public interest", generally means that an answer would embarrass Britain's relations with a friendly foreign power. Labour leaders are claiming tonight that Eden's refusal to answer was an effort to cover up a very grave blunder. It is certain that both grave and unusual circumstances must exist for Eden to have taken the line he did, to assume full responsibilbiy, but to refuse all information. The Speaker's ruling preventing debate put a lid on the mystery so far as the House of Commons is concerned. But Kemridck reports that the public reaction is explosive. Many political observers of both Parties believe Eden made a major boner - he left no brick undropped. Every member of the public may now confirm his wildest speculation.

The Russians, of course, would like nothing better than continued speculation that Commander Crabb's last mission was sinister, and that some United States agency was behind it. That is the why the speculation is running now in Britain, and Eden will have no one to blame but himself if the rumors get wilder and wilder. And if an American agent, or agency, was not involved, then there would seem to be no reason why our government should continue to remain mute while the rumor mills in England go on grinding out material which will substantially damage the Anglo-American relations.

All efforts to secure comment or denial from responsible naval and intelligence sources in Washington have so far been futile.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: Prime Minister Eden has refused to divulge details of the disappearance of Commander Crabb. Espionage was never a fashionable profession, but it is necessary. One recalls the ancient saying, "The spy is the king's eye, and he who hath him not is blind." And the careers of spies are usually hidden. As George Herbert said, "The life of spy is to know, not to be known."

Goodnight and Good Luck!

Edward R. Murrow Thurs., May 10, 1956

This is the news:

Secretary General Hammarskjold reported to the United Nations today on his recent mission to the Middle East. Hammarskjold said, in a 10-thousand-word report to the Security Council, that the cease-fire agreements between Israel and the Arab states constituted a necessary first step toward peace. "It is too early," he said, "to say what has been achieved of substance. The value of the agreements... and their effect... will depend first of all on the good-will and the actions taken by the governments directly concerned." Also of importance, Hammarskjold said, will be the support accorded these governments by the world community as represented by the United Nations. ~~He told~~ the Security Council that the situation "offers unique opportunities." ~~Final settlement, he said, probably is still far off.~~ But he added, "even partial solutions to the harassing problems of the region would be a contribution to the welfare of the peoples concerned and to the peace of the world." It is now up to the Security Council

Hammarskjold said he advised Israel not to resume work on its Jordan River irrigation project... to which Syria objects... and had told Egypt that it was bound, by Security Council ruling, to allow Israeli shipping to pass through the Suez Canal. He appealed for settlement of the Palestine problem within the framework of the United Nations---without "organizational innovations."

[redacted]

Reports from ~~Palestine~~ The Middle East tell of new border incidents. Egypt accuses Israeli troops of bayonetting to death an Arab farmer, inside the Gaza Strip. Egypt also complains of an Israeli aircraft, violating the Egyptian air space over Gaza. Israel reports that the railroad running between Tel Aviv and Beersheba, was blown up last night, three miles north of Beersheba... and that an Arab infiltrator fired on an Israeli patrol, south of Jerusalem, near the Jordan border. An Israeli spokesman says the infiltrator was killed in an exchange of shots. Jordan says the "infiltrator" was a civilian, who lost his way and crossed the frontier by mistake. Jordan concedes he was carrying a gun.

Fighting between French and rebel forces, continued today in Algeria, and the whole Department of Constantine has been placed under a state of siege. French troops are trying to hunt down the Arab guerrillas who attacked 46 villages in Eastern Algeria yesterday. In one local action, the garrison counter-attacked twelve times. Casualties are described as "heavy". 1/3 of Algeria is now under Martial Law —

On Cyprus today, the British hanged two Cypriots convicted of terrorism... in connection with the union-with-Greece movement. One of the Cypriots was charged with murdering a policeman, the other with wounding a British civilian. Dispatches from Cyprus say the island is unusually calm.

~~In Athens, riot police patrolled the streets to prevent the outbreak of new, anti-British demonstrations. And tonight the Greek premier called an emergency meeting of his cabinet.~~

In London, the government of Prime Minister Eden has agreed to a full-dress debate in the House of Commons on the mysterious disappearance of frogman Lionel Crabb. Crabb was last seen on April 19th, in the vicinity of a Russian warship in Portsmouth harbor. The warship had brought Russia's leaders to Britain, and there is speculation that Crabb was spying on the hull of the vessel. Yesterday... in the House of Commons... Eden refused to divulge details of the case, said it "would not be in the public interest." Today... under Laborite pressure... he agreed to debate the case on Monday.

Ambassador Clare Boothe Luce is flying home tonight from Rome. An embassy announcement said Mrs. Luce is returning to the United States for a medical check-up. It said, "She is expected to return to her post in a short time."

In Washington today, the House passed and sent to the Senate a bill appropriating 33 and a half billion dollars for the Defense Department for the next fiscal year. In approving the measure, the House defeated an amendment that would have provided an extra billion dollars for the purchase of additional long-range, intercontinental bombers. ~~The fight for the amendment was led by~~ Democratic Representative ~~Flood of Pennsylvania,~~ who warned of Russia's growing air power. ~~[illegible]~~ This is no time, he said, to "sacrifice" ~~[illegible]~~ budget.

Secretary of State Dulles testified today before the House Foreign Affairs Committee... and warned Congress against cutting the Administration's foreign aid program. Mr. Dulles said there is less danger of a general war. Russia, he said, may soon cut its armed forces. But he pointed out that this may be only to provide more manpower for agriculture and industry. It is simply, he said, to serve Russia's "continuing goal--- domination of the world."

The Senate Agriculture Committee sent its new farm bill today to the Senate floor. Like the measure passed by the House, it calls for a soil bank... but denies President Eisenhower the authority to make advance payments this year ~~under the soil bank program~~. Republican opposition centers on the provision that would establish mandatory price supports for the feed grains---rye, oats, barley and grain sorghums. Senator Aiken of Vermont charged it would increase the cost-price squeeze already hurting farmers. He threatened to recommend a presidential veto, unless the provision is dropped. Senate action on the bill is expected next week.

The Senate Finance Committee voted today against lowering the age at which disabled workers... and most women... would be eligible for retirement payments under the Social Security program. It rejected a proposal to lower the qualifying age from 65 to 62. The committee action kills two major provisions of the Democratic-sponsored bill passed last year by the House. A provision to start benefit payments to widows reaching the age of 62 was approved today.

Tonight, the Senate approved a five-billion-dollar flood insurance program. The measure would set up a federal flood insurance administration, authorized to issue up to 5-billion dollars in insurance policies. The bill now goes to the House.

Edward R. Murrow: May 10, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

Ten years ago in March, Winston Churchill showed up at Westminster College in Missouri to deliver a speech that ended an epoch in world affairs and ushered in a new one. This was at Fulton, and President Truman, as a personal sponsor, was on the platform. The epoch that closed was one of hopeful co-operation with the Soviet Union. The era that opened was the cold war. "Nobody" declared Mr. Churchill that day, "knows what Soviet Russia and its Communist international organization intend to do in the immediate future, or what are the limits, if any, to their expansive and proselytizing tendencies." He continued with ominous gravity: "It is my duty to place before you certain facts about the present position in Europe - I am sure I do not wish to, but it is my duty, I feel, to present them to you." And then he uttered the now celebrated phrase: "From Stettin in the Baltic to Trieste in the Adriatic, an iron curtain has descended across the continent."

Today at ancient Aachen in Germany, Sir Winston Churchill delivered another speech. It might be called the Fulton speech in reverse. If the new Soviet policy of friendliness to the West is sincere, he said, Russia should have a part in the unification of Europe.

Sir Winston was in Germany for the first time since he left the Potsdam conference, to take part in the British election of 1945. He was there to receive the Charlemagne ~~reward~~ Prize for services for a unified Europe. In the first two post-war years, he said, Soviet policy divided Russia from her wartime allies. "We have now been told on high Russian authority" he went on, "that it was the Stalin policy: and Stalin, who was then all-powerful, is dead. But meanwhile events moved. There followed speedily, during the Stalin policy, a reconciliation between the British Commonwealth and the United States, on the one hand, and the great mass of Western Germany on the other. This was indeed an historic event" he continued. "It led also to the formation of NATO. This treaty, in which Germany is a partner, is a solid affirmation of the unity of Europe, and of the resolve of the United States to come back across the Atlantic Ocean and take what cannot be called less than a leading part in the maintenance of it. The principle of the treaty is simple and imaginative. We all join hands together in our wish to avoid the aggressor whoever he may be.

"A new question has now been raised by the repudiation of Stalin" he said. "If it is sincere, we have a new Russia to deal with, and I do not see myself why, if this is so, the new Russia should not join in support of this solemn agreement."

"Our main theme of salvation", he declared, "should be the grand alliance of the European powers, linked with Canada, the United States and with the British Commonwealth as a member, which would take in Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, not now NATO members. I repeat, "he went on, "that the spirit of this arrangement should not exclude Russia and the East European states." He went on to suggest that by such development the unification of Germany would be more easily achieved than by rival blocks confronting each other with suspicion and hostility.

He spoke hopefully of changes that have come in Poland since Stalin was repudiated. "It may be" he said, "that other changes will follow. Czechoslovakia may recover her freedom, above all Germany may be re-united. "We must above all" he warned, "avoid violence, for the only unity then might be the unity of ashes and death. "Equally" he said, "it would be ~~feeble~~ fatal for NATO now to relax and let apathy overtake what has been achieved in the last eight years."

~~I gathered~~ It is probable that Harry Truman, who sponsored the Fulton speech, might not care to sponsor the Aachen speech. Speaking last night of Governor Harriman, he praised him for not having been taken in by Russian avowals of peaceful intent when he was Ambassador in Moscow. "He is not taken in today" Mr. Truman said, "as many of our leaders seem to be, by the smile on the face of the Kremlin" But this was not a reference to Churchill, who had not yet spoken.

However, it shows that it was easier to awaken distrust of the Soviet Union ten years ago than it will be now to dispel it. Sir Winston is now in permanent retirement at the age of eighty-one. He was in temporary retirement when he spoke at Fulton, ~~and~~ but was still a potential Prime Minister and in every sense a world leader. Today his influence is not so commanding. ~~But at Aachen he ceremoniously opened a door to the Russians, though he left it for them to demonstrate their sincerity.~~

It will not be forgotten that the Russians themselves have proposed a grand European alliance, though on the terms of linking the Eastern satellites of the Warsaw pact - that is, East Germany included - with NATO. That is not what Sir Winston had in mind. He wants the partition of Europe to end so that the partition of Germany can end.

Ted Pearson,

Churchill envisions a Grand Alliance, in which Russia may one day be associated with the West. Edmund Burke said, "A disposition to preserve... and an ability to improve... would be my standard of a statesman." Sir Winston is that, and more. Today, in Aachen, he was called "guardian of human liberty, beacon of European youth."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

THURSDAY, MAY 10, 1956
7:45--8:00 E.S.T.

This is the news:

Secretary General Hammarskjold reported to the United Nations today on his recent mission to the Middle East. Hammarskjold said, in a 10-thousand -word report to the Security Council, that the cease-fire agreements between Israel and the Arab states constituted a necessary first step toward peace. "It is too early," he said, "to say what has been achieved of substance. The value of the agreements..and thier effect..will depend first of all on the good-will and the actions taken by the governments directly concerned." Also of importance, Hammarskjold said, will be the support accorded these governments by the world community as represented by the United Nations.

Hammarskjold said he advised Israel not to resume work on its Jordan River irrigation project..to which Syria objects..and had told Egypt that it was bound by Security Council ruling to allow Israeli shipping to pass through the Suez Canal. He appealed for settlement of the Palestine problem within the framework of the United Nations --without "organizational innovation."

Reports from the Middle East tell of new border incidents. Egypt accuses Israeli troops of bayonetting to teath an Arab farmer, inside the Gaza Strip. Egypt also complains of an Israeli aircraft violating the Egyptian air space over Gaza. Israel reports that the railroad running between Tel Aviv and Beersheba was blown up last night three miles north of Beersheba..and that an Arab infiltrator fired on an Israeli patrol, south of Jersualem, near the Jordan border. An Israeli spokesman says the infiltrator was killed in an exchange of shots. Jordan says the "infiltrator" was a civilian, who lost his way and crossed the frontier by mistake. Jordan concedes he was carrying a gun.

Fighting between French and rebel forces continued today in Algeria, and the whole Department of Constintine has been placed under a state of siege. French troops are trying to hunt down the Arab guerrillas who attacked 46 villages in Eastern Algeria yesterday. In one local action, the garrison counter-attacked twelve times. Casualties are described as "heavy". One third of Algeria is now under martial law.

On Cyprus today, the British hanged two Cypriots convicted of terrorism.. in connection with the union-with Greece movement. One of the Cypriots was charged with murdering a policeman, the other with wounding a British civilian. Dispatches from Cyprus say the island is unusually calm.

In London, the government of Prime Minister Eden has agreed to a full-dress debate in the House of Commons on the mysterious disappearacne of frogman Lionel Crabb. Crabb was last seen on April 19th, in the vicinity of a Russian warship in Portsmouth harbor. The warship had brought Russia's leaders to Britain, and there is speculation that Crabb was spying on the hull of the vessel. Yesterday..in the House of Commons Eden refused to divulge details of the case, said it "would not be in the public interest." Today... under Laborite pressure..he agreed to debate the case on Monday..

In Washington today, the House passed and sent to the Senate a bill appropriating 33 and a half billion dollars for the Defense Department for the next fiscal pear In approving the measure, the House defeated an amendment that would have provided an extra billion dollars for the purchase of additional long-range, intercontinental bomers.

Secretary of State Dulles testified today before the House Foreign Affairs Committee..and warned Congress against cutting the Administration's foreign aid program. Mr. Dulles said there is less danger of a general war. Russia he said, may soon cut its armed forces. But he pointed out that this may be only to provide more manpower for agriculture and industry. It is simply, he said, to serve Russia's "continuing goal--domination of the world."

The Senate Agriculture Committee sent its new farm bill today to the Senate floor. Like the measure passed by the House, it calls for a soil bank.. but denies President Eisenhower the authority to make advance payments this year. Republican oppsotion centers on the provision that would establish mandatory price supports for the feed grains..rye, oats, barley and grain sorghums. Senator Aiken of Vermont charged it would increase the cost-price squeeze already hurting farmers. He threatened to recommend a presidential veto, unless the provision is dropped. Senate action on the bill is expected next week.

The Senate Finance Committee voted today against lowering the age at which disabled workers..and most women ..would be eligible for retirement payments.. under the Social Security program. It rejected a proposal to lower the qualifying age from 65 to 62. The committee action kills two major provisions of the Democratic - sponsored bill passed last year by the House. A provision to start benefit payments to widows reaching the age of 62 was approved today.

Tonight, the Senate approved a five-billion-dillar flood insurance program. The measure would set up a federal flood insurance administration, authorized to issue up to 5-billion dollars in insurance policies. The bill now goes to the House.

Ten years ago, in March, Winston Churchill showed up at Westminster College in Missouri to deliver a speech that ended an epoch in world affairs and ushered in a new one. This was at Fulton, and President Truman, as a personal sponsor, was on the platform. The epoch that closed was one of hopeful cooperation with the Soviet Union. The era that opened was the cold war. "Nobody" declared Mr. Chruchill that day, "knows that Soviet Russia and its Communist international organization intend to do in the immediate future, or what are the limits, if any. to their expansive and proselytizing tendencies." He continued with ominous gravity: "It is my duty to place before you certain facts about the present position in Europe - I am sure I do not wish to, but it is my duty, I feel, to present them to you." And then he uttered the now celebrated phrase: "From Stettin in the Baltic to Trieste in the Adriatic, an iron curtain has descended across the continent.

Today at ancient Aachen in Germany, Sir Winscon Churchill delivered another speech. It might be called the Fulton speech in reverse. If the new Soviet policy of friendliness to the West is sincere, he said, Russia should have a part in the unification of Europe.

Sir Winston was in Germany for the first time since he left the Potsdam conference, to take part in the British election of 1945. He was there to receive the Charlemagne Prize for services for a unified Europe. In the first two post-war years, he said, Soviet policy divided Russia from her wartime allies. "We have now been told on high Russian authority" he went on, "that it was the Stalin policy: and Stalin, who was then all-powerful, is dead. But meanwhile events moved. There followed speedily, during the Stalin policy a reconciliation between the British Commonwealth and the United States, on the one hand, and the great mass of Western Germany on the other. This was indeed an historic event." he continued. "It led also to the formation of NATO. This treaty, in which Germany is a partner, is a solid affirmation of the unity of Europe, and of the resolve of the United States to come back across the Atlantic Ocean and take what cannot be called less than a leading part. in the maintenance of it. The principle of the treaty is simple and imaginative. We all join hands together in our wish to avoid the aggressor, whoever he may be.

" A new question has now been raised by the repudiation of Stalin" he said. "If it is sincere we have a new Russia to deal with, and I do not see myself why, if this is so, the new Russia should not join in support of this solemn agreement."

"Our main theme of salvation", he declared, "should be the grand alliance of the European powers, linked with Canada, the United States and with the British Commonwealth as a member, which would take in Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, not now NATO members. I repeat, "he went on, "that the spirit of this arrangement should not exclude Russia and the East European states." He went on to suggest that by such development the unification of Germany would be more easily achieved than by rival blocks confronting each other with suspicion and hostility.

He spoke hopefully of changes that have come in Poland since Stalin was repudiated. "It may be" he said, "that other changes will follow. Czechoslovakia may recover her freedom, above all Germany may be re-united. "We must above all" he warned, "avoid violence, for the only unity then might be the unity of ashes and death. "Equally" he said, "it would be fatal for NATO now to relax and let apathy overtake that has been achieved in the last eight years."

It is probable that Harry Truman, who sponsored the Fulton speech, might not care to sponsor the Aachen speech. Speaking last night of Gevernor Harriman, he praised him for not having been taken in by Russian avowals of peaceful intent when he was Ambassador in Moscow. "He is not taken in today Mr. Truman said, "as many of our leaders seem to be, by the smile on the face of the Kremlin" But this was not a reference to Churchill, who had not yet spoken.

However, it shows that it was easier to awaken distrust of the Soviet Union ten years ago that it will be now to dispel it. Sir Winston is now in permanent retirement at the age of eighty-one. He was in temporary retirement when he spoke at Fulton, but was still a potential Prime Minister and in every sense a world leader. Today his influence is not so commanding.

It will not be forgotten that the Russians themselves have proposed a grand European alliance, though on the terms of linking the Eastern satellites of the Warsaw pact - that is, East Germany included - with NATO. That is not what Sir Winston had in mind. He wants the partition of Europe to end so that the partition of Germany can end.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Ted Pearson.

PEARSON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: Churchill envisions a Grand Alliance, in which Russia may one day be associated with the West. Edmund Burke said, "A dispostion to preserve ..and the ability to improve..would by my standard of a statesman." Sir Winston is that and more. Today, In Aachen, he was called "guardian of human liberty, beacon of European youth."

Goodnight and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Fri., May 11, 1956

This is the news:

The Moscow radio says Russia and Great Britain have exchanged formal notes on the mysterious disappearance of British frogman Lionel Crabb. Crabb was last seen in Portsmouth Harbor, near the Russian cruiser that recently brought Soviet leaders to Britain for a 10-day visit. There has been speculation he was spying on the hull of the vessel. So far, Prime Minister Eden has neither confirmed nor denied ~~declined to confirm or deny~~ these reports, and the subject comes up for debate in the House of Commons on Monday. The Russian note... broadcast tonight... politely asks Britain to explain Crabb's presence in Portsmouth Harbor. It points out that Russian sailors saw him. According to Moscow, Britain has answered the Russian note... saying that the frogman's activities were carried out without permission of the British Government. ~~The Russian press accused Britain today of "shameful underwater espionage". Pravda said the affair "cannot help provoking just indignation on the part of the public of both countries."~~

CA 8-6000 Bonnybridge

Russia announced today that it has revoked a series of laws, tying Soviet workers to their jobs. A new decree says that, henceforth, a worker may quit his job on a farm... or in a factory... without penalty of imprisonment. All persons serving time for having left their jobs without government permission are released and all pending prosecutions canceled. Workers can still be fined for what the decree calls "unjustified absence".

Hungarian troops today began tearing down the physical Iron Curtain along the frontier between Austria and Hungary. The Communist government of Hungary recently announced that the mine fields, watch towers and wire barricades would be removed as "a gesture of coexistence." The dismantling process is expected to take several months. A general election will be held in Austria on Sunday.

In Paris, a joint communique has been issued marking the end of formal talks between Marshal Tito of Yugoslavia and French leaders. The communique advocates step-by-step disarmament... and says Yugoslavia favors all efforts for a "liberal" solution of the Algerian problem. (I should like to discuss Tito's visit further in a few minutes).

The French Communist Party today issued a call for strikes and demonstrations against the "unjust" war in Algeria. This is an about-face. Only four weeks ago, Communist members of the National Assembly helped vote Premier Mollet emergency powers to cope with the Algerian situation.

On Cyprus, the Nationalist underground says it has executed two British soldiers in reprisal for the hanging of two Greek Cypriots yesterday. British authorities say the two soldiers have been missing for some time and that their fate is unknown. The underground claimed several months ago it was holding one of the men prisoner. In announcing the retaliatory action, Greek Cypriot leaflets said the union-with-Greece movement holds no enmity toward British troops but "we are determined to be free." The two Cypriots were hanged yesterday for murder and attempt to murder. Today, the Cypriot capital of Nicosia remained in mourning. Factories were empty. Nearly all Greek shops were closed. A Cypriot... [redacted] distributing underground leaflets... was shot and killed by a British soldier. He had been accosted, and started to run.

~~The British colony of Aden... in Southwestern Arabia... was the scene today of another independence demonstration. A car in which a colonial official was riding was stoned.~~

~~Results of municipal elections throughout Britain show a swing toward the Labour Party. So far, the Labourites have counted a gain of~~

→

264 ~~[illegible]~~. Voting in several hundred communities will be continued tomorrow.

West Germany said today that it will go on sharing the cost of maintaining Allied troops on its territory, until the build-up of its own armed forces. The form of the West German contribution... and the amount... remains to be decided.

Here in New York today, United Nations Secretary General Hammarskjold said he is "not willing" to recommend any next step toward securing peace in the Middle East. Hammarskjold told a news conference, "I feel strongly that, more than ever, it is in the hands of the governments of the region." He said he does not regard the continuing border incidents as a major violation of the cease-fire agreements. An arms race, he said, does not constitute the greatest danger. Hammarskjold feels the basic danger lies in those factors that cause such a race.

In Washington, the Air Force chief of staff... General Twining... said today that carrier-based planes could make only a small contribution in any strategic air war with Russia. He told a Senate committee; "We must be realistic about such factors as the probable location of the carriers, as well as the amount of striking power they could contribute." But he said he believes the military budget [redacted] proposed by the Administration is sufficient to deter an enemy attack "this year." Next year, he said, more money and weapons will be needed."

A recent Supreme Court ruling came under attack today in the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee. Democratic Senator Eastland and Republican Senator McCarthy decried the decision giving the Federal Government sole jurisdiction in sedition cases. They said states should also have jurisdiction. McCarthy said: [redacted] "It is not that members of the Supreme Court "knowingly" helped the Communist cause. It's just that they don't understand what they are doing." Eastland said the trouble is too many justices are "politicians".

Edward R. Murrow: May 11, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

The visit of President Tito to Paris is to be followed by his visit to the Kremlin early next month. And if the United States wants him, Tito would be glad to come to this country too. In the present state of the changing world, it pays for heads of state to get about. Neutralists - and in this category Tito is second in eminence only to Nehru of India - find it particularly useful to travel. They aren't to be mistaken for traveling salesmen, or traveling buyers, either. Neutralism is a particular profession, of increasing respectability. By being on good terms with both camps in the world struggle for power, the neutralist can collect benefits from both, more benefits, in some cases, than if he joined up with either side. Tito really ranks ahead of Nehru for results obtained, for he has worked the Soviet side of the street, for bigger concessions than the Kremlin ever has given anyone else, and at the same time, his brand of communism has survived economically, through the handouts of the capitalist United States.

Undoubtedly Tito's cordial reception in Paris can be justified by legitimate French interests. One may be North Africa. Tito recently visited Colonel Nasser in Egypt, and the French presumably were trying to find out if something can be done to lessen Nasser's enthusiasm for France's Arab peoples. But Tito's own best reason for coming to Paris is the fact that he is shortly going to Moscow. That is, he needs to identify himself as a bona fide neutralist before he goes to the Soviet capital. Not only will it help him in world opinion, it will help him still more in Moscow. It will help him say "No" when his Soviet hosts try to persuade him that he is the prodigal son at last returned to his true home.

The new look in Soviet policy will have one of its greatest tests in its effect on Tito. More than is generally recognized, a great part of the softening of Soviet policy - the demotion of Stalin included - has been intended to undo the actions that drove Tito out of the Soviet fold. The release of men imprisoned in satellite countries and the dismissal of top hatchet men in these countries have been ordered for the effect on Tito. No matter what the charge was against the victims, they were punished for being Tito-ists. The techniques used in the purge trials, like brain-washings and confessions, have been ordered abolished, because they were used against Tito-ists. The Cominform which expelled Tito,then tried to ruin him, has been publicly disbanded. The large balances owing Jugoslavia by satellite countries, are being paid, so that Tito has quietly collected much more from the East of late, than from the West.

The current doctrine in Administration circles in this country is that the softer Soviet policies are the result of Western armament. But that is only part of the story. When the present Soviet leaders surveyed their situation after the death of Stalin they saw that to establish their power internally they would have to undo some of the major mistakes of Stalin. But only one of these mistakes was that he so aroused the West that it built up its present massive might. Another was that he drove Tito out of the family. This was an ideological blunder that hurt communist theorists as much as anything done since the war.

So when Bulganin and Khrushchev went to Belgrade they put on the most spectacular exhibition of eating crow that has been witnessed in modern times. And it was followed by reversals of policy that have weakened Communist overlordship in satellite countries. The Kremlin leaders now see Poland shaking off some of its chains, and Hungary, Bulgaria and Rumania taking deeper breaths and flexing their muscles. They may well wonder if they have gone too far, as well as too fast. But now the hour of reckoning with Tito approaches. He set his price. He made it high, but the Kremlin appears to have paid it in full. And Tito will find out whether he has sold himself right back into the family.

That is not to say that the Kremlin will insist on Tito throwing away his neutralist banners and substituting the hammer and the sickle. Tito may be more useful to the Kremlin if he still looks like a neutral and the neutrals and the West so consider him. But after all that the Russians have invested in Tito, in shame, and confessions of wrong-doing, in lessened prestige and hard cash, they must feel sure that they have brought him back.

I repeat that one reason Tito is glad to be in Paris - and would ~~XXX~~ like to come to the United States - is because he needs the West if he is to go on collecting benefits from the East - just as he needs the East to have continued success with the West. But now the Kremlin has done all that seems humanly possible to meet Tito's terms. They couldn't raise from the dead the Tito-ists Stalin ordered executed. But short of that they have gone most of the way. Now Tito may well be worried, not by his failure, but by the very magnitude of his success.

In dealing with Tito, Stalin made a costly mistake. The new rulers of Russia have partially corrected that mistake, in Plutarch's phrase, "by suasion, not by force of arms." But Tito remains uncommitted. In playing East against West, he is merely following the advice of William Penn, who said, "A wise neuter joins neither, but uses both."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

FRIDAY, MAY 11, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

The Moscow radio says Russia and Great Britain have exchanged formal notes on the mysterious disappearance of British forgmen Lionel Crabb. Crabb was last seen in Portsmouth Harbor, near the Russian cruiser that recently brought Soviet leaders to Britain for a 10-day visit. There was been speculation he was spying on the hull of the vessel. So far, Prime Minister Eden has neither confirmed nor denied these reports and the subject comes up for debate in the House of Commons on Monday. The Russian note..broadcast tonight..politely asks Britain to explain Crabb's presence in Portsmouth Harbor. It points out that Russian sailors saw him. According to Moscow, Britain has answered the Russian note.. saying that the frogman's activities were carried out without permission of the British government.

Russia announced today that it has revoked a series of laws, tying Soviet workers to their jobs. A new decree says that, henceforth, a worker may quit his job on a farm..or in a factory..without penalty of imprisonment. All persons serving time for having left their jobs without government permission are released and all pending prosecutions canceled. Workers can still be fined for what the decree calls "unjustified absence."

Hungarian troops today began tearing down the physical Iron Curtain along the frontier between Austria and Hungary. The Communist government of Hungary recently announced that the mine fields, watch towers and wire barricades would be removed as "a gesture of coexistence." The dismantling process is expected to take several months. A general election will be held in Austria on Sunday.

In Paris, a joint communique has been issued marking the end of formal talks between Marshal Tito of Yugoslavia and French leaders. The communique advocated step-by-step disarmament..and says Yugoslavia favors all efforts for a "liberal" solution of the Algerian problem. (I should like to discuss Tito's visit further in a few minutes.)

The French Communist Party today issued a call for strikes and demonstrations against the "unjust" was in Algeria. This is an about-face, Only four weeks ago, Communist members of the National Assembly helped vote Premier Mollet emergency powers to cope with the Algerian situation.

On Cyprus, the Nationalist underground says it has executed two British soldiers in reprisal for the hanging of two Greek Cypriots yesterday. British authorities say the two soldiers have been missing for some time and that their fate is unknown. The underground claimed several months ago it was holding one of the men prisoner. In announcing the retaliatory action, Greek Cypriot leaflets said the union-w th Greece movements holds no enmity toward British troops but "we are determined to be free." The two Cypriots were hanged yesterday for murder and attempt to murder. Today, the Cypriot capital of Nicosia remained in mourning. Factories were empty. Nearly all Greek shops were closed. A Cypriot.. distributing underground leaflets..was shot and killed by a British soldier. He had been accosted, and started to run.

Here in New York today, United Nations Secretary General Hammarskjold said he is "not willing" to recommend any next step toward securing peace in the Middle East. Hammarskjold told a news conference, "I feel strongly that, more than ever, it is in the hands of the governments of the region." He said he does not regard the continuing border incidents as a major violation of the cease fire agreements. An arms race, he said, does not constitute the greatest danger. Hammarskjold feels the basic danger lies in those factors that cause such a race.

In Washington, the Air Force chief of staff..General Twining..said today that carrier - based planes could make only a small contribution in any strategic air war with Russia. He told a Senate committee; "We must be realistic about such factors as the probably location of the carriers, as well as the amount of striking power they could contribute." But he said he believes the military budget propseed by the Amministration is sufficient to deter an enemy action "This year." Next year, he said, more money and weapons will be needed."

A recent Supreme Court ruling came underattack today in the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee. Democratic Seantor Eastland and Republican Senator McCarthy decried the decision giving the Federal Government sole jurisdiction. McCarthy said: "It is not that members of the Supreme Court "knowingly" helped the Communist cause. It's just that they don't understand what they are doing." Eastland said the trouble is too muny justices are "politicians.

The visit of President Tito to Paris is to be followed by his visit to the Kremlin early next month. And if the United States wants him, Tito would be glad to come to this country too. In the present state of the changing world, it pays for heads of state to get about. Neautralists.-and in this category Tito is second in eminence only to Nehru of India - find it particularly useful to travel. They aren't to be mistaken for traveling salesmen, or traveling buyers, either. Neautralism is a particular profession of increasing respectability. By being on good terms with both camps in the world struggle for power, the neautralist can collect benefits from both, more benefits, in some cases, than if he joined up with either side. Tito really ranks ahead of Nehru for results obtained, for he was worked the Soviet side of the street, for bigger concessions than the Kremlin ever has given anyone else, and at the same time his brand of communism has survived economically through the handouts of the capitalist United States.

Undoubtedly Tito's cordial reception in Paris can be justified by the legitimate French interests. One may be North Africa. Tito recently visited Colonel Nasser in Egypt, and the French presumably were trying to find out if something can be done to lessen Nasser's enthusiasm for France's Arab peoples. But Tito's own best reason for coming to Paris is the fact that he is shortly going to Moscow. That is, he needs to identify himself as a bona-fide neautralist before he goes to the Soviet capital. Not only will it help him in world opinion, it will help him still more in Moscow. It will help him say " No" when his Soviet hosts try to persuade him that he is a prodigal son at last returned to his true home.

The new look in Soviet policy will have one of its greatest tests in its effect on Tito. More than is generally recognized, a great part of the softening of Soviet policy - the demotion of Stalin included - has been intended to undo the actions that drove Tito out of the Soviet fold. The release of men imprisoned in satellite countries and the dismissal of top hatchet men in these countries have been ordered for the effect on Tito. No matter what the charge was against the victims, they were punished for being Tito-ists. The techniques used in the purge trials, like brain - washings and confessions, have been ordered abolished, because they were used against Tito-ists. The cominform which expelled Tito, then tried to ruin him, has been publicly disbanded. The large balances owing Jugoslavia by satellite countries, are being paid, so that Tito has quietly collected much more from the East of late, than from the West.

The current doctrine in Administattion circles in this country is that the softer Soviet policies are the result of Western armament. But that is only part of the story. When the present Soviet leaders surveyed their situation after the death of Stalin they saw that to establish their power internally they would have to undo some of the major mistakes of Stalin. . Bot only one of these mistakes was that he so aroused the West that it built up its present massive might. Another was that he drove Tito out of the family. This was an ideological blunder that hurt communist theorits as much as anything done since the war.

So when Bulganin and Khrushchev went to Belgrade they put on the most spectacular exhibition of eating crow that has been witnessed in modern times. And it was followed by reversals of policy that have weakened Communist over-lordship in satellite countries. The Kremlin leaders now see Poland shaking off some of its chains, and Hungary, Bulgaria and Rumania taking deeper breaths and flexing their muscles. They may well wonder if they have gone too far, as well as too fast. But now the hour or reckoning with Tito approaches. He set his price. He made it hig , but the Kremlin appears to have paid it in full. And Tito will find out whether he has sold himself right back into the family.

That is not to say that the Kremlin will insist on Tito throwing away his neautralist banners and substituting the hammer and sickle. Tito may be more useful to the Kremlin if he still looks like a neautral and the neautrals and the west so consider him. But after all that the Russians have invested in Tito, in shame, and confessions of wrong-doing, in lessened prestige and hard cash, they must feel sure that they have brought him back.

I repeat that one reason Tito is glad to be in Paris - and would like to come to the United States - is because he needs the West if he is to go on collecting benefits from the East - just as he needs the Easst to have continued success with the West. But now the Kremlin has done all that seems humanly possible to meet Tito's terms. They couldn't raise from the dead the Tito-ists Stalin ordered executed. But short of that, hey have gone most of the way. Now Tito may well be worried, not by his failure, but by the very magnitude of his success.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: In dealing with Tito, Stalin made a costly mistake. The new rulers of Russia have partially corrected that mistake, in Plutarch's phrase, "by suasion, not by force of arms." But Tito remains uncommitted. In playing East against West, he is merely following the advice of William Penn, who said, "A wise neuter joins neither, but uses both."

Goodnight and Good Luck.

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

MONDAY, MAY 14, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M.,E.S.T.

THIS IS THE NEWS:

Russia announced today that it is cutting its armed forces by a million 200-thousand men. Sixty-three divisions will be disbanded, including three Air Force divisions and 30-thousand men stationed in East Germany. And 375 ships of the Russian Navy will be put in reserve. The Soviet announcement said there will be a proportional reduction in the military budget..and that all reductions will be in effect by May of next year. The announcement said these cuts are in addition to the 640-thousand men demobilized a year ago. It said Russia took this action "with the desire of playing a new part in the matter if disarmament and insuring peace." And it called on other countries, including the United States, to follow Russia's example.

The Russian move was expected. It had been suggested that if Russia cut its armed forces, it would free manpower for industry and agriculture..and have considerable propaganda value. The Soviet annnuncement today acknowledges that the demobilization "will play a great new part in the further raising of all branches of the national economy of the U.S. S. R."

Secretary of Defense Wilson said in Washington today that American airpower is greater than Russia's..and that he thinks it will stay that way. Wilson told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that air power is not necessarily measured in the number of aircraft. The comparison, he said, should be made in terms of quality and combat readiness. He warned Congress not to cut the Administration's military assistance program. Any sizeable cut, he said, would be a serious risk in the defense of the free world. Admiral Radford, chairman of the joint chiefs of staff, also testified..and expreseed the same views. Radford said, we must not fall into the Soviet trap. There is no question, he said, that more modern and efficient weapons are being added to the Soviet arsenal "at a staady if not increased rate."

In London today, Preme Minister Eden again refused to give the House of Commons the inside story of what happened to British frogamn Lionel Crabb. The frogman has not been seen since he was observed in Portsmouth Harbor, near the Russian warship that brought Bulganin and Khrushchev to England for a state visit. It is widely held that Crabb was spying on the Soviet vessel, but Eded refused last week to confirm or deny these reports. In the debate in the House of Commons today, Labor Leader Hugh Gaitskell said he accepts Eden's statement that the frogman's mission was not authorized by any government minister. But, said Gaitskell, the affair does reveal "a very grave lack of control." He demanded to know "at what sort of level" a decision of this kind is taken.

Earlier..in a debate on the Cyprus question..the Laborites attacked Eden's tough policy toward the island colony as "irresponsible folly". The deputy leader of the Labor Party, James Griffiths, said negotiations with the Greek Cypriots must be resumed and archbishop Makarios recalled from exile to attend the talks. He also proposed a firm declarations applying to Cyprus the principles of self-determination. Griffiths said the conservative government had no alternative. "If they do not adopt these suggestions", he said, "the sooner they make way for another government the better."

On Cyprus today, a Greek Cypriot was shot and killed by British troops making a security search. And a 15-year-old boy was sentenced to ten years in prison for possessinn of a home-made bomb.

President Heuss of West Germany arrived in Athens today for a state visit. no formal talks are scheduled, but there will be an exhcange of views.

French Premier Mollet and Foreign Minister Pineau will fly to Moscow tomorrow for talks with Soviet leaders. Today..on the eve of their departure... Russian Premier Bulganin opposed the French plan to link disarmament with German unification. In an interview with the French newspaper LeMonde, Bulganin said it would be "wrong" to make disarmement dependent on a solution of complicated international problems, such as the German question. Solution of the disarmament problem, he said, cannot be delayed. He called it "the topmost problem in present world politics. Bulganin said there are no "insurmountable obstacles" to friendship between the Soviet Union and France. Russia, hs said, would like to see stepped - up trade with France and a settlement of the Algerian problem.

MURROW: Each time this reporter is fortunate enough to come to Hollywood he is also fortunate enough to go and visit one of Hollywood's most distinguished producers, Mr. Samuel Goldwyn, and today I persuaded Mr. Goldwyn to come down to the studio.

Samuel, since I saw you last you've been to the Orient, haven't you?

GOLDWYN:Yes, sir! And it was very exciting. I think everyone, sooner or later, should make a trip to the Orient and see how the rest of the world lives.

MURROW: Much television out there now?

GOLDWYN: Well, they're two hundred thousand television sets in Japan. They're increasing at the rate of about ten percent.

MURROW: Well, Sam, I think you were the first to predict, and I think you did it to me, to predict a marriage between television and the movies. How is it working out?

GOLDWYN: Well, when I first made that prediction they were just flirting with one another. After that they started going steady and right now they're engaged. I would say that marriage is just around the corner and I think it will be a happy one. Like every marriage, it's not going to be all smooth sailing, but it whould be a long and a fruitful one.

MURROW: Well, Mr. Goldwyn, you helped to create the movie code. What changes have occurred since that time and what changes should be made:

GOLDWYN:The only code changes in the past twenty-five years have been very small. Since the code was originally drawn up the world has chanced and the code should recognize those changes. However, we don't have enough time at our disposal today to go into detail. That would take much too ong.

MURROW: Well, Sam, how is the movie business doing in competition with television?

GOLDWYN: People would not leave their television sets to see a bad picture. What used to be the movie habit has been replaced by the TV habit, but fine pictures are doing greater business today than before. I had that experience in "Guys and Dolls", which is doing far more business than "The Best Years of our "Lives" and that was something of the old- time greats.

MURROW: Sam, what about (unintelligible --drowned out)

GOLDWYN: The next picture is going to be something really exciting, but right now I don't know what it it going to be, Ed, any more than you know what yo u're going to do next year, and I find (drowned out)..that way I just said, then I will go to it.

MURROW: (drowned out)..you're not being coy (drowned out)..of television moving more and more in the direction of live or film prestations?

GOLDWYN: I really believe (drowned out) film.

MURROW (drowned out..Goldwyn propaganda (drowned out)

MURROW: Why doesn't seomeone make .....(drowned out) cavalcade (drowned out)

GOLDWYN Ed, every time youstart a picture you feel it is going to be an epic. (laughter) Every time!

MURROW: That happens every time, does it?

GOLDWYN Every time!

MURROW : (unintcligible) ..disappointment

GOLDWYN: Well, there are so many disappointments that it's really heart rendering.

MURROW: Sam, I understand that within a matter of weeks the Goldwyn creative writing award will be announced. Will you tell us a little about that?

GOLDWYN: Two years ago I set up an annual award for the best creative writing submitted by students at the UCLA. They have a fine School of Dramatic Arts and I want to give the young people there an incentive for good writing. The first prize in one thousand dollars. and the second prize is two hundred and fifty. There's a lot of opportunity opened up to do business. You have to be good to win. The judges, in addition to Professor (unintelligible) McGowan, and Moss Hart, President of the Authors League of America; F. U. Herbert, National Chairman of the Writers Guild of America and George Seaton, President of the Academy of Mortion Picutre Arts and science, and they're all mighty distinguished writers themselves. The award will be announced on May the thirty-first.

MURROW:Well, he'll be a furtunate man or woman, whicever it is.

GOLDWYN: Why don't you try for the award? (laughter)

MURROW: I can't write well enough, Sam.

GOLDWYN: Well, you'll do till somebody better comes along. Say, by the way, Ed, you're still my love and I still say you're the greatest of all the great.

MURROW: Well, thank you very much, Sam. Tell me, is there a shortage of writers in the movies these days?

GOLDWYN: Well, we just could use about a few thousand more.

MURROW: What!.... what..what's the essential quality for a man to write succesfully for the movies?

GOLDWYN: First he has to get an original idea, but it seems to be most of the witters today have good memories. If some of them would forget what they read in the past and do something original we'd all be happier.

MURROW: And there is a real shortage of original material?

MURROW: Never was any greater shortage than there is today.

MURROW: You were speaking earlier of good pictures doing better. Are we going to get more big pictures?

GOLDWYN: What can ..I don't know what you mean by "big pictures."

MURROW: Well, I suppose I mean expensive, but that isn't the right thing to say, is it?

GOLDWYN: There is a little picture called "Marty" that won the Academy Award last year. That cost three hundred thousand dollars. On the other hand I finished a picture costing four-and-a-half-million. I think...five-and-a-half million! ..I think they're smarter than I am. (laughter)

MURROW: Do you see any trend in the movies that are now scheduled for production?

GOLDWYN: Ed, if I knew as muchas I..what I don't know I'd be the genius of the world (laughter)

MURROW: But you don't see any pattern in what's being (interruption)

GOLDWYN There is no formula no more than there is in your work.

MURROW: And that's a good thing, don't you think?

GOLDWYN I believe it's the right thing.

MURROW: Well, Sam. we have almost twenty seconds left. You see, I cut the news short tonight in order that we could have plenty of time to talk.

GOLDWYN: It's very sweet of you!

MURROW: ...and I want to use those fifteen seconds to say to you that you have given to me and to millions of people in this country a great deal of pleasure, stimulation and, in some of your pictures, inspiration and it's a great privilege to have a chance to sit here and talk with you.

GOLDWYN: Well, you're very sweet and you stimulate me every time I even talk to you.

MURROW: Thank you, Sam!

GOLDWYN: Thank you!

MURROW: This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: Nobody knows Hollywood and the art of making motion pictures like Sam Goldwyn. It's a strange town. Walter Duranty once said, "Iowa comes here and goes crazy." Fred Allen defined Hollywood as a placewhere people from Iowa mistake each other for movie stars. "It is no place for a professional comedian," he said. "The amateur competition is too great." Goodnight and Good Luck.

CBS RADIO DIVISION

EDWARD R. MURROW

Monday, May 14, 1956
7:45-8:00 p.m.

ANNOUNCER: ..... Each time this reporter is fortunate enough to come to Hollywood he is also fortunate enough to go and visit one of Hollywood's most distinguished producers, - Mr. Samuel Goldwyn, and today I persuaded Mr. Goldwyn to come down to the studio.

Samuel, since I saw you last you've been to the Orient, haven't you?

GOLDWYN: Yes, sir! And it was very exciting. I think everyone, sooner or later, should make a trip to the Orient and see how the rest of the world lives.

MURROW: Much television out there now?

GOLDWYN: Well, they're two hundred thousand television sets in Japan. They're increasing at the rate of about ten percent.

MURROW: Well, Sam, I think you were the first to predict, and I think you did it to me, to predict a marriage between television and the movies. How is it working out?

GOLDWYN: Well, when I first made that prediction they were just flirting with one another. After that they started going steady and right now they're engaged. I would say that marriage is just around the corner and I think it will be a happy one. Like every marriage, it's not going to be all smooth sailing, but it should be a long and fruitful one.

MURROW: Well, Mr. Goldwyn, you helped to create the movie code. What changes have occurred since that time and what changes should be made?

GOLDWYN: The only code changes in the past twenty-five years have been very small. Since the code was originally drawn up the world has changed and the code should recognize those changes. However, we don't have enough time at our disposal today to go into detail. That would take much too long.

MURROW: Well, Sam, how is the movie business doing in competition with television?

GOLDWYN: People would not leave their television sets to see a bad picture. What used to be the movie habit has been replaced by TV habit, but fine pictures are doing greater business today than before. I had that experience in "Guys and Dolls," which is doing far more business than "The Best Years of our Life" and that was something of the old-time greats.

MURROW: Sam, what about (unintelligible-drowned out by interference) .....

GOLDWYN: The next picture is going to be something really exciting, but right now I don't know what it is going to be, Ed, any more than you know what you're going to do next year, and I find (drowned out) ..... the way I just said, then I will go to it.

MURROW: (drowned out) ..... you're not being coy (drowned out) ..... of television moving more and more in the direction of live or film presentations?

GOLDWYN: I really believe (drowned out) ..... film. (drowned out) .....

MURROW: (drowned out) ...../GOLDWYN: propaganda (drowned out)

MURROW: Why doesn't someone make (drowned out) cavalcade (drowned-out). (following portion impossible to pick-up. Recording defective) (? ? ? ?)

GOLDWYN: Ed, every time you start a picture you feel it is going to be an epic. (laughter) Every time!

MURROW: That happens every time, does it?

GOLDWYN: Every time! Every time!

MURROW: (cannot pick up) ..... disappointment.

GOLDWYN: Well, there are so many disappointments that it's really heart rendering.

MURROW: Sam, I understand that within a matter of weeks the Goldwyn creative writing award will be announced. Will you tell us a little about that?

GOLDWYN: Two years ago I set up an annual award for the best creative writing submitted by students at the UCLA. They have a fine School of Dramatic Arts and I want to give the young people there an incentive for good writing. The first prize is one thousand dollars and the second prize is two hundred and fifty. There's a lot of opportunity opened up to do business. You have to be good to win. The judges, in addition to Professor (unintelligible) McGowan(?), and Moss Hart, President of the Authors League of America; F. U. Herbert(?), National Chairman of the Writers Guild of America and George Seaton, President of the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Science, and they're all mighty distinguished writers themselves. The award will be announced ON May the thirty-first.

MURROW: Well, he'll be a fortunate man or woman, whichever it is.

GOLDWYN: Why don't you try for the award? (laughter)

MURROW: I can't write well enough, Sam.

GOLDWYN: Well, you'll do till somebody better comes along. Say, by the way, Ed, you'restill my love and I still say you're the greatest of all the great.

MURROW: Well, thank you very much, Sam. Tell me, is there a shortage of writers in the movies these days?

GOLDWYN: Well, we just could use about a few thousand more.

MURROW: Mmm-mm! What ... what's the essential quality for a man to write successfully for the movies?

GOLDWYN: First he has to get an original idea, but it seems to be most of the writers today have good memories. If some of them would forget what they read in the past and do something original we'd all be happier.

MURROW: And there is a real shortage of original material?

GOLDWYN: Never was any greater shortage than there is today.

MURROW: You were speaking earlier of good picture doing better. Are we going to get more big pictures?

GOLDWYN: What can ... I don't know what you mean by "big pictures."

MURROW: Well, I suppose I mean expensive, but that isn't the right thing to say, is it?

GOLDWYN: There is a little picture called "Marty" that won the Academy Award last year. That cost three hundred thousand dollars. On the other hand I finished a picture costing four-and-a-half million. I think ... five-and-a-half million!... I think they're smarter than I am. (laughter)

MURROW: Do you see any trend in the movies that are now scheduled for production?

GOLDWYN: Ed, if I knew as much as I ...what I don't know I'd be the genius of the world. (laughter)

MURROW: But you don't see any pattern in what's being ..... (interruption)

GOLDWYN: There is no formula no more than there is in your work.

MURROW: And that's a good thing, don't you think?

GOLDWYN: I believe it's the right thing.

MURROW: Well, Sam, we have almost twenty seconds left. You see, I cut the news short tonight in order that we could have plenty of time to talk .....

GOLDWYN: It's very sweet of you!

MURROW: .....and I want to use those fifteen seconds to say to you that you have given to me and to millions of people in this country a great deal of pleasure, stimulation and, in some of your pictures, inspiration and it's a great privilege to have a chance to sit here and talk with you.

GOLDWYN: Well, you're very sweet and you stimulate me every time I even talk to you.

MURROW: Thank you, Sam!

GOLDWYN: Thank you!

MURROW: This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with "The Word for Today."

Ed.trans.-A.A.Cardiff 30)

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

MONDAY, MAY 14, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M.,E.S.T.

THIS IS THE NEWS:

Russia announced today that it is cutting its armed forces by a million 200-thousand men. Sixty-three divisions will be disbanded, including three Air Force divisions and 30-thousand men stationed in Fast Germany. And 375 ships of the Russian Navy will be put in reserve. The Soviet announcement said there will be a proportional reduction in the military budget..and that all reductions will be in effect by May of next year. The announcement said these cuts are in addition to the 640-thousand men demobilized a year ago. It said Russia took this action "with the desire of playing a new part in the matter if disarmament and insuring peace." And it called on other countries, including the United States, to follow Russia's example.

The Russian move was expected. It had been suggested that if Russia cut its armed forces, it would free manpower for industry and agriculture..and have considerable propaganda value. The Soviet annnuncement today acknowledges that the demobilization "will play a great new part in the further raising of all branches of the national economy of the U.S. S. R."

Secretary of Defense Wil on said in Washin ton today that American airpower is greater than Russia's..and that he thinks it will stay that way. Wilson told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that air power is not necessarily measured in the number of aircraft. The comparison, he said, should be made in terms of quality and combat readiness. He warned Congress not to cut the Administration's military assistance program. Any sizeable cut, he said, would be a serious risk in the defense of the free world. Admiral Radford, chairman of the joint chiefs of staff, also testified..and expreseed the same views. Radford said, we must not fall into the Soviet trap. There is no question, he said, that more modern and efficient weapons are being added to the Soviet arsenal "at a staady if not increased rate."

In London today, Preme Minister Eden again refused to give the House of Commons the inside story of what happened to British frogamn Lionel Crabb. The frogman has not been seen since he was observed in Portsmouth Harbor, near the Russian warship that brought Bulganin and Khrushchev to England for a state visit. It is widely held that Crabb was spying on the Soviet vessel, but Eded refused last week to confirm or deny these reports. In the debate in the House of Commons today, Labor Leader Hugh Gaitskell said he accepts Eden's statement that the frogman's mission was not authorized by any government minister. But, said Gaitskell, the affair does reveal "a very grave lack of control." He demanded to know "at what sort of level" a decision of this kind is taken.

Earlier..in a debate on the Cyprus question..the Laborites attacked Eden's tough policy toward the island colony as "irresponsible folly". The deputy leader of the Labor Party, James Griffiths, said negotiations with the Greek Cypriots must be resumed and archbishop Makarios recalled from exile to attend the talks. He also proposed a firm declarations applying to Cyprus the principles of self-determination. Griffiths said the conservative government had no alternative. "If they do not adopt these suggestions", he said, "the sooner they make way for another government the better."

On Cyprus today, a Greek Cypriot was shot and killed by British troops making a security search. And a 15-year-old boy was sentenced to ten years in prison for possessinn of a home-made bomb.

President Heuss of West Germany arrived in Athens today for a state visit. no formal talks are scheduled, but there will be an exhcange of views.

French Premier Mollet and Foreign Minister Pineau will fly to Moscow tomorrow for talks with Soviet leaders. Today..on the eve of their departure... Russian Premier Bulganin opposed the French plan to link disarmament with German unification. In an interview with the French newspaper LeMonde, Bulganin said it would be "wrong" to make disarmement dependent on a solution of complicated international problems, such as the German question. Solution of the disarmament problem, he said, cannot be delayed. He called it "the topmost problem in present world politics. Bulganin said there are no "insurmountable obstacles" to friendship between the Soviet Union and France. Russia, hs said, would like to see stepped - up trade with France and a settlement of the Algerian problem.

MURROW: Each time this reporter is fortunate enough to come to Hollywood he is also fortunate enough to go and visit one of Hollywood's most distinguished producers, Mr. Samuel Goldwyn, and today I persuaded Mr. Goldwyn to come down to the studio.

Samuel, since I saw you last you've been to the Orient, haven't you?

GOLDWYN:Yes, sir! And it was very exciting. I think everyone, sooner or later, should make a trip to the Orient and see how the rest of the world lives.

MURROW: Much television out there now?

GOLDWYN: Well, they're two hundred thousand television sets in Japan. They're increasing at the rate of about ten percent.

MURROW: Well, Sam, I think you were the first to predict, and I think you did it to me, to predict a marriage between television and the movies. How is it working out?

GOLDWYN: Well, when I first made that prediction they were just flirting with one another. After that they started going steady and right now they're engaged. I would say that marriage is just around the corner and I think it will be a happy one. Like every marriage, it's not going to be all smooth sailing, but it whould be a long and a fruitful one.

MURROW: Well, Mr. Goldwyn, you helped to create the movie code. What changes have occurred since that time and what changes should be made:

GOLDWYN:The only code changes in the past twenty-five years have been very small. Since the code was originally drawn up the world has chanced and the code should recognize those changes. However, we don't have enough time at our disposal today to go into detail. That would take much too ong.

MURROW: Well, Sam, how is the movie business doing in competition with television?

GOLDWYN: People would not leave their television sets to see a bad picture. What used to be the movie habit has been replaced by the TV habit, but fine pictures are doing greater business today than before. I had that experience in "Guys and Dolls", which is doing far more business than "The Best Years of our "Lives" and that was something of the old- time greats.

MURROW: Sam, what about (unintelligible --drowned out)

GOLDWYN: The next picture is going to be something really exciting, but right now I don't know what it it going to be, Ed, any more than you know what yo u're going to do next year, and I find (drowned out)..that way I just said, then I will go to it.

MURROW: (drowned out)..you're not being coy (drowned out)..of television moving more and more in the direction of live or film prestations?

GOLDWYN: I really believe (drowned out) film.

MURROW (drowned out..Goldwyn propaganda (drowned out)

MURROW: Why doesn't seomeone make .....(drowned out) cavalcade (drowned out)

GOLDWYN Ed, every time youstart a picture you feel it is going to be an epic. (laughter) Every time!

MURROW: That happens every time, does it?

GOLDWYN Every time!

MURROW : (unintcligible) ..disappointment

GOLDWYN: Well, there are so many disappointments that it's really heart rendering.

MURROW: Sam, I understand that within a matter of weeks the Goldwyn creative writing award will be announced. Will you tell us a little about that?

GOLDWYN: Two years ago I set up an annual award for the best creative writing submitted by students at the UCLA. They have a fine School of Dramatic Arts and I want to give the young people there an incentive for good writing. The first prize in one thousand dollars. and the second prize is two hundred and fifty. There's a lot of opportunity opened up to do business. You have to be good to win. The judges, in addition to Professor (unintelligible) McGowan, and Moss Hart, President of the Authors League of America; F. U. Herbert, National Chairman of the Writers Guild of America and George Seaton, President of the Academy of Mortion Picutre Arts and science, and they're all mighty distinguished writers themselves. The award will be announced on May the thirty-first.

MURROW:Well, he'll be a furtunate man or woman, whicever it is.

GOLDWYN: Why don't you try for the award? (laughter)

MURROW: I can't write well enough, Sam.

GOLDWYN: Well, you'll do till somebody better comes along. Say, by the way, Ed, you're still my love and I still say you're the greatest of all the great.

MURROW: Well, thank you very much, Sam. Tell me, is there a shortage of writers in the movies these days?

GOLDWYN: Well, we just could use about a few thousand more.

MURROW: What!.... what..what's the essential quality for a man to write succesfully for the movies?

GOLDWYN: First he has to get an original idea, but it seems to be most of the witters today have good memories. If some of them would forget what they read in the past and do something original we'd all be happier.

MURROW: And there is a real shortage of original material?

MURROW: Never was any greater shortage than there is today.

MURROW: You were speaking earlier of good pictures doing better. Are we going to get more big pictures?

GOLDWYN: What can ..I don't know what you mean by "big pictures."

MURROW: Well, I suppose I mean expensive, but that isn't the right thing to say, is it?

GOLDWYN: There is a little picture called "Marty" that won the Academy Award last year. That cost three hundred thousand dollars. On the other hand I finished a picture costing four-and-a-half-million. I think...five-and-a-half million! ..I think they're smarter than I am. (laughter)

MURROW: Do you see any trend in the movies that are now scheduled for production?

GOLDWYN: Ed, if I knew as muchas I..what I don't know I'd be the genius of the world (laughter)

MURROW: But you don't see any pattern in what's being (interruption)

GOLDWYN There is no formula no more than there is in your work.

MURROW: And that's a good thing, don't you think?

GOLDWYN I believe it's the right thing.

MURROW: Well, Sam. we have almost twenty seconds left. You see, I cut the news short tonight in order that we could have plenty of time to talk.

GOLDWYN: It's very sweet of you!

MURROW: ...and I want to use those fifteen seconds to say to you that you have given to me and to millions of people in this country a great deal of pleasure, stimulation and, in some of your pictures, inspiration and it's a great privilege to have a chance to sit here and talk with you.

GOLDWYN: Well, you're very sweet and you stimulate me every time I even talk to you.

MURROW: Thank you, Sam!

GOLDWYN: Thank you!

MURROW: This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: Nobody knows Hollywood and the art of making motion pictures like Sam Goldwyn. It's a strange town. Walter Duranty once said, "Iowa comes here and goes crazy." Fred Allen defined Hollywood as a placewhere people from Iowa mistake each other for movie stars. "It is no place for a professional comedian," he said. "The amateur competition is too great." Goodnight and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Tues., May 15, 1956

This is the news:

Secretary of State Dulles said today that the United States "welcomes" Russia's plan to reduce its armed forces, "if this proves to be evidence of an intent to forego the use of force in international affairs." Mr. Dulles was referring to yesterday's announcement... in Moscow... that Russia will cut its armed forces by a million, 200-thousand men in the next year. He told reporters Russia is making propaganda capital out of the announcement. But the real reason for the cutback, he said, is that Russia needs additional manpower for agriculture and industry. He said the shift does not reduce Russia's military strength. The men taken out of uniform, Dulles warned, may readily be put to work nuclear weapons. ~~He said the Soviet announcement is being carefully studied... and its implications carefully explored. Dulles repeated that the United States will gladly take part in a disarmament program which can be carried out "in safety and security, and bring under control the nuclear threat."~~

Secretary of the Air Force Quarles said today that the United States should be cautious about changing any of its own plans as a result of the Moscow announcement. There is no sign, he said, that Russia's air atomic power has been materially weakened. The Air Force chief of staff... General Twining... noted that the Soviet air force would apparently be reduced by only 30-thousand men.

Official sources in London and Paris have reacted to the Russian announcement by saying... in so many words... "so far so good." In Bonn, the Socialists have reacted by demanding "a serious review" of West Germany's rearmament program. (I should like to discuss this whole question further in a few minutes).

The United Steel Workers Union has drawn up its contract demands, and they include a company-financed health insurance program, and 52 weeks of unemployment pay... otherwise known as the guaranteed annual wage. The demands were decided on today by the union's wage policy committee, meeting in Pittsburgh. Two-year contracts with 12 basic steel and iron ore producers, will expire on June 30th. Negotiations are due to start in about two weeks.

French Premier Mollet flew to Moscow today, for a meeting with Soviet leaders. /He was accompanied by Foreign Minister Pineau. /At the Moscow airport, Mollet said he hoped their visit would lead to a further improvement of French-Soviet relations. But, he said, France will remain faithful to her allies.

In North Africa today, French troops... supported by tanks... captured a rebel stronghold, only 15 miles from Algiers. /The action lasted six hours. Twenty-six guerrillas were killed, and 70 captured. French losses are listed as one dead and five wounded.

The Cairo radio broadcast a speech today by Egyptian Premier Nasser, criticizing France's sale of jet aircraft to Israel. /Nasser said the 24 jet fighters sold by France, were intended for use by NATO. He said, "No matter how many arms the Israelis get, we will have more." He did not say from what source.

The London conference on the future of Singapore ended in deadlock today. /The crown colony was demanding independence within the British Commonwealth, by next April. /Britain agreed to let Singapore have more self-government, but refused to surrender its control of internal security. The colony's chief minister... David Marshall... told reporters, "I am going home to resign." He said an opportunity to make friends with the people of Asia had been lost.

→

The Chinese Communists shelled the Nationalist islands of Quemoy and Little Quemoy today, in the heaviest action in more than two weeks. The Nationalists say 20 Red troops were killed when their guns answered the Communist fire.

Early returns from South Korea, show President Rhee leading in his bid for a third term. Final returns will not be in for another day or two, but Rhee appears certain to win.

In Washington today, the Agriculture Department asked Congress for another two billion dollars, to support farm prices. Undersecretary of Agriculture Morse said, the additional money is needed because of bumper crop production. The money is separate from the proposed "soil bank" program... and would be used to increase the borrowing authority of the Commodity Credit Corporation.

The Atomic Energy Commission has asked Congress to authorize a special insurance program for atomic power plants that are privately owned.

The insurance would protect the plants against damage suits that might result if a nuclear reaction got out of control. Private insurance companies have agreed to provide each plant with coverage up to 65-million dollars. The commission says a half-billion-dollar federal insurance program is needed to give additional protection. It emphasizes that the chance of a runaway reaction is remote.

~~In Denver today, John Gilbert Graham was sentenced to die during the week of August 26th... for dynamiting an airliner last November. Forty-four persons, including Grahamis mother, died in the crash.~~

Edward R. Murrow: May 15, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

In December 1956, the United States announced a reduction in its armed forces of 403,000 men. It did so, largely because higher weapon power had made it unnecessary to maintain the level of manpower. The reduction did not decrease security and it saved money. In numbers, the reduction amounted to about one-eighth of our total manpower.

This substantial cut might have been publicized to the world as proof of our desire to disarm, and a demonstration of our love for peace. To say that would not have been to tell the whole truth about the reduction, but it would have been the truth about our national policy. And it could have been made the basis for an appeal to the Soviet Union to reduce its own fighting forces.

We did not make any such use of the reduction. We threw away the asset of the political value of the arms cut. Secretary Wilson announced it at a news conference, President Eisenhower confirmed it in his budget message. It was handled like a routine administrative detail.

Now Washington is being given a sensational and painful lesson on the art of propaganda by the Kremlin. The Soviet Union says it is cutting its military manpower by a million, two hundred thousand men, presumably about twenty-five percent of the total. This is greater than our cut, both numerically and relatively. But it is being made mostly for the same reasons. This is the age of the nuclear stalemate, and the development of nuclear weapons makes mass armies of the 1914-1945 era obsolete. As Secretary Dulles pointed out today, Soviet strength is not really being reduced. Soviet security remains the same, and money is being saved. Moreover, the Kremlin has more reasons than we had to make the reduction. It needs more manpower in industry and agriculture. The five year plan calls for expansion of heavy industry and farming beyond the capacity of the present labor force. This is specially important because the Soviet state is shifting the field of its rivalry for world supremacy from military to economic and political power. The million, two hundred thousand men to be withdrawn from the armed forces will serve Soviet interests more effectively in factories and on farms. They will make the Soviet Union a more formidable rival in the years to come. That is the biggest reason for it.

But if one reads the Soviet announcement - the five solid columns of fine print - he will not find a single word about this shift to economic rivalry, nor about mass armies being out of date, or even that Soviet security is not being impaired, or that the money saved can be better spent on guided missiles. Instead, there is an elaborate account of the disarmament talks in London, depicting the Soviets as the "good boys" of the negotiations, and the Western powers as the "bad boys." The statement laments the utter failure of the talks, then ends with what is presented as a magnanimous, unilateral deed of self-denial, the cut of the million, two hundred thousand men in the armed forces. And this then is used as text of an appeal that the example be followed by others, meaning the United States.

If in December 1954 we had used our arms cut in the same way, we could now point to the Soviet action as the consequence of our initiative and high-mindedness. We could have told about disarmament negotiations and about how good we had been and how obstinate the Russians. I might remark that both sides can say what they like about disarmament negotiations, which have been kept cryptic and confused. Certainly our own public can't possibly say what is incorrect in theSoviet account of them. It can't, because it doesn't know. And if our public doesn't know, the world at large knows still less, and the Soviet public knows least of all. So the Kremlin gets a wonderful press the world over and a thumping success at home. Who is going to stand up and find fault with the reduction of a million, two hundred thousand men?

One passage in the Soviet statement calls for special comment because it contains the key of the Soviet strategy. "The main obstacle to the further relaxation of international tension" it says, "is the continued arms race." That is standing on its head the clear fact, as the West sees it, that the main cause of tension - and of the arms race - has been, and is, Soviet policy. But if the Kremlin can distract attention from its policies, to the arms race, it thinks it can make millions believe that we must be the ones who want war, and they are the ones who want peace.

They have timed their announcement to coincide with the Mollet visit to Moscow. They want the French to see how peaceable they are, and by contrast, how militarily-minded the Americans remain. The French, they think, are wide open at this moment to this kind of persuasion.

So the Kremlin makes its manpower cut, which it had to make anyhow, and which will bring in enormous economic profits in due course. But first of all it collects an invaluable propaganda victory. Admiral Radford said yesterday that "it is in the political and diplomatic field that we have to worry." This is an example that helps explain why.

DONNELL

DAN MCDONAL,

Word for Today

The Russians are taking bows for doing something the United States already has done, but failed to publicize. Moscow has not abandoned its goal of world domination. As Shakespeare cautioned long ago, "A man may smile and smile, and be a villain still." But the Russians do seem mindful of Napoleon's adage, "Imagination rules the world."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

TUESDAY, MAY 15, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

Secretary of State Dulles said today that the United States "welcomes" Russia's plan to reduce its armed forces, "if this proves to be evidence of an intent to forego the use of force in international affairs." Mr. Dulles was referring to yesterday's announcement..in Moccow..that Russia will cut its armed forces by a million. 200-thousand men in the next year. He told reporters Russia is making propaganda capital out of the announcement. But the real reason for the cutback, he said, is that Russia needs the additional manpower for agriculture and industry. He said the shift does not reduce Russia's military strength. The men taken out of uniform, Dulles warned, may readily be put to work making nuclear weapons.

Secretary of the Air Force Quarles said today that the United States should be cautious about changing any of its own plans as a result of the Moscow announcement. There is no sign, he said, that Russia's air atomic power has been materially weakened. The Air Force chief of staff..General Twining.. noted that the Soviet Air Force would apparently be reduced by only 30-thousand men.

Official sources in London and Paris have reacted to the Russian announcement by saying..in so many words.."so far so good." In Bonn, the Socialists have reacted by demanding "a serious review" of West Germany's rearmament program. (I should like to discuss this whole question further in a few minutes.)

The United Steel Workers Union has drawn up its contract demands, and they include a company-financed health insurance program and 52 weeks of unemploymnet pay..otherwise known as the guaranteed annual wage. The demands were decided on today by the union's wage policy committee, meeting in Pittsburgh. Two-year contracts with 172 basic steel and iron ore producers will expire on June 30th. Negotiations are due to start in about two weeks.

French Premier Mollet flew to Moscow today for a meeting with Soviet leaders. He was accompanied by Foreign Minister Pineau. At the Moscow airport, Mollet said he hoped their visit would lead to a further improvement of French-Soviet relations. But, he said, France will remain faithful to her allies.

In North Africa today, French troops..supported by tanks..captured a rebel stronghold only 15 miles from Algiers. The action lasted six hours. Twenty - six guerrillas were killed and 70 captured. French losses are listed as one dead and five wounded.

The Cairo radio broadcast a speech today by Egyptian Premier Nasser, criticizing France's sale of jet aircraft to Israel. Nasser said the 24 jet fighters sold by France were intended for use by NATO. He said, "No matter how many arms the Israelis get, we will have more!" He did not say from what source.

The London conference on the future of Singapore ended in deadlock today. The crown colony was demanding independence within the British Commonwealth by next April. Britain agreed to let Singapore have more self-government, but refused to surrender its control of internal security. The colony's chief minister..David Marshall..told reporters "I am going home to resign." He said an opportunity to make friends with the people of Asia has been lost.

The Chinese Communists shelled the Nationalist islands of Quemoy and Little Quemoy today in the heaviest action in more than two weeks. The Nationalists say 20 Red troops were killed when their guns answered the Communist fire.

Early returns from South Korea show President Rhee leading in his bid for a third term. Final returns will not be in for another day or two, but Rhee appears certain to win.

In Washington today, the Agriculture Department asked Congress for another two billion dollars to support farm prices. Undersecretary of Agriculture Morse said the additional money is needed because of bumper crop production. The money is separate from the proposed "soil bank" program ..and would be used to increase the borrowing authority of the Commodity Credit Corporation.

The Atomic Energy Commission has asked Congress to authorize a special insurance program for atomic power plants that are privately owned.

The insurance would protect the plants against damage suits that might result if a nuclear reaction got out of control. Private insurance companies have agreed to provide each plant with coverage up to 65-million dollars. The commission says a half-billion - dollar federal insurance program is needed to give additional protection. It empahsizes that the chance of a runaway reaction is remote.

In December 1954, the United States announced a reduction in its armed forces of 103,000 men. It did so, largely because higher weapon power had made it unnecessary to maintain the level of manpower. The reduction did not decrease security , and it saved money. In numbers, the reduction amounted to about one-eighth of our total manpower.

This substantial cut might have beeen publicized to the world as proof of our desire to disarm, and a domonstration of our love for peace. To say that would not have been to tell the whole truth about the reduction, but it would have been the truth about our national policy.And it could have been made the basis for an appeal to the Soviet Union to reduce its own fighting forces.

We did not make any such use of the reduction. We threw away the asset of the political value of ahe arms cut. Secretary Wilson announced it at a news conference, President Eisenhower confirmed it in his budget message. It was handled like a routine administrative detail.

Now Washington is being given a sensational and painful lesson on the art of propaganda by the Kremlin. The Soviet Union says it is cutting its military manpower by a million, two hundred thousand men, presumably about twenty -five percent of the total. This is greater than our cut, both numerically and relatively. But it is being made mostly for the same reasons. This is the age of the nuclear stalemate, and the development of nuclear weapons makes mass armies of the 1914-1945 era obsolete. As Secretary Dulles pointed out today, Soviet strength is not really being reduced. Soviet secruity remains the same, and money is being saved. Moreover, the Kremlin has more reasons than we had to make the reduction. It needs more manpower in industry and farming beyond the capacity of the present labor force. This is specially important because the Soviet state is shifting the field of its rivalry for world supremacy from military to economic and political power. The million, two hundred thousand men to be withdrawn from the armed forces will serve Soviet interests more effectively in factories and on farms. They will make the Soviet Union a more formidable rival in the years to come. That is the biggest reason for it.

But if one reads the Soviet announcement - the five solid columns of fine print - he will not find a single word about this shift to economic rivalry, nor about mass armies being out of date, or even that Soviet security is not being impaired, or that the money savec can be better spent on guided missiles. Instead, there is an elaborate account ot the disarmement talks in London, depicting the Soviets as the "good boys" of the negotiations, and the Western powers as the "bad boys". The statement laments the utter failure of the talks, then ends with what is presented as a magnanimous, unilateral deed of self denial, the cut of the million, two hundred thousand men in the armed forces. And this then is used as text an an appeal that the example be followed by others, meaning the United States.

If in December 1954 we had used our arms cut in the same way, we could now point to the Soviet action as the consequences of our initiative and high-mindedness. We could have told about disarmament negotiations and about how good we had been and how obstinate the Russians. I might remark that both sides can say what they like about disarmement negotiations, which have been kept cryptic and confused. Certainly our own public can't possible say what is incorrect in the Soviet account of them. It can't, because it doesn't know. And if our public doesn't know, the world at large knows still less, and the Soviet public knows least of all. So the Kremlin gets a wonderful press the world over and a thumping success at home. Who is going to stand up and find fault with ahe reduction of a million, two hundred thousand men?

One passage in the Soviet statement calls for special comment because it contains the key of the Soviet strategy. "The main obstacle to the further relaxation in international tension" it says, "is the continued arms race." That is standing on its head the clear face, as the West sees it, that the main cause of tension - and of the arms race - has been, and is, Soviet policy. But if the Kremlin can distract attention from its policies, to the arms race, it thinks it can make millions believe that we must be the ones who want war, and they are the ones who want peace.

They have times their announcement to coincide with the Mollet visit to Moscow. They want the French to see how peaceable they are, and by what contrast, how militarily-minded the Americans remain. The French, they think, are wide open at this moment to this kind of persuasion.

So the Kremlin makes its manpower cut, which it had to make anyhow, and which will bring in enormous economic profits in due course. But first of all, it collects an invaluable propaganda victory. Admiral Radford said yesterday that "it is in the political and diplomatic field that we have to worry." This is an example that helps explain why.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Dan McDonnell.

MCDONNELL: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: The Russians are taking bows for doing something the United States already has done but failed to publicize. Moscow has not abandoned its goal of world domination. As Shakespeard cautioned long ago, "A man may smile and smile, and be a villain still. " But the Russians do seem mindful of Napoleon's adage, "Imagination rules the world."

Goodnight and Good Luck!

Edward R. Murrow Wed., May 16, 1956

This is the news:

The government confirmed today that it is sending another shipment of arms to Saudi Arabia. The Defense Department said the military supplies... consisting mostly of ammunition and spare parts... are being loaded on a freighter at Sunny Point, North Carolina. /It said this shipment, like the 18 tanks sent to Saudi Arabia in February, is part of an order approved by the government last year. /The New York Post... which broke the story... said some of the crates in the new shipment are stamped with the words: "From U.S.A. for Mutual Defense". /The Defense Department declined to give details of the cargo, but a State Department spokesman placed its value at less than a million dollars. The spokesman said the shipment does not include major weapons, such as jet aircraft and tanks... and that it was covered in the February report to Congress, on arms shipments to the Middle East. Israel has been pressing, for months, for permission to buy 63-million dollars' worth of military goods in the United States. #Senator Lehman of New York → has called the new arms shipment to Saudi Arabia a "shocking action". Saudi Arabia, he said, is a country pledged to the destruction of Israel. And he demanded a full investigation.

Eric Johnston said today that he expects Israel and the Arab states to agree to joint development of the Jordan River "within the next three or four years." Johnston is President Eisenhower's special representative on the Middle East. Since 1953, he has been trying to get agreement on a program for diverting Jordan River water for power and irrigation purposes. He feels the odds for agreement are now 3 to 1.

Egypt today announced its formal recognition of Red China. It thus becomes the first Arab country to recognize the Chinese Communist regime.

Reports from London say that Great Britain will soon start selling some embargoed goods to Communist China. These will be goods... such as tractors... which are barred from export to the Chinese Communists but which can be sold to Russia. It is understood that in making exceptions, in selling goods to Red China, the British government will first consult the United States.

The plan of an American company... to exchange information with the Russians regarding oil drills... has been rejected by the Commerce Department. Secretary Weeks based the decision on national security, saying that the Russians stood to gain more than they would give. The American company was identified as Dresser Industries, of Dallas, Texas. It had applied for permission to send the Russians technical information on the operation and design of rotary "rock bits", used in drilling oil wells. In return, the company was to have received data on a turbo drill designed by the Russians [redacted]

Weeks said the company can still get the information on the Russian drills, if it can be done without revealing American technical "know-how".

The Air Force said today that it has canceled contracts for a new supersonic fighter./ The contracts were with North American Aviation and Northrop Aircraft... and called for development of an airplane that would be the world's fastest long-range interceptor./ A third contractor... Lockheed... voluntarily withdrew from the project last March. The reason for the cancellation is not clear, but lack of money for research reportedly was a factor.

Several hours after the cancellation was announced, a Senate committee heard testimony that a new aircraft "with even greater potentialities" is in the works. The testimony was given by Dr. Clifford C. Furnas, assistant secretary of defense for research and development. Furnas gave no details.

President Eisenhower today sent Congress a plan for strengthening the program for weapons development and research. Under the plan, the Army, Navy and Air Force would each get a new assistant secretary for research. /The plan becomes effective in 60 days, if Congress does not overrule. Such a move was recommended by the Hoover Commission last year.

The Federal Trade Commission has dismissed its charges of false advertising against Jess Ritchie, manufacturer of the battery additive, A.D.X. 2. The decision to dismiss the charges ends a controversy over the merits of the additive that has been going on for eight years.

In Moscow today, French Premier Mollet began his formal talks with Soviet leaders... and appealed to them to destroy the artificial barriers separating East and West. In a luncheon speech, Mollet said, "We have much to learn from each other. To break down the barriers raised against the free movement of ideas and of men is to work for peace." The formal negotiations today lasted two and a half hours. A communique issued afterward said there had been "a frank exchange of opinion" on the disarmament question. It gave no details.

Great Britain announces that "an atomic device" was successfully tested today in the Monte Bello Islands, off the Australian west coast. It was a relatively small explosion, officially described as less powerful than 50-thousand tons of T.N.T.

The American H-bomb test at Bikini was postponed again today because of unfavorable weather conditions.

Returns from South Korea show President Rhee re-elected, as expected, to a third term. But his margin of victory was less than in the last presidential election in 1952.

President Soekarno of Indonesia arrived in Washington today on a state visit. In greeting Soekarno at the airport, Vice President Nixon said, "You led your people to independence from colonial rule and now in peace lead your people to new achievement." Soekarno expressed hope that his visit will lead to "real friendship" between Indonesia and the United States. He then went to the White House for lunch with President Eisenhower. He will be in this country for 18 days.

Edward R. Murrow: May 16, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

The British crown colony of Singapore is an island and a city of a million-and-a-quarter people, of whom a million are Chinese, twenty-five hundred British and European, the remainder Indian, Malay and Eurasian. Singapore also is a naval base. And there, in a nutshell, is the difficulty the British are experiencing in giving the colony its independence.

For the British, Singapore is the only naval base east of Aden, and without it, they feel they cannot adequately defend their interests in the Far East, or protect their communications to Australia and New Zealand. They still have a naval base in Ceylon, but as a result of the recent elections in Ceylon they have to give it up. That makes Singapore seem all the more vital. The fate of Ceylon may indeed have affected British conduct of the negotiations with Singapore.

To the population of Singapore, the naval base suddenly becomes an expensive debit. The independence negotiations broke down over the safety of the naval base.

The British were ready to give about everything the Singapore delegation wanted, so long as they were left in control of internal security. That, of course, was because of the naval base. They granted a fully elected legislative council and genuine self-government (with the reservation of British control of external affairs and defense.) The British were not afraid of the present labor coalition, but it is not sure of a stable majority. There is a communist front party, the People's Action Party, which ~~may~~ could win the next election. The British refused to risk the control of internal security going to the Communist Front.

David Marshall, the moderate chief minister of Singapore, who headed the delegation to London, offered the British the right to suspend the constitution in event of revolution or serious disorders. But Colonial Secretary Lennox Boyd scorned the compromise and held out for actual control of internal security. The right to suspend the constitution, he said, was only the right to put out a fire after it was well started. He demanded the right to keep fires from starting. Mr. Marshall then offered to give the British control of internal security for three years. Lennox Boyd replied that he had a pathological aversion to fixed dates.

So Mr. Marshall thinks he gave in on everything of substance, and Mr. Lennox Boyd thinks the demands of defense are inescapable realities, that he could not compromise. Mr. Marshall, who is a highly talented lawyer, as well as a fiery phrase-maker, called the British offer of independence "a Christmas pudding with arsenic sauce." He promised that he would resign next month, and his labor coalition would step down, and at the coming election elect only lepers to the legislative council - yes, literally lepers.

So Singapore seems headed for tragedy - for terrorism and stern repression. And Western interests in Asia will suffer correspondingly. The reason the British refused to gamble on internal security in Singapore was an honest fear of communists. But the breakdown of negotiations is going to help the communist cause in Asia, help it wherever colonialism is an issue, which is pretty much everywhere. And it may help it in Singapore itself.

Singapore now will be coupled with Cyprus. In both cases negotiations for a constitution broke down because the British refused to yield full control of local security for reasons of defense. In both cases the local populations were not much concerned over these defense interests. So in both cases, colonial status is being retained to serve imperial requirements.

In Cyprus, however, the British defense interests immediately affect the whole West, because what Cyprus asks is union with Greece which, if granted, might tear NATO apart because of its effect on Turkey. In Singapore, Western defense interests are more remotely involved. True, Singapore is a noted naval base and thus part of Western power. But so it was in 1941, when it proved to ~~be~~ of no use whatever. And in this age of nuclear bombs, the value of any naval base may be quite illusory.

It would have been a gamble for the British to accept the right to suspend the Singapore constitution, because it could only be done late in a crisis. This country will be affected by the gamble, and now can only hope, however helplessly, that somehow negotiations can be started again, and brought over the difficulty that wrecked them.

Ultimately, Singapore will cease to be a crown colony. This is a fact, and Julian Huxley said, "God give me strength to face a fact, though it slay me." But first there is to be bitterness and perhaps bloodshed. For as H. L. Gold said, "The obvious we see eventually. The completely apparent takes longer."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

WEDNESDAY, MAY 16, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

The government confirmed today that it is sending another shipment of arms to Saudi Arabia. The Defense Department said the military supplies..consisting mostly of ammunition ans spare parts..are being loaded on a freighter as Sunny Point, North Carolina. It said this shipment, like the 18 tanks went to Saudi Arabia in February, is part of an order approved by the government last year. The New York Post..which broke the story..said some of the crates in the new shipment are stamped with the words: "From U.S.A. for Mutual Defense". The Defense Department declined to give details of the cargo, but a state Department spokesman placed its value at less than a million dollars. The spokesman said the shipment does not include major weapons such as jet aircraft and tanks..and that it was covered in the February report to Congress on arms shipments to the Middle East. Israel has been pressing for months for permission to buy 63 million dollars sorth of military goods in the United States.

Senator Lehman of New York has called the new arms shipment to Saudi Arabia a "shocking action". Saudi Arabia, he said, is a country pledged to the destruction of Israel. And he demanded a full investigation.

Eric Johnston said today that he expects Israel and the Arab states to agree to joint development of the Jordan River "within the next three or four years." Johnston is President Eisenhower's special representative on the Middle East. Since 1953, he has been trying to get agreement on a program for diverting Jordan River water for power and irrigation purposes. He feels the odds for agreement are now 3 to 1.

Egypt today announced its formal recognition of Red China. It thus becomes the first Arab country to recognize the Chinese Communist regime.

Reports from London say that Great Britain will soon start selling some embargoed goods to Communist China. These will be goods..such as tractors which are barred from export to the Chinese Communists but which can be sold to Russia. It is understood that in making exceptions in selling goods to Red China, the British government will first consult the United States.

The plan of an American company..to exchange information with the Russians regarding oil drills..has been rejected by the Commerce Department. Secretary Weeks based the decision on national security, saying that the Russians stood to gain more than they would give. The American company was identified as Dresser Industries, of Dallas, Texas. It has applied for permission to send the Russians technical information on the operation and design of rotary "rockbits" used in drilling oil wells. In return, the company was to have received data on a turbo drill designed by the Russians. Weeks said the company can still get the information on the Russian drills, if it can be done without revealing American technical "know-how".

The Air Force said today that it has canceled contracts for a new supersonic fighter. The contracts were with North American Aviation and Northrop Aircraft..and called for development of an airplane that would be the world's fastest long-range interceptor. a third contractor..Lockheed..voluntarily withdrew from the pooject last March. The reason for cancellation is not clear, but lack of money for research reportedly was a factor.

Several hours after the cancellation was announced, a Senate committee heart testimony that a new aircraft "with even greater potentialities" is in the works. The testimony was given by Dr. Clifford C. Furnas, assistant secretary of defense for research and development. Furnas gave no details.

President Eisenhower today sent Congress a plan for strengthening the program for weapons developement and research. Under the plan, the Army, Navy and Air Force would each get a new assistant secretary for research. The plan becomes effective in 10 days, if Congress does not overrule. Such a move was recommended by the Hoover commission last year.

The Federal Trade Commission has dismissed its charges of false advertising against Jess Ritchie, manufacturer of the battery additive, A.D.X. 2 . The decision to dismiss the charges ends a controversy over the merits of the additive that has been going on for eight years.

In Moscow today French Premier Mollet began his formal talks with Soviet leaders..and appealed to them to destroy the artificial barriers separating East and West. In a luncheon speech, Mollet said, " We have much to learn from each other. To break down the barriers raised against the free movement of ideas and of men it to work for peace." The formal negotiations today lasted two and a half hours. A communique issued afterward said there had been "a free exchange of opinion" on the disarmament question. It have no details.

Great Britain announces that "an atomic device" was successfully tested today in the Monte Bello Islands, off the Australian west coast. It was a relatively small explosion, officially described as less powerful than 50-thousand tons of T.N.T.

The American H-bomb test at Bikini was postponed again today because of unfavorable weather conditions.

Returns from South Korea show President Rhee re-elected, as expected, to a third term. But his margin of victory was less than in the last presidential election in 1952.

President Soekarno of Indonesia arrived in Washington today on a state visit. He will be in this country for 18 days.

The British crown colony of Singapore is an island, and a city of a million and a quarter people, of whom a million are Chinese, twenty-five hundred British and European, the remainder Indian, Malay and Eurasian. Singapore also is a naval base. And there, in a nutshell, is the difficulty the British are experiencing in giving the colony its independence.

For the British, Singapore is the only naval base East of Aden, and without it, they feel they cannot adequately defend their interests in the Far East, or protect their communications to Australia and New Zealand.

They still have a naval base in Ceylon, but as a result of the recent elections in Ceylon they have to give it up. That makes Singapore seem all the more vital. The fate of Ceylon may indeed have affected British conduct of the negotiations with Singapore.

To the population of Singapore, the naval base suddenly becomes an expensive debit. The independence negotiations broke down over the safety of the naval base.

The British were ready to give about everything the Singapore delegation wanted, so long as they were left in control in internal security. That, of course, was because of the naval base. They granted a fully elected legislative council and genuine self-government (with the reservation of British control of external affairs and defense. The British were not afraid of the present labor coalition, but it is not sure of a stable majority. There is a communist front party, the People's Action Party, which could win the next election. The British refused to risk the control on internal security going to the Communist Front.

David Marshall, the moderate chief minister of Singapore, who headed the delegation to London, offered the British the right to suspend the constitution in event of revolution or serious disorders. But Colonial Secratary Lennox Boyd scorned the compromise and held out for actual control of internal security. The right to suspend the constitution, he said, was only the right to put out a fire, after it was well started. He demanded the right to keep fires from starting. Mr. Marshall then offered to give the British control of internal security for three years. Lennox Boyd replied that he had a pathalogical aversion to fixed dates.

So Mr. Marshall thinks he gave in on everything of substance, and Mr. Lennox Boyd thinks the demands of defense are inescapable realities that he could not compromise. Mr. Marshall, who is a highly talented lawyer, as well as a fiery phrase maker, called the British offer of independence " a Christmas pudding with arsenic sauce." He promised that he would resign next month, and his labor coalition would step down, and at the coming election, elect only lepers to the legislative council - yes, literally lepers.

So Singapore seems headed for tragedy - for terrorism and stern repression. And Western interests in Asia will suffer correspondingly. The reason the British refused to gambl on internal security in Singapore was an honest fear of communists. But the breakdown of negotiations is going to help the communist cause in Asia, help it wherever colonialism is an issue, which is pretty much everywhere. And it ma help it in Singapore itself.

Singapore now will be coupled with Cyprus. In both cases negotiations for a constitution broke down because the British refused to yield full control of local security for reasons of defense. In both cases the local populations were not much concerned over these defense interests. So in both cases colonial status is being retained to serve imperial requirements.

In Cyprus, however, the British defense interests immediately effect the whole West, because what Cyprus asks is union with Greece which, if granted, might tear NATO apart because of its effect on Turkey. In Singapore, Western defense interests are more remotely involved. True, Singapore is a noted naval base and thus part of Western power. But so it was in 1941, when it proved to be of no use whatever. And in this age of nuclear bombs, the value of any naval base may be quite illusory.

It would have been a gamble for the British to accept the right to suspend the Singapore constitution, because it could only be done late in a crisis. This country will be affected by the gamble, and now can only hope, however helplessly, that somehow negotiations can be started again, and brought over the difficulty that wrecked them.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: Ultimately, Singapore will cease to be a crown colony. This is a fact, and Julian Huxley said, "God give me strength to face a fact, though it slay me". But first there is to be bitterness and perhaps bloodshed. For as H.L. Cold said, "The obvious we see eventually. The completely apparent takes longer."

Goodnight and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Thurs., May 17, 1956

This is the news:

The House Foreign Affairs Committee today turned down President Eisenhower's plan for long-term foreign aid. The President asked for authority to commit up to 100-million dollars a year for 10 years, for specific long-range projects, such as harbors and dams. Instead of granting Mr. Eisenhower's request, the committee approved a "policy statement"... saying that so long as the Communist danger lasts, the United States should continue such foreign aid as is "compatible with its own stability." The committee voted to give the President half the 200-million dollars he requested for special economic assistance to Asia and the Middle East. It also voted to cut off foreign aid to any country allowing the export of strategic materials to the Communist bloc, if the United States itself does not permit the export of those materials.

President Soekarno of Indonesia told Congress today that American needs to understand the nationalist aspirations of the Asian countries. Addressing a joint session of the Senate and House, he said, "Nationalism is the mainspring of our efforts. Fail to understand that, and no amount of thinking, no torrent of words, no Niagara of dollars, will produce anything but bitterness and disillusionment." Soekarno warned that military aid is no substitute for Asian stability. He said the main goal should be for the people of Asia to become stable politically, as well as economically. "Thus," he said, "they will be able to defend their freedom from all assaults." And he pledged the support of Indonesia for "every action" taken to remove the shadow of the atomic bomb. The speech frequently was interrupted by applause.

In Moscow today, another visiting head of government... French Premier Mollet... conferred for nearly five hours with Soviet leaders. A Russian spokesman said they discussed "the entire complex of problems connected with disarmament," including the German question and the Middle East. The spokesman denied that Russia is trying to drive a wedge between France and the United States. (I ~~should like to~~ ~~discuss the Mollet and Spaak visits further, in a few minutes).~~

Another distinguished visitor... Hugh Gaitskell, leader of the British Labour Party... made a speech today in Atlantic City. Gaitskell told the International Ladies Garment Workers convention that foreign aid ought to be handled through the United Nations. This, he said, would take the question of aid out of international politics, and enhance ~~the~~ United Nations prestige. Gaitskell said that if the Russians refuse to take part in such a U.N. program, "the world will draw the conclusion that they are more concerned with spreading Communist propaganda than with providing genuine economic assistance."

Israel today accused Syrian troops ~~of firing on a group of Israeli~~ civilians ~~near~~ the Syrian frontier. ~~Israel~~ said the fire ~~was not returned~~, and that there were no casualties. ~~During the night, the Beersheba~~ rail line ~~was blown up at a place called Bet Lama, 10 miles from the~~ Jordan border. ~~And Egypt~~ charged ~~today that two Israeli aircraft vio~~lated its air space, over the ~~Gaza Strip~~.

On Cyprus, another British soldier was killed today in a rebel ambush. The military patrol vehicle in which he was riding with two other soldiers was bombed.

And a French policeman was stabbed to death today, in downtown Algiers.

American and Chinese Communist representatives met in Geneva today, for the 47th time since last summer. The marathon talks are aimed at securing a mutually acceptable formula for the renunciation of force in the Formosa area... and the repatriation of 13 Americans held by the Chinese Reds. The report after today's meeting was again---no progress.

The American H-bomb test in the Pacific, was postponed today for the ninth time. Bad weather forced the postponement less than an hour before the scheduled drop.

The United States ambassador to Italy... Clare Boothe Luce... is suffering from chronic enteritis and anemia, and will stay in this country for treatment, for the next two months. Mrs. Luce left Rome a week ago for a medical check-up.

The Senate began debate today on a new farm bill. Democratic Senator Ellender called President Eisenhower's proposal to make advance

"soil bank" payments this year, "a political lollipop". He said he did not think it was either common sense or sound policy. Republican Senator Aiken proposed an amendment... to strike out the section of the bill that would prevent drops in the level of government price supports for corn, peanuts and wheat. Debate on each amendment has been limited to one hour, in hope that a final vote can be taken tomorrow.

The Administration today revised its estimate of what the budget surplus will be at the end of this fiscal year, June 30. The Administration now forecasts a surplus of 1-billion, 800-million dollars. Last January, it predicted a surplus of only 230-million dollars. Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey says the additional money will permit "a most welcome reduction in our huge national debt."

Two hundred convicts rioted today at the state prison in Raiford, Florida. One convict was killed and 11 wounded. Prison officials say the guards fired when they were rushed by a group of convicts armed with baseball bats. After the shooting, order was quickly restored.

The F.B.I. announced tonight that it has arrested three persons in the New York metropolitan area, on charges of stealing a classified government document. One of those arrested is Staff Sergeant Harold E. Brill of the Air Force. The other two are identified as Sidney M. Stern and Seymour Hindman, both of East Orange, New Jersey.

The nature of the document was not disclosed. It allegedly was stolen from the Brooklyn Army Terminal.

Edward R. Murrow: May 17, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

One of the newly developed instruments of diplomacy, is the state visit. To be sure, it is as old as history, and it always has served what we now call propaganda value. But never before has it been so useful a factor in world affairs. The Russians, who claim to have invented nearly everything, can well boast that they are the first to extract the full value of the state visit as propaganda. They set the present pattern with the travels abroad of Bulganin and Khrushchev, and the recent visits of world leaders to their own country. An example of the art is the carefully executed burst of national ecstasy for Prime Minister Nehru of India when he visited Moscow. This touched him deeply, it improved Indian-Soviet relations, and it strengthened the position of Soviet Russia in the Asian world. The Kremlin, with its command of the nation's press and radio and its authority over its subjects, can utilize the new art better than we.

Two state visits are in the news this week. French Premier Mollet and Foreign Secretary Pinaud are in Moscow. President Sukarno of Indonesia is in Washington. Let us look at both, chiefly for the contrast in technique. Daniel Schorr cables me from Moscow that it is wondrous to behold the build-up a country gets in Russia when its leaders receive or are received by Soviet government chieftans. "It is" he says, "as though explorers had discovered a new continent, when the Soviet propaganda machine gets rolling with newspaper and magazine articles about the country's history and culture, radio and T.V. programs, art exhibits, travelogues, memoirs and recollections. With the arrival of Mollet and ~~Pinaud~~ Pineau, la Belle France was being glorified throughout Soviet Russia. The Russians also could read an interview with Bulganin in the Paris le Monde, saying nothing about "wicked French colonialism", but finding instead that France in North Africa is acting 'in a spirit of peace and friendship'. Ilya Ehrenburg was writing: 'What a poor world this would be without France: We prize the humaneness of French culture and of the French people, because we are kindred with them in spirit.'"

There is no need to ask the objective of all this. The Kremlin is doing two things, making the visitors feel good and perhaps blunting their critical perceptions. And it is appealing to the French people over the heads of their leaders. It is telling the French that the way to be a great power again is to step out ahead of others and solve the problems of co-existence. It is telling them, in so many words, that the measure of a nation's prestige is what it does to strengthen peace. It wants France to become a benign neutral, something like the India of Europe. The state visit will hardly bring this to pass. But it creates the atmosphere in which unexpected changes in policy are possible.

As to the visit of President Sukarno, Washington actually is doing more than it usually does. His will be a record stay for length, that is, he will be a visitor of state, throughout his sojourn in this country, not just for the few days in Washington. There is all the usual fuss and official entertainment in Washington. There was today's address to a joint session of Congress. This is the best red-carpet treatment we know how to give. And it will have some impact on Mr. Sukarno, and through the Indonesian press and radio, on the Indonesian public.

But the impact on this country will be negligible, and that is a big point. Part of the Soviet formula is to make the visiting leaders and their countries feel that the Russians really care a great deal for them.

I am not suggesting that Indonesia is as important to us as France is to the Soviet Union. But the comparison is not absurd. Indonesia is the fourth ~~largest~~ most populous non-communist country in the world, ranking after India, the United States and Japan, and ahead of Pakistan. The United States played no inconsiderable part in helping Indonesia to get its independence, a fact which Indonesians seldom hear about, and of which most Americans are in ignorance. Our relations to Asia are of decisive importance to us as a world leader, so they are bound to be affected by our relations with Indonesia. But we never have gone out of our way to bone up on Indonesia, or demonstrate genuine interest in its people or problems.

President Sukarno, in a sense, is the George Washington of his country. He derived much of his inspiration from our own leaders who fought for independence. Here is a bond that is intangible, more so than gold, goods and guns. And it can well be used to create an atmosphere in which friendship can thrive. It is not necessary - or desirable - to copy Soviet hypocricies in exploiting state visits. [The friendship with Indonesia - or anyone else - will benefit more from truth than blandishments. But one thing friendship does not grow from, and that is indifference or a low temperature of interest.]

Hugh Holden-

Word for Today

The state visit is becoming a popular instrument of international policy. The Russians are presently wooing the French, who have had some experience in this field, and we are wooing the Indonesians. There is a compliment in this. As Longfellow said, "If I am worth wooing, I am worth winning." And Samuel Johnson said, "The use of traveling is to see things as they are."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

THURSDAY, MAY 17, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

The House Foreign Affairs Committee today turned down President Eisenhower's plan for a long-term foreign aid. The President asked for authority to commit up to 100-million dollars a year for 10 years for specific long-range projects, such as harbors and dams. Instead of granting Mr. Eisenhower's request, the committee approved a "policy statement" saying that so long as the Communist danger lasts, the United States should continue such foreign aid as is "compatible with its own stability." The committee voted to give the President half the 200-billion dollars he requested for special economic assistance to Asia and the Middle East. It also voted to cut off foreign aid to any country allowing the export of strategic materials to the Communist bloc, if the United States itself does not permit the export of those materials.

President Soekarno of Indonesia told Congress today that America needs to understand the nationaalist aspirations of the Asian countries. Addressing a joint session of the Senate and House, he said, "Nationalism is the mainspring of our efforts. Fail to understand that, and no amount of thinking, no torrent of words, no Niagara of dollars will produce anything but bitterness and disillusionment." Soecarno warned that military aid is no substitute for Asian stability. He said the main goal should be for the people of Asia to become stable politically, as well as economically. "Thus", he said, "they will be able to defend their freedom from all assaults." And he pledged the support of Indonesia for "every action" taken to remove the shadow of the atomic bomb. The speech frequently was interrupted by applause.

In Moscow today, another visiting head of government..French Premier Mollet..conferred for nearly five hours with Soviet leaders. A Russian spokesman said they discussed "the entire complex of problems connected with disarmament," including the German question and the Middle East. The spokesman denied that Russia is trying to drive a wedge between France and the United States.

Another distinguished visitor ..Hugh Gaitskell, leader of the British Labour Party..made a speech today in Atlantic City. Gaitskell told the international Ladies Garment Workers convention that foreign aid ought to be handled through the United Nations. This, he said, would take the question of aid out of international politics and enhance United Nations prestige. Gaitskell said that if the Russians refuse to take part in such a U.N. program, "the world will draw the conclusion that they are more concerned with spreading Communist propaganda than with providing genuine economic assistance."

On Cyprus, another British soldier was killed today in a rebel ambush. The military patrol vehicle in which he was riding with two other soldiers was bombed.

And a French policeman was stabbed to death today in downtown Algiers.

American and Chinese Communist representatives met in Geneva today for the 67th time since last summer. The marathon talks are aimed at securing a mutually acceptable formula for the renunciation of force in the Formosa area. ...and the repatriation of 13 Americans held by the Chinese Reds. The report after today's meeting was again --no progress.

The American H-bomb test in the Pacific was postponed today for the ninth time. Bad weather forced the postponement lessthan an hour before the scheduled drop.

The United States ambassador to Italy..Clare Boothe Luce..is suffering from chronic enteritis and anemia, and will stay in this country for treatment for the next two months. Mrs. Luce left Rome a week ago for a medical check-up.

The Senate began debate today on a new farm bill. Democratic Senator Ellender called President Eisenhower's proposal to make advance "soil bank" payments this year "a political lollipop". He said he did not think it was either common sense or sound policy. Republican Senator Aiken proposed an amendment..to strike out the section of the bill that would prevent drops in the level of government price supports for corn, peanuts and wheat. Debate on each amendment has been limited to one hour, in hope that afinal vote can be taken tomorrow.

The Administration today revised its estimate of what the budget surplus will be at the end of this fiscal year, June 30. The Administration now forecasts a surplus of 1-billion, 800-billion dollars. Last January, it predicted a surplus of only 230-million dollars. Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey says the additional money will permit "a most welcome reduction in our huge national debt."

The F.B.I. announced tonight that it has arrested three persons in the New York metropolitan area on charges of stealing a classified government document. One of those attested is Staff Sergeant Harold E. Brill of the Air Force. The other two are identified as Sidney M. Stern and Seymour Hindman both of East Orange, New Jersey. The nature of the document was not disclosed. It allegedly was stolen from the Brooklyn Army Terminal.

One of the newly developed instruments of diplomacy, is the state visit. To be sure, it is as old as history, and it always has served what we now call propaganda value. But never before has it been so useful a factor in world affairs. The Russians, who claim to have invented nearly everything, can well boast that they are the first to extract the full value of the state visit as propaganda. They set the present pattern with the travels abroad of Bulganin and Khrushchev, and the recent visits of world leaders to their own country. An example of the art is the carefully executed burst of national ecstasy for Prime Minister Nehru of India when he visited Moscow. This touched him deeply, it improved Indian-Soviet relations, and it strengthened the position of Soviet Russia in the Aisan world. The Kremlin, with its command of the nation's press and radio and its authority over its subjects, can utilize the new art better than we.

Two state visits are in the news this week. French Premier Mollet and Foreign Secretary Pineau are in Moscow. President Sucarno of Indonesia is in Washington. Let us look at both, chiefly for the contrast in technique. Daniel Schorr cables me from Moscow that it is wondrous to behold the build-up a country gets in Russia when its leaders receive or are received by Soviet government chieftans. "It is" he says, "as though explorers had discovered a new continent, when the Soviet propaganda machine gets rolling with newspaper and magazine articles about the country's history and culture, radio and T.V. programs, art exhibits, travelogues, memoirs and recollections. With the arrival of Mollet and Pineau, la Belle France was being glorified throughout Soviet Russia. The Russians also could read an interview with Bulganin in the Paris le Monde, saying nothing about "wicked French colonialism", but finding instead that France in North Africa is acting 'in a spirit of peace and friendship'. Illya Ehrenburg was writing: 'What a poor world this would be without France: We prize the humaneness of French culture and of the French people, because we are kindred with them in spirit.'"

There is no need to ask the objective of all this. The Kremlin is doing two things, making the visitors feel good and perhaps blunting their critical perceptions. And it is appealing to the French people over the heads of their leaders. It is telling the French that the way to be a great power again is to step out ahead of others and solve the problems of co-existence. It is telling them, in so many words, that the measure of a nation's prestige is what it does to strengthen peace. It wants France to become a benign neautral, something like the India of Europe. The state visit will hardly bring this to pass. But it creates the atmosphere in which unexpected changes in policy are possible.

As to the visit of President Sukarno, Washington is doing more than it usually does. His will be a record stay for length, that is, he will be a visitor of state, throughout his sojourn in this country, not just for a few days in Washington. There is all the usual fuss and official entertainment in Washington. There was today's address to a joint session of Congress. This is the best red-carpet treatment we know how to give. And it will have some impact on Mr. Sukarno, and thoughh the Indonesian press and radio, on the Indonesian public.

But the impact on this country will be negligible, and that is a big point. Part of the Soviet formula is to make the visiting leaders and their countries feel that the Russians really care a great deal for them.

I am not suggesting that Indonesia is an important to us as France is to the Soviet Union. But the comparison is not absurd. Indonesia is the fourth most populous non-communist country in the world, ranking after India, the United States and Japan, and ahead of Pakistan. The United States played no inconsiderable part in helping Indonesia to get its independence, a fact which Indonesians seldom hear about, and of which most Americans are in ignorance. Our relations to Asia are of decisive impotante to us as a world leader, so they are boun to be affected by our relations with Indonesia. But we never have gone out of our way to bone up on Indonesia, or demonstrate genuine interest in its people or problems.

President Sukarno, in a sense, is the George Washington of his country. He derived much of his inspiration from our own leaders who fought for independence. Here is a bond that is intangible, more so than gold, goods and guns. And it can well be used to create an atmosphere in which friendship can thrive. It is not necessary - or desireable - to copy Soviet hypocricies in exploiting state visits. The friendship with Indonesia - or anyone else - will benefit more from truth than blandishments. But one thing friendship does not grow from, and that is infifference or a low temperature of interest.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Hugh Holder.

HOLDER: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: The state visit is becoming a popular instrument in international policy. The Russians are presently wooing the French, who have had some experience in this field, and we are wooing the Indonesians. There is a compliment in this. As Longfellow said, "If I am worth wooing, I am worth winning." And Samuel Johnson said, "The use of travelling is to see things as they are."

Good Night and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Fri., May 18, 1956

This is the news:

The Senate has passed a new farm bill. It gives President Eisenhower the "soil bank" he requested, but not the authority he wanted to make advance "soil bank" payments this year. The Democrats fought the pre-payment plan, charging it was a political scheme to buy votes in November. The Republicans maintained it would give farmers the money they desperately need, now. The measure contains a two-price support system for rice... and a 6 percent increase, this year, in the support prices for grains used for feed.

The House Foreign Affairs Committee changed its mind today on one feature of President Eisenhower's foreign aid program. The committee reversed itself and voted down a proposal that might have blocked further aid to many countries. The proposal... approved only yesterday... would have denied assistance to any country exporting strategic goods to the Communist bloc, if the United States itself did not allow the export of those goods. A move to cut a billion dollars out of the 4-billion 900-million-dollar foreign aid program was defeated today by what Chairman Richards described as "a very close vote". A final decision on the cut was put off until Tuesday.

Harold Stassen said today that President Eisenhower has appointed a "task force" of experts to study the implications of Russia's announcement that it is cutting back its armed forces. Stassen is Mr. Eisenhower's adviser on disarmament. He told reporters the task force... or committee... will have eight members, and that it will hold its first meeting on May 29th. Stassen said he was told of the Russian demobilization plan by Communist Party Boss Khrushchev in London on April 26th---more than two weeks before the formal announcement. He said that, in his opinion, many factors contributed to ~~the~~ Soviet decision. One of them, he said, was the need for young workers in the factories. (Secretary of Defense Wilson said in a speech tonight that the United States plans to maintain its armed forces at their present level "for the indefinite future." There is no clear indication, he said, that the world situation has improved to the point "where we can importantly modify our policy of strength for the long pull.")

~~opinion, many factors contributed to the Soviet decision. One of them, he said, was the need for young workers in the factories.~~

The Moscow radio appealed today for a migration of Russian youth to Siberia, to help build up the industrial potential of that area. The appeal was directed particularly at high school graduates and discharged members of the Red Army. It said 500-thousand "vigorous" young men were needed.

The talks between French and Russian leaders ended today in Moscow. Tomorrow, they will issue a final communique. Today's meeting lasted only an hour and 10 minutes... and concerned cultural relations between the two countries. French Premier Mollet said that those who expect spectacular results from the Moscow conference will be disappointed. "We know the Soviet position," he said, "and the Soviets know exactly the French position. Thus the goal of our visit can be considered achieved."

In Algeria today, French troops killed 20 rebels hiding in a wheat field. They also seized a large cache of arms. During the night, nationalist guerrillas raided the port city of Nemours. The action lasted two hours. No report of losses on either side.

In London, a Labor member of Parliament suggested today that the future of Cyprus be determined by a United Nations plebiscite. Arthur Lewis said he would put forward his plan in the House of Commons on May 30th.

The British colonial secretary... Alan Lennox-Boyd... told the House of Commons today that further negotiations on the independence of Singapore would be difficult at this time. "The best advice I can give the people of Singapore," he said, "would be to let the political pattern in Singapore work itself out." Left-wing Laborite Aneurin Bevan shouted from the floor, "Like Cyprus, I suppose." Lennox-Boyd said Britain is always prepared to renew negotiations "on the basis of its present proposals."

In Washington, the State Department said today that it is looking into "rumors" that Communist China may start shipping arms to Egypt. At the same time, the department revealed that a shipment of military supplies to Israel was stopped last Monday in New York Harbor. According to a State Department spokesman, the shipment consisted of 21 surplus

→

Army half-tracks. The half-tracks were found aboard an Israeli freighter. The spokesman said the shipment was stopped because no license had been issued for assembled half-tracks, only for spare parts.

~~Five Russian Baptist leaders arrived in New York today as guests of the Baptist Church. The Russians are returning the visit of an American Baptist [illegible]~~

The voting in the Oregon primary ~~today~~ is reported heavier than expected. So far, there are no returns. The polls are still open. It is a "two-ring" primary. Both Adlai Stevenson and Senator Kefauver have waged a vigorous campaign as write-in candidates, for the state's 16 delegates to the Democratic national convention. President Eisenhower is virtually unopposed on the Republican slate. Chief interest [redacted] lies in the contest for the Republican nomination for United States senator. The principals in that race are former Secretary of the Interior Douglas McKay and former State Senator Phil Hitchcock. The winner faces Democratic Senator Morse in November.

Edward R. Murrow: May 18, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

For about thirty years the Russians have had three heroes - Marx, Lenin and Stalin. They are now engaged in destroying Stalin's stature. (In the Soviet Union there is no security even in death.) So today the Russians used one hero, Lenin, to help destroy another, Stalin. The information is about thirty years old, but it will be news to most Russian readers. The fact now is that Lenin didn't like Stalin, didn't trust him, wanted to get rid of him.

Today the publication of the Communist Youth League, published what it called "A Children's Guide to Stalinism". It says that Lenin in the last year of his life pointed out that such negative features of Stalin's character as rudeness, lack of respect for working comrades, capriciousness and inclination toward abuse of power, could lead to a violation of the rules of collective leadership. Unfortunately it happened so." The article says: "J.V. Stalin started solving all questions himself. That brought much harm, for one person cannot know everything and solve everything correctly."

This is the most savage attack on Stalin yet published in the Soviet Union. This so-called last testament of Lenin follows closely similar versions published outside the Soviet Union, and may well be the first move toward opening secret archives, calculated to discredit the memory of Stalin. It is the business of using one hero to discredit another. The vigor of the language, the fact that it appeared in a publication aimed at youngsters, is merely proof that the Russians, in undertaking this great about-face, are concerned primarily with the youth - that section of the population who had been taught to worship Stalin. The first blow at his memory and record was struck by Khrushchev on February twenty-fourth, in a speech which still hasn't been published. Then like a giant echo, the denunciations of Stalin came from other Party leaders, and from the satellite countries. Press, radio and magazines echoed the denunciation, and the whole apparatus of indoctrination came into play. The effort is to wash from ~~XXXXXXXXXXX~~ the minds of scores of millions, the imprint of Stalin. (The only imprint they had received of a contemporary leader.) There isn't much doubt that this time the Russians are telling the truth. Lenin didn't like, and didn't trust Stalin. But that doesn't reduce the formidable nature of the task the Russians have undertaken, for they have necessarily created doubts, and doubts are dangerous in a dictatorship.

There was an incident the other day in the Communist sector of Berlin.

The so-called Free German Youth held a huge rally - a discussion group. No identification papers required, questionners need not give their names. A huge crowd turned up. A panel of Communist worthies, including Gerhardt Eisler, once a communist leader in this country, faced the youngsters. As the Christian Science Monitor tells the story - at intermission time the youngsters were given a choice of continuing their discussion or starting to dance. They discussed, for another two-and-a-half hours. The questions came thick, fast and blunt. Why was Stalin denounced only after he was dead? Why were his errors only now being exposed? Why weren't they caught while he was still around? Another boy wanted to know why Walter Ulbricht, (he's the number one Communist in East Germany,) once called the Yugoslavs "murderers". Now they are good communists - why? Ulbricht called Tito a gangster; now all this is blamed on Beria - again why? All these sallies were loudly cheered by the audience, and the panel was obviously rattled. The replies followed the new Party line, but were obviously unconvincing. The doubts remained.

The youngsters also wanted to know why East Germans are barred from Poland and Czechoslovakia.

Not all the questions were political. Why wasn't Porgy and Bess played in East Germany? Would Louis Armstrong be allowed to come? Why no good jazz on the East German radio? And why couldn't the youngsters in East Berlin wear blue jeans, as they do in the Western sector?

This was an unusual forum. It may have reflected the new relaxation ordained by the Kremlin - may have been a sort of safety-valve for East Berlin. Whatever the objective, it demonstrates that "communist youth wants to know;" and that when idols are destroyed, it takes time to create new ones, and there is always a residue of doubt and suspicion.

Having started down this road, the Russians will find it difficult to return to one-man rule, unless it should be imposed by the army. ~~Moreover,~~ Stalin's memory and reputation has been besmirched, and some of the "smirch" is bound to rub off on those men who now run the country, and who for so many years served his evil purposes.

Word for Today

It would seem that in Russia, heroes are expendable. Nathaniel Hawthorne said, "A hero cannot be a hero, unless in an heroic world." And the youth of East Germany seems to have detected something fishy in this business of erecting heroes, and then tearing them down. It is, as H. L. Mencken once observed, "Youth sees through sham with sharp, and terrible eyes."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

FRIDAY, MAY 18, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

The Senate had passed a new farm bill. It gives President Eisenhower the "soil bank" he requested, but not the authority he wanted to make advance "soil bank" payments this year. The Democrats fought the pre-payment plan, charging it wasa political scheme to buy votes in November. The Republicans maintained it would give farmers the money they desperately need, now. The measure contains a two-price support system for rice..and a 6 percent increase, this year, in the support prices for grains used for feed.

The House Foreign Affairs Committee changed its mind today on one feature of President Eisenhower's foreign aid program. The committee reversed itself and voted down a proposal that might have blocked further aid to many countries. The proposal approved only yesterday..would have denied assistance to any country exporting strategic goods to the Communist bloc, if the United States itself did not allow the export of those goods.

A move to cut a billion dollars out of the 4-billion 900-million dollar foreign aid program was defeated toda by what Chairman Richards described as "a very close vote." A final decision on the cut was put off until Tuesday.

Harold Stassen said today that President Eisenhower has appointed a "task force" of experts to study the implications of Russia's announcement that it is cutting back its armed forces. Stassen is Mr. Eisenhower's adviser on disarmament. He told reporters the task force..or committee..will have eight members, and that it will hold its first meeting on May 29th. Stassen said he was told of the Russian demobilization plan by Communist Party Boss Khrushchev in London on April 26--more than two weeks before the formal announcement. He said that, in his opinion, many factors contributed to the Soviet decision. One of them, he said, was the need for young workers in the factories. (Seccetary of Defense Wilson said in a speech tonight that the United States plans to maintain its armed forces at their present level "for the indefinite future." There is no clear indication, he said, that the world situation has improved to the point "where we can importantly modify our policy of strength for the long pull.")

The Moscow radio appealed today for a migration of Russian youth to Siberia, to help build up the industrial potential of that area. The appeal was directed particularly at the high school graduates and discharged members of the Red Army. It said 500-thousand "vigorous" young men were needed.

The talks between French and Russian leaders ended today in Moscow. Tomorrow, they will issue a final communique. Today's meeting lasted only an hour and 10 minutes...and concerned cultural realations between the two countries. French Premier Mollet said that those whoexpect spectacular results from the Moscow conference will be disappointed. "We know the Soviet position. Thus the goal of our visit can be considered achieved."

In Algeria, today French troops killed 20 rebels hiding in a wheat field. They also siezed a large cache of arms. During the night, nationalist guerillas raided the port city of Nemours. The action lasted two hours. No report of losses on either side.

In London, a Labor Member of Parliament suggested today that the future of Cyprus be determined by a United Nations plebiscite. Arthur Lewis said he would put forward his plan in the House of commons on May 30th.

The British colonial secretary..Alan Leonnox-Boyd,.told the House of Commons today that further negotiatio s on the independence of Singapore would be difficult at this time. "The best advice I can give the people of Singapore", he said, "would be to let the political pattern in Singapore work itself out." Left-wing Laborite Aneurin Bevan shouted from the floor, "Like Cyprus, I suppose." Lennox-Boyd said Britain is always prepared to renew negotiations "on the basis of its present proposals."

In Washington, the State Department said today that it is looking into "rumors" that Communist China may start shipping arms to Egypt. As the same time, the Department revealed that a shipment of military supplies to Israel was stopped last Monday in New York Harbor. According to a State Department spokesman, the shipment consisted of 21 surplus Army half-tracks. The half-tracks were found aboard an Israeli freighter. The spokemman said the shipment was stopped because no license had been issued for assembled half-tracks, only for spare parts.

The voting in the Oregon primary is reported heavier than expected. So far, there are no returns. The polls are still open. It is a "two ring" primary. Both Adlai Stevenson and Senator Kefauver have waged a vigorous campaign as write-in candidates, for the state's 16 delegates to the Democratic national convention. President Eisenhower is virtually unopposed on the Republican slate. Chief interest lies in the contest for the Republican nomination for United States Senator. The principals in that race are former Secretary of the Interior Douglas McKay and former State Senator Phil Hitchcock. The winner faces Democratic Senator Morse in November.

For about thirty years, the Russians have had three heroes - Marx, Lenin, and Stalin. They are now engaged in destroying Stalin's stature. In the Soviet Union there is no security even in death. So today the Russians used one hero, Lenin, to help destroy another, Stalin. The information is about thirty years old, but it will be news to most Russian readers. The fact now is that Lenin didn't like Stalin, didn't trust him, wanted to get rid of him.

Today the publication of the Communist Youth League, published what it called "A Children's Guide to Stalinism." It says that Lenin in the last year of his life pointed out that such negative features of Stalin's character as rudeness, lack of respect for working comrades, capriciousness and inclination toward abuse of power, could lead to a violation of the rules of collective leadership. Unfortunately it happened so." The article says: "J.V. Stalin started solving all questions himself. That brought much harm, for one person cannot know everything and solve everything correctly."

This is the most savage attack on Stalin yet published in the Soviet Union. This so-called last testament of Lenin follows closely similar versions published on side the Soviet Union, and may well be the first move toward opening secret archives calculated to discredit the memory of Stalin. It is the business of using one hero to discredit another. The vigor of the language, the fact that it appeared in a publication aimed at youngsters, is merely proof that the Russians in undertaking this great about-face are concerned primarily with the youth - that section of the population who had been taught to worship Stalin. The first blow at his memory and record was struck by Khrushchev on February twenty-fourth, in a speech which still hasn't been published. Then like a giant echo, the denunciations of Stalin came from other Party leaders, and from the satellite countries. Press, radio and magazines echoed the denunciation, and the whole apparatus of indoctrination came into play. The effort is to wash from them minds of scores of million, the imprint of Stalin. The only imprint they had received of a contemporary leader. There isn't much doubt that this time the Russians are tellin the truth. Lenin didn't lik , and didn't trust Stalin. But that doesn't reduce the formidable nature of the task the Russians have undertaken, for they have necessarily created doubts, and doubts are dangerous in a dictatorship.

There was an incident the other day in the Communist sector of Berlin. The so-called Free German Youth held a huge rally - a discussion group. No identification papers required, questionners need not give their names. A huge crowd turned up. A panel of Communist worthies, including Gerhardt Eisler, once a communist leader in this country, faced the youngsters. As the Christian Science Monitor tells the story - at intermission time, the youngsters were given a choice of continuing their discussion or starting to dance. They discussed, for another two - and - a - half hours. The questions came thick, fast and blunt. Why was Stalin denounced only after he wad dead? Why were his errors only now being exposed? Why weren't they caught while he was still around? Another boy wanted to know why Walter Ulbricht, (he's the number one Communist in East Germany,) once called the Yugoslavs "murderers." Now they are good communists - why? Ulbricht called Tito a gangster; now all this is blamed on Beria - again why? All these sallies were loudly cheered by the audience, and the panel was obviously rattled. The replies followed the new Party line, but were obviously unconvincing. The doubts remained.

The youngsters also wanted to know why East Germans are barred from Poland and Czechoslovakia.

Now all the questions were political. Why wasn't Porgy and Bess played in East Germany? Would Louis Armstrong be allowed to come? Why no good jazz on the East German radio? And why couldn't the youngsters in East Berlin wear blue jeans, as they do in the Western sector?

This was an unusual forum. It may have reflected the new relaxation ordained by the Kremlin - may have been a sort of safety - valve for East Berlin. Whatever the objective, it demonstrated that "Communist youth wants to know"; and that when idols are destroyed, it takes time to create new ones, and there is a residue of doubt and suspicion.

H ng started down this road, the Russians will find it difficult to return to one-man rule, unless it should be imposed by the army. Stalin's memory and reputation has been besmirched, and some of the "smirch" is bound to rub off on those men who run the country, and who for so many years served his evil purposes.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: It would seem that in Russia heroes are expendable. Nathaniel Hawthorne said, "A hero cannot be a hero, unless in an heroic world." And the youth of East Germany seems to have detected something fishy in this business of erecting heroes and then tearing them down. It is, as H.L. Mencken once observed, "Youth sees though sham with sharp and terrible eyes."

Goodnight and Good Luck!

Edward R. Murrow Mon., May 21, 1956

This is the news:

Secretary of Defense Wilson today called an unprecedented news conference to bring out into the open reports of rivalry between the armed forces. Over the week-end, certain sources at the Pentagon "leaked" documents... saying that present emphasis on air power could lead to disaster. Today's news conference was presided over by Secretary Wilson and attended by the secretaries of the Army, Navy and Air Force and all members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Wilson started the news conference by saying that reports of an inter-service feud were exaggerated. "Honest" differences, he said, are healthy. But he conceded that some of these differences had generated into a "little hurricane"... which, although it was not large, was bigger than he liked. "I think," he said, "some eager beavers are gnawing down some of the wrong trees." Wilson told reporters he does not think a congressional investigation of the differences is necessary. He promised a full investigation to find out which lower echelon officers publicized their disagreements. The reporters then put questions to the "brass". Air Force Secretary Quarles and General Twining, the Air Force chief of staff, both disavowed the published report that the Air Force has condemned the Army's Nike missile. Twining said, "We welcome the Nike. It is the best thing we have today." Quarles added, "Naturally, we would like to have the latest weapons when the time to use them comes." And, later, Twining said bluntly that the Army does not have exclusive jusisdiction over anti-aircraft defenses. Beyond a certain range, such defense is an Air Force mission.

Southern members of the House Judiciary Committee today issued a minority report... attacking the civil rights bill approved by the committee last month. The original measure is sponsored by the Administration and would give President Eisenhower authority to set up a bi-partisan commission to study the civil rights problem. It also would enable anyone who feels his civil rights are being violated to seek remedy in Federal Court, without first having to go through state courts. The southern members... six Democrats and one Republican... said the bill introduces "new and shocking principles which, when fully appraised, are absolutely shocking."

The Supreme Court ruled today that state laws prohibiting "union shop" agreements do not apply to workers in the railroad industry. It found... by unanimous decision... that the Railway Labor Act, authorizing union shop agreements in the railroad industry, takes precedence over the "right-to-work" statutes passed by states. The decision has no effect on state laws banning the union shop in other industries. (Under union shop agreements, workers are required to become union members, or lose their jobs.)

The State Department said today that direct commercial air service to Russia is "under consideration". The department "understands" that Soviet officials would welcome conversations concerning the establishment of this service by Pan American Airways. A department spokesman emphasized that, so far, there has been no direct contact on the subject with the United States government.

In Algeria, French troops are reported to have killed 50 rebels, and seized over 200 suspects, in a mop-up action following the ambush-slaying of 19 French reservists, east of Algiers. The reservists were all from the Paris region, and had been in uniform less than three weeks. Seventeen Moslems... loyal to the French... were found today with their throats slashed. Seven of the victims were children.

King Hussein of Jordan has asked former Premier Said Mufti to form a new government. Mufti resigned the premiership last winter, after rejecting an invitation to join the Baghdad Pact. He told a Reuters correspondent today his new government will pursue a neutral policy in its dealings with other Arab states.

The prime minister of Syria said today that his government is thinking of recognizing Communist China. Egypt recognized Red China last week.

On Cyprus today, another British soldier was killed... and five wounded... in a continuation of Greek Cypriot attacks. Six civilians also were injured in the violence, which took place in downtown Nicosia. The soldier who died was hit by a home-made bomb.

The British foreign secretary... Selwyn Lloyd... said today that Cyprus is vital to Britain, "to enable us to carry out our responsibilities to NATO, and also to enable us to maintain our position in the Middle East." Lloyd warned that other positions, like Aden and Singapore, must be retained "at whatever cost".

Prince Nordom of Cambodia told reporters today that he expects his country to receive Russian aid. He made the statement in New Delhi, on his way to Moscow. He also will visit Czechoslovakia and Poland.

In Congress today, the House Appropriations Committee voted 422-million dollars for construction of navigation and flood control projects in the next fiscal year.

And Senate-House conferees got down to work drafting a compromise farm bill. There was talk that an acceptable compromise might be on President Eisenhower's desk by the end of the week. The original bill was vetoed by the President on April 16th, principally because of its provision for high, rigid supports. That feature has been eliminated from both measures passed recently by the Senate and House.

President Eisenhower ordered today that no more government-owned land be leased for growing surplus crops. The White House said between one and a half and 2-million acres will be affected.

Edward R. Murrow: May 21, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

The name of the hydrogen bomb that was dropped from a B-52 over a Bikini atoll yesterday was "Cherokee." Being the first H-bomb released from a bomber by the United States, and producing perhaps the second most powerful explosion ever made by man, Cherokee is an important milepost in the atomic era. It went off without destroying cities or populations, but it demonstrated awesomely, that it could do both. In so doing it restored the balance of power in nuclear weapons between us and the Soviet Union. We may even be a little ahead of the Russians, unless they have developed something better in H-bombs than their last explosion.

For a time the Russians were able to destroy an American city with an H-bomb, in a way that we could not destroy a Russian city with an H-bomb. The big news about Cherokee is not that an H-bomb was dropped from an aeroplane; the Russians already had done that. The news is that we have caught up with them. The nuclear stalemate is again in effect.

Probably the American public hasn't been aware that the Russians were ahead in the thermonuclear race. If it had known the ~~XXX~~ situation, it would feel more relaxed today. I am not saying that the Russians could have wiped us out and chose not to do so. We had deterrent power other than hydrogen bombs. But their thermonuclear lead added to our peril.

Cherokee is a reminder that an intense effort is needed just to maintain the nuclear stalemate. It is one of probably ten atomic tests scheduled this summer in Bikini. The most interesting of these is to be next month, so newsmen aboard the Mt. McKinley at Bikini were told. That is, the June test is to be more significant than Cherokee. No hint has been given of the nature of the test and the newsmen are guessing it will be an explosion of a hydrogen warhead on a pilotless guided missile.

If and when that has been successful, the nuclear competition with the Soviet Union will enter a still more critical phase, the race for an intercontinental guided missile to carry the hydrogen warhead. If one side gets that first, the balance of nuclear power will be upset. If both sides get it about the same time, the stalemate will continue.

Behind such words may well lie the future of this country, the Soviet Union and much of modern civilization. Hydrogen bombs, per unit of potential damage, are the cheapest form of destructiveness now known. W. L. Laurence, the New York Times' atomic expert, radios from Bikini that Cherokee, in terms of destructive power, is one thousand times cheaper than the fission type atomic bomb. (And fission bombs had been relatively cheaper than any previously known destructive force.)

How serious this is, can be judged from a remark by Harold Stassen, after the breakdown of the disarmament talks in London. He said that about a year remained before the secret of making hydrogen bombs would spread around the world. The United States and the Soviet Union alone know the secret now. Mr. Stassen's implication was, that when others know it, the dangers that now are inconceivably great, will become inconceivably greater. We and the Russians have had trouble enough coming to an understanding about curbing nuclear bombs. When other countries get the H-bomb, they will be bidding for nuclear equality, almost regardless of their own size.

The newsmen at Bikini saw Cherokee explode from a distance of thirty-nine miles, but they were told little about it. Mr. Laurence, from studies of official announcements, concludes that Cherokee represents the development of a brand new technique, since our last big hydrogen explosion. For one thing, it is a weapon. Previous explosions were devices, and not usable in warfare. For another, it is a weapon primarily of fusion, rather than of fission-fusion-fission, like its predecessor. But Cherokee, which of course had to be triggered by an atomic explosion, got its chief destructive power from hydrogen. And the materials to produce that are not rare.

This results from a distinct advance in knowledge, presumably the "break-through" guardedly mentioned by atomic scientists. However, Cherokee is estimated to have been less powerful than the last big device we exploded in March 1954. That was probably sixteen megatons. Cherokee may have been ten to twelve megatons. The last Soviet H-bomb had about the same power. Having been exploded ten thousand feet above the target, Cherokee did not suck up huge quantities of earth and radio-activate it. So the fall-out will be less than from the last hydrogen device.

However, it is desirable that the world should understand that though the Cherokee was exploded in the fullest blaze of publicity, its purpose was not to demonstrate America's technical superiority. It was to bring us more or less even with the Soviet Union in thermonuclear power. Unless this is understood, Cherokee will bring us criticism we do not merit.

Word for Today

A new weapon has been tested, and not found wanting. Irwin Edman said, "The science that was to make life beautiful has also made it hideous." What is finally to be made of the atom, good or ill, is up to Man. And Ralph Waldo Emerson said, "No man has learned anything rightly, until he knows that every day is Doomsday."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

MONDAY, MAY 21, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

Secretary of Defense Wilson today called an unprecedented news conference to bring out into the open reports of rivalry between the armed forces. Over the week-end, certain sources at the Pentagon "leaked" documents ..saying that present emphasis on air power could lead to disaster. Today's news conference was presided over by Secretary Wilson and attended by the secretaries of the Army, Navy and Air Force and all members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Wilson started the news conference by saying that reports on an inter-service feud were exaggerated. "Honest differences, he said, are healthy. But he conceded that some of these differences had generated into a "little hurricane" which, although it was not large, was bigger than he liked. "I think" he said, "some eager beavers are gnawing down some of the wrong trees." Wilson told reporters he does not think a congressional investigation of the differences is necessary. He promised a full investigation to find out which lower echelon officers publicized their disagreements. The reporters then put questions to the "brass". Air Force Secretary Quarles and General Twining, the Air Force chief of staff, both disavowed the published report that the Air Force has condemned the Army's Nike missile. Twining said, "We welcome the Nike. It is the best thing we have today." Quarles added "Naturally, We would like to have the latest weapons when the time to use them comes." And, later, Twining said bluntly that the Army does not have exclusive jurisdiction over anti-aircraft defenses. Beyond a certain range, such a defense is an Air Force mission.

Southern members of the House Judiciary Committee today issued a minority report ..attacking the civil rights bill approved by the committee last month. The original measure is sponsored by the Administration and would give President Eisenhower authority to set up a bi-partisan commission to study the civil rights are being violated to seek remedy in Federal Court, without first having to go through state courts. The southern members..six Democrats and one Republican..said the bill introduces "new and shocking principles which, when fully appraised, are absolutely shocking."

The Supreme Court ruled today that the state laws prohibiting "union shop" agreements do not apply to workers in the railroad industry. It found..by unanimous decision..that the Railway Labor Act, authorizing union shop agreements in the railroad industry, takes precedence over the "right-to-work" statutes passed by states. The decision has no effect on state laws banning the union shop in other industries. Under union shop agreements, workers are required to become union members, or lose their jobs.

The State Department said today that direct commercial air service to Russia is "under consideration." The department "understands" that Soviet officials would welcome conversations concerning the establishment of this service by Pan American Airways. A department spokesman emphasized that, so far, there had been no direct contact on the subject with the United States government.

In Algeria, French troops are reported to have kill d 50 rebels and seized over 200 suspects in a mop-up action following ghe ambush-slaying of 19 French reservists, east of Algiers. The reservists were all from the Paris region and had been in uniform less than three weeks. Seventeen Moslems.. loyal to the French..were found today with their throats slashed. Seven of the victims were children.

The prime minister of Syria said today that his government is thinking of recognizing Communist China. Egypt recognized Red China last week.

On Cyprus today, another British soldier was killed..and five wounded. in a continuation of Greek Cypriot attacks. Six civilians also were injured in the violence, which took place in downtown Nicosia. The soldier who died was hit by a home-made bomb.

The British foreign sicretary..Selwyn Lloyd..said today that Cyprus is vital to Britain "to enable us to carry out our responsibilities to NATO, and also to enable us to maintain our position in the Middle East." Lloyd warned that other positions, like Aden and Singapore, must be retained "at whatever cost."

Prince Nordom of Cambodia told reporters today that he expects his country to recieve Russian aid. He made the statement in New Delhi, on his way to Moscow. He also will visit Czechoslovakia and Poland.

In Congress today, the House Appropriations Committee voted 422-million dollars for construcction of navigation and flood control projects in the next fiscal year.

The name of the hydrogen bomb taat was dropped from a B-52 over a Bikini atoll yesterday was "Cherokee." Being the first H-bomb released from a bomber by the United States, and producing perhaps the second most powerful explosion ever made by man, Cherokee is an important milepost in the atomic era. It went off without destroying cities or populations, but it demonstrated awsomely , that it could do both. In so doing it restored the balance of power in nuclear weapons between us and the Soviet Union. We may even be a little ahead of the Russians, unless they have developed something better th H-bombs than their last explosion.

For a time the Russians were able to destroy an American city with an H-bomb, in a way that we could not destroy a Russian city with an H-bomb. The big news about Cherokee is not that an H-bomb was dropped from an aeroplane; the Russians already had done that. The news is that we have caught up with them. The nuclear stalemate is again in effect.

Probably the American public hasn't been aware that the Russians were ahead in the thermonuclear race. If it had known the situation, it would feel more relaxed today. I am not saying that the Russians could have wiped us out and chose not to do so. We had deterrent power other than hydrogen bombs. But their thermonuclear lead added to our peril.

Cherokee is a reminder that an intense effort is needed just to maintain the nuclear stalemate. It is one of probably ten atomic tests scheduled this summer in Bikini. The most interesting of these is to be next month, so newsmen aboard the Mt. McKinley at Bikini were told. That is, the June test is to be more significant than Cherokee. No hint has been given of the nature of the test and the newsmen are guessing it will be an explosion of a hydrogen ar warhead. If one side gets that first, the balance of nuclear power will be upset. If both sides get it about the same time, the stalemate will continue.

Behind such words may well lie the future of this country, the Soviet Union, and much of modern civilizat on. Hydrogen bombs, per unit of potential damage, are the cheapest form of destructiveness now known. W.L. Laurence, the New York Times' atomic expert, radios from Bikini that Cherokee, in terms of destructive power, is one thousand times cheaper than the fission type atomic bomb. (And fission bombs had been relatively cheaper than any previously known destructive force.)

How serious this is, can be judged from a remark by Harold Stassen, after the breakdown of the disarmament talks in London. He said that about a year remained before the secret of making hydrogen bombs would spread around the world. The United States and the Soviet Union alone know the secret now. Mr. Stassen's implication was, that when others know it, the dangers that now are inconceivably great, will become inconceivably greater. We and the Russians have had trouble enough coming to an understanding about curbing nuclear bombs. When other countries get the H-bomb, they will be bidding for nuclear equality, almost regardless of their own size.

The newsmen at Bikini saw Cherokee explode from a distance of thirty-nine miles, but they were told little about it. Mr. Laurence, from studies of official announcements, concludes that Cherokee represents the development of a brand new technique since our last big hydrogen explosion. For one thing, it is a weapon. Previous explosions were devices, and not usable in warfare. For another, it is a weapon primarily of fusion, rather than fission-fusion-fission, like its predecessor. But Cherokee, which of course had to be triggered by an atomic explosion, got its chief destructive power from hydrogen. And the materials to produce that are not rare.

This results from a distinct advance in knowledge, presumably the "breakthrough" guardedly mentioned by atomic scientists. However, Cherokee is estimated to have been less powerful than the last big device we exploded in March 1954. That was probably sixteen megatons. Cherokee may have been ten to twelve megatons. The last Soviet H-bomb had about the same power. Having been exploded ten thousand feet above the target, Cherokee did not suck up huge quantities of earth and radio-activate it. So the fall-out will be less than from the last hydrogen device.

However, it is desirable that the world should understand that though the Cherokee was exploded in the fullest blaze of publicity, its purpose was not to demonstrate America's technical superiority. It was to bring us more or less even with the Soviet Union in thermonuclear power. Unless this is understood, Cherokee will bring us criticism we do not merit.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: A new weapon has been tested, and not found wanting. Irwin Edman said, "The science that was to make life beautiful has also made it hideous." That is finally to be made of the atom, good or ill, is up to Man. And Ralph Waldo Emerson said, "No man has learned anything rightly, until he knows that every day is Doomsday."

Goodnight and good luck.

Edward R. Murrow Tues., May 22, 1956

This is the news:

Secretary of State Dulles said today that the United States regrets Egypt's decision to recognize Communist China. He said, however, he does not think the action will appreciably improve Red China's chances of being admitted to the United Nations. Mr. Dulles told his weekly news conference that if Egypt accepts Soviet aid in building the Aswan Dam, it is "unlikely" we would join Russia... at this time... in financing the project. He repeated his statement, of last week, that if Russia is cutting its armed forces, it probably is doing so because of economic and military considerations. He said the United States had "deduced" that Russia would announce a cut in military manpower... that Communist Party Boss Khrushchev did not "disclose" the fact to Harold Stassen in London, as previously reported. Stassen told reporters last Friday that the first hint of the reduction came to him from Khrushchev. Dulles insisted there was no "disclosure" by Khrushchev, but rather that Stassen had made a "deduction" from what he had been told. Dulles seemed to regard this as an important point. He refused to go along with Stassen's statement that the Russian decision to cut its armed forces was "an initiative we wanted them to take." Stassen had said it might be a sign the Russians are interested in working toward a disarmament agreement.

→

Secretary of Defense Wilson had his customary weekly meeting today with the President. Wilson told reporters afterward that the question of rivalry between the Army, Navy and Air Force was "mentioned casually." He said the President is "a bit unhappy about the fact that we don't seem to get along better in the services." A reporter asked Wilson what would be the next step. Wilson said, "Let's see who sticks his head up next. I think it might be a little dangerous." The Air Force has challenged the effectiveness of the Army's Nike missile, as compared with the Talos missile developed by the Navy. Wilson said yesterday that the controversy has been exaggerated... and promised a full investigation. The disagreement may also be investigated by Congress. Democratic Senator Chavez said he will call the "high brass" before his appropriations subcommittee, and ask them why they are unable to get along. Senator Symington also promises an investigation by his armed services subcommittee, which is already looking into the relative air power of Russia and the United States.

Army ordance experts fired an array of operational rockets today at the White Sands proving ground in New Mexico. The Nike was among the weapons fired. The Army said it has "good reason" to believe that both Nikes fired hit their target, a drone plane flying at an altitude of 30-thousand feet.

A conference committee of the Senate and House reached agreement today on a new farm bill. ~~Republican Senator Aiken indicates the measure will be acceptable to the President. Mr. Eisenhower vetoed an earlier farm bill because it called for high, rigid price supports.~~ The new measure preserves the system of lower supports and calls for creation of a soil bank. It does not give the President the authority he requested to make advance soil-bank payments this year. ~~In conference, the House accepted a Senate provision for increasing feed grain supports to 76 percent of parity. Senate conferees, in turn, agreed to drop a provision~~ that the soil bank program need not be put in operation this year.

The Senate passed the compromise measure tonight on a voice vote, and sent it to the House, where final passage is expected tomorrow.

The House Foreign Affairs Committee voted today to cut a billion dollars from President Eisenhower's foreign aid program. The entire billion dollars was taken from the 3-billion-dollar fund requested for military assistance. Chairman Richards said the cut will not hurt the program. He said 5-billion dollars in military funds has been left over from previous years. The House committee already has denied Mr. Eisenhower the authority he asked for to commit the United States to long-term foreign aid projects, such as harbors and dams. Secretary Dulles said at his news conference today that the Administration will try to have this long-range feature restored, when the matter comes up before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

The House Post Office Committee approved a bill today that would increase the cost of mailing First Class letters to four cents. The cost of an Air Mail letter would be raised to seven cents. The rates for Second and Third Class mail would also be raised.

The forces of Senator Lyndon Johnson won the first test vote today at the Democratic state convention in Dallas, Texas. The vote came on a proposal to oust the state executive committee, dominated by the conservative forces led by Governor Shivers. Johnson fought the move and won out.

Former President Truman visited Salerno, Italy, today... and said the World War Two landings at Salerno, and later at Anzio, were "totally unnecessary." They were planned, he said, by some "squirrel-headed general." General Mark Clark... who is now president of The Citadel... said tonight that the landings were "conceived and directed by the Allied governments involved." He said, "As commander of the 5th Army, I received and carried out orders from higher headquarters."

Prime Minister Nehru of India offered a five-point plan today for settlement of the Algerian question. The plans calls for declarations by both sides of their desire to end the violence... and mutual recognition that Algeria is the homeland of all its inhabitants, regardless of race. The French government would also recognize the "national entity" of Algeria. Nehru proposed that direct negotiations be undertaken on the basis of ~~these~~ these actions, in accordance with the principles of the United Nations charter.

The Scandinavian countries... Norway, Sweden and Denmark... have invited Soviet Premier Bulganin and Party Boss Khrushchev to pay them a state visit. The invitations specified no date.

Edward R. Murrow: May 22, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

In the whole history of man, a hundred years is a relatively short time. Man, or something like him, has been on earth for three hundred thousand years. It has taken twenty-five thousand years for the cave man to become the man of today, who can split and fuse the atom. But the changes that can come in the next hundred years, brief though that time is, could surpass anything ever done in such a period before.

A group of scientists at the California Institute of Technology has been making a survey of what life on this planet may be like in a hundred years. They did it, not as an intellectual exercise, but for the enlightenment of a considerable number of industrialists who wanted a farther look ahead than they get. They wanted to know, for example, the balance-sheet of the planet's natural resources, food and population a century hence. For some months the Cal Tech study has been laid before various industrial groups, and this will go on all summer. It is a sign that scientists and industrial leaders can share the ivory tower with benefit.

The California scientists dispose of two of the greatest fears about the future, the fear that the earth will not be able to support a much larger population, and the fear that natural resources will be finished when coal, oil and mineral deposits are exhausted, which they will be after a century.

But two great fears are not banished. One is that man may not know enough to take advantage of his opportunities. The one resource the scientists are not sure about is brain-power. A further fear is akin to it. It is that men will not be wise enough to avoid turning their new powers on each other and destroy civilization. If they do, as Geo-chemist Dr. Harrison Brown warns, there will be no second chance. For the good life is going to depend on the simplest of nature's resources — air, sunlight, sea-water and rock. To exploit them with nuclear energy, machinery will have to be developed, and to make the machinery today's rich ores will be needed. If the machines are destroyed at a time when the rich ores have been exhausted, new machines cannot be made. The story of human civilization will be over.

As to brain-power, technology is going to need scientists and engineers in enormous numbers, far more than are being trained. And while it is pointed out that of all of nature's resources, human beings are the only ones that can be replenished, the time to step up the rate of training is now, not later on. It must not wait for the population of the world to grow. That would be too late.

According to Dr. Brown, laboratory tests already show that granite contains more than enough radio-active energy to process the granite and extract its minerals. A ton of granite contains four grams of uranium and twelve grams of thorium. If the thorium can be used in breeder reactors, a ton of granite will release energy equivalent to the burning of fifty tons of coal. There not only will be enough nuclear energy to process the granite, but to distill some sea-water as well. Then the fusion of hydrogen atoms, if it can be controlled, would create an unlimited supply of energy. Granite is not the only useful rock. Limestone will yield a whole complex of organic chemicals and plastics. That is, man can live indefinitely from the crust of the earth.

Dr. Brown finds it probable that the population of the world will be seven billion in another hundred years. By then industrialization will be universal, and if the needs are like those, say of America today, the energy required would be the equivalent of seventy billion tons of coal a year. At that rate the fossil fuels would last only a few years. That is why evolution must be moved to nuclear energy.

The food picture, as painted by biologist Dr. James Bonner, is just as unfamiliar. He acknowledges that half the world's population today eats barely enough to sustain life, and a further quarter is undernourished. He also foresees an enormous growth of population. Yet he points out that plants on land and in water each year produce enough food for five hundred times the present population.

Dr. Bonner shows that our present food practises are wasteful. Most people eat only cultivated plants, which comprise only one-fourth of the total supply. We feed about half our food to animals, and animals eat only part of it. We then eat the animal food, but get from it only ten percent the original caloric content. We can - and probably will - grow crops of plants which we shall eat in their entirety. We might even develop a beet with the nutriment of meat and other vegetables stored with fat.

A billion acres of land would become available for agriculture if the warm and cold areas now neglected were farmed, as they could be if irrigated with distilled sea-water, of which there will be plenty in the atomic era.

To read such calculations is to shake off two nightmares. But two others remain, which the scientists cannot dispel. They are the possibility of nuclear war, and the inadequacy of education. Clearly, there will be no civilization a hundred years from now if they are not dealt with - starting right away.

Gayland Avery,

The scientists would seem to have caught a glimpse of Utopia. Sir Winston Churchill said, "Man in this moment of his history has emerged in greater supremacy over the forces of nature than has ever been dreamed of before. There lies before him, if he wishes, a golden age. He has only to conquer his worst and last enemy---himself."

Goodnight and good luck!

Edward R. Murrow Wed., May 23, 1956

This is the news:

The first question put to President Eisenhower at his news conference today concerned the disagreement among the armed services on defense. A reporter asked Mr. Eisenhower if he saw anything in the situation that would require his direct intervention. By recording, here is his reply:

(tape runs 2:40
(
(ends on cue: "---between
(
(Admiral X and General Y."

President Eisenhower said that Russia's announcement that it is cutting its armed forces may be a "streamlining operation"... part of the changing defense concept. If it turns out, he said, that the Russians are really reducing their armed strength (and not just redeploying manpower), that would be "real progress".

Mr. Eisenhower told his news conference that the United States believes Egypt made a mistake in recognizing Communist China. But this, he said, does not mean the United States will be unable... or unwilling... to continue its effort to cooperate with Egypt. Mr. Eisenhower stood by the Administration decision to sell 16-million dollars' worth of arms to Saudi Arabia. He called that "a modest amount".

The President said he is against cutting taxes at this time, despite the prospect of a surplus of 1-billion, 800-million dollars in the budget. A start must be made, he said, on reducing the national debt. "There is such a thing as fiscal integrity."

The House Foreign Affairs Committee gave final approval today to a foreign aid bill... and sent it to the House floor. The measure gives President Eisenhower a billion dollars less than he asked for the military assistance program. It also denies him authority to commit the United States to long-term economic aid.

The House completed Congressional action today on the farm bill, and sent it to Mr. Eisenhower for his signature. Republican leaders predict that the President will sign it.

The Labor Department reported rising employment today in virtually all sections of the country, except in the auto manufacturing centers.

→

Detroit and Flint, Michigan... South Bend, Indiana... and Kenosha, Wisconsin... were designated as surplus labor areas, warranting federal aid.

In a speech tonight... in Phoenix, Arizona... Attorney General Brownell said it is important to uphold the Supreme Court. "Our duty," he said, "is to support each branch of government, in the performance of its functions. We must continue to discharge this duty, if we are to avoid anarchy in all government."

Former President Truman today denied saying that the World War Two landings at Salerno and Anzio must have been planned by some "squirrel-headed general." He told reporters, "I'm sorry about it. I don't want to embarrass anybody." Correspondents covering Mr. Truman's visit to Italy, still say they quoted him accurately.

In Paris, Pierre Mendes-France resigned today from the French cabinet. Mendes-France was deputy premier and minister of state without portfolio in the Mollet government. He resigned because he disagrees with Mollet on Algerian policy.

Edward R. Murrow: May 23, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

It seems to be agreed by well-informed onlookers in Washington that the inter-service dispute in the Pentagon is not just an ordinary row, like so many disputes in the past. It is the result of our having scrapped many traditional concepts of warfare, and of trying in a desperate hurry to get ahead, or keep abreast, of ultra-modern developments. It is being pointed out that the clash of opinions is not something that can be safely smothered in secrecy. The differences need airing because they need discussion. They are too grave, and about things too new, to be resolved without it. The armed services are feeling their way. Strong divergences in theory and evaluation not only are to be expected, but under the circumstances are highly desirable. This explanation is being given today as though to reassure the public.

However, those who say such things seem hardly to realize how little reassurance they are bringing. Actually we could sleep sounder if this were just an ordinary inter-service row. For then it could be settled by cracking some heads together, by a resignation, or a promotion, by the military and departmental devices for maintaining discipline. Then the country could relax, feel safe, and go on believing that the big problems of defense already have been solved and we are getting not only safety, but our full money's worth for the hundreds of billions of dollars that defense is costing.

The fact that the service departments are in deep difficulties over the new concepts of warfare can be emphasized without the least disrespect. To say it is not criticism. President Eisenhower himself said today we live in a time of revolutionary changes. But it isn't going to calm or educate the public simply to say that the men in the services are not moved by ambition, or lust for power, or loyalty to their own branches. What the public begins to realize, and should be made to realize, is that the problems of defense are far more challenging at this hour than it had been allowed to believe.

To be sure, the layman cannot grasp the essentials of problems that divide the experts. But there are some things the lay public can ask pertinent questions about. Take the news, for example, of yesterday's test of the army's Nike rocket, which is very much in dispute. The Nike is the army's ground-to-air anti-aircraft weapon, on which to some extent the safety of our main cities is going to depend. So far as the public knows, some cities already are ringed, and others will be, by installations to fire Nikes at an invading aircraft. Yesterday, in New Mexico, an unmanned guided target was flown over the proving grounds, and two Nikes were fired to bring it down. One of them scored hits on the target, but the device came to earth by parachute. However, the army said that the Nike would have destroyed any aircraft that received the damage the target showed.

The layman is bound to be puzzled by this test, for the accounts of the altitude of the target vary from sixteen thousand feet to thirty-five thousand feet. A little while ago this would have seemed quite an altitude, enough to insure the safety of a guarded city. But only a few days ago, the hydrogen bomb was dropped from a B-52 from an altitude of fifty thousand feet. Could a Nike have reached this altitude, and knocked out the B-52? Suppose it could, would that of itself spell much protection for a city? Would not the interception of an invading bomber have to take place long before a city was reached, and if the answer is yes, that this is already being provided, then what is the precise value of the Nike? If the answer is that it would bring down a plane that got through the intercepting cordon, how much protection would there be if the plane dropped a hydrogen bomb before it was brought down, or came down with a hydrogen bomb that then exploded? General Twining, at Secretary Wilson's extraordinary news conference, called the Nike the "best weapon we have." If this is so, the layman is in need of much more education about the defense against airborne atomic weapons. Army Spokesman say the "Nike B" will have greater Range and altitude.

The story of Billy Mitchell is now one of the legends of our time. This also was a dispute not born of lesser service rivalries. It dealt with the future, which General Mitchell saw better than his contemporaries. If we now face conditions as revolutionary for us as the airplane was in the time of Billy Mitchell, it would seem that the wider the discussion of the problems the better. Presumably there won't be any Billy Mitchells in thePentagon disputes today. But national safety may be involved even more than in his day.

Word for Today

Military concepts are changing. The President does not object to argument among the armed services, so long as it constitutes a search for truth---a ~~search now doubly important~~. He might have taken for his text these words by William Penn: "In all debate, let Truth be your aim, not victory or an unjust interest. And endeavor to gain, rather than expose, thy Antagonist."

Goodnight and good luck!

CBS RADIO DIVISION

EDWARD R. MURROW

Wednesday, May 23, 1956
7:45 - 8:00 P.M.

MURROW: ... The first question put to President Eisenhower at his news conference today, concerned the disagreement among the Armed Services on defense. A reporter asked Mr. Eisenhower if he saw anything in the situation that would require his direct intervention. By recording, here is hiw reply:

PRES. EISENHOWER: I'm Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Services as well as President, and there's no important question involving the military policy in which I'm not involved or you might say in which I intervene, of course I must. I think we should get this thing among the services in proper perspective. We are going through a period where any sensible man can see is one of change, fluidity, where we are deserting doctrines that have long been held sacrosanct in the services, and we're going into another kind of a world with respect to all military formation, a policy and organization, and equipment, even. Now if there weren't, in thistime, a good, strong arguments among the services I would be frightened, indeed. The only thing in which you might hear me say that Iwas unhappy is sometimes a way in which these arguments are conducted. It has been a tradition with military services that every single person and anybody on the staff or a subordinate commander is free to fight for his point of view to the ultimate of his strength. Which he should do. And he's not doing his duty unless he does. Finally, there reaches a place in the military command where, depending on the nature of the question, a decision is made. Then all loyally support that decision. So, as far asthe argument itself is concerned, I believe it should be ... go ahead, and carried out just as far as it possibly can be, to exhaust every atom of logic and of fact, even of decent deductions that we can bring on everything that affects a problem. But I do say that we can still do it in such a way that we don't alarm everybody else. Every day brings new problems to the military. You don't have the comfortable period when the greatest change between let's say (indistinct) when they first used gun powder and our Civil War was finally ... the fact that you just, in the Civil War, introduced a breech-loading cannon instead of a muzzle-loading ... and a breech-loading rifles have a muzzle (indistinct) ... This is a very comprehensive, all-important subject in the United States and all of us shouldstudy ... but in a spirit of investigation and honest searching for the truth and not just to see whether we can promote a fight between Admiral X and General Y.

MURROW: President Eisenhower said that Russia's announcement that it is cutting its armed forces may be a streamlining operation, part of a changing defense concept.

(30)

Ed. trans. P. O.

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

WEDNESDAY, MAY 23, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M.,E.S.T.

This is the news:

The first question put to President Eisenhower at his news conference today, concetned the disagreement among the Armed Services on defense. A reporter asked Mr. Eisenhower if he saw anything in the situation that would require his direct intervention. By recording, here is his reply:

EISENHOWER: I'm Commander in Chief of the Armed Services as well as President, and there's no important question involving the military policy in which I'm not involved or you might say in which I intervene, of course I must. I think we should get this thing among the services in proper perspective. We are going through a period where any sensible man can see is one of change, fluidity, where we are deserting doctrines that have long been held sacrosanct in the services, and we're going into another kind of a world with respect to all military formation, a policy and organization, and equipment, even. Now if there weren't, in this time, good, strong arguments among the services I would be frightened, indeed. The only thing in which you might hear me say that I was unhappy is sometimes a way in which these arguments are conducted. It has been a tradition with military services that every single person and anyoody on the staff or a subordinate commander is free to fight for his point of view to the ultimate of his strength. Which he should do. And he's not doing his duty unless he does. Finally, there reaches a place in the military command where, depending on the nature of the question, a decision is made. Then all loyally support that decision. So as far as the argument itself is concerned, I believe it should be...go ahead, and carried out just as far as it possibly can be, to exhaust every atom of logic and of fact, even of decent deductions that we can bring on every-thing that affects a problem. But I do say that we can still do it in such a way that we don't alarm everybody else. Every day brings new problems to the military. You don't have the comfortable period when the greatest change between say (indistinct) when they first used gun powder and our Civil war was finally.....the fact that you just, in the Civil War, introduced a breech-loading cannon instead of a muzzle-loading....and a breech-loading rifles have a muzzle (indistinct)..This is a very comprehensive, all-important subject in the United States and all of us should study.....but in a spirit of investigation and honest searching for the truth and not just to see whether we can promote a fight between Admiral X and General Y.

MURROW: President Eisenhower said that Russia's announcement that it is cutting its armed forces may be a streamlining operation, part of a changing defense concept. If it turns out, he said, that the Russians are really reducing their armed strength (and not just redeploying manpower), that would be "real progress."

Mr. Eisenhower told his news conference that the United States believes Egypt made a mistake in recognizing Communist China. But this, he said, does not mean the United States will be unable..or unwilling..to continue its effort to cooperate with Egypt. Mr. Eisenhower stood by the Administration decision to sell 16-million dollars' worth of arms to Saudi Arabia. He called that "a modest amount."

The President said he is against cutting taxes at this time, despite the prospect of a surplus of 1-billion, 800-million dollars in the budget. A start must be made, he said, on reducing the national debt. "There is such a thing as fiscal integrity."

The House Foreign Affairs Committee gave final approval today to a foreign aid bill..and sent it to the House floor. The measure gives President Eisenhower a billion dollars less than he asked for the military assistance program. It also denies him authority to commit the United States to long-term economic aid.

The House completed Congressional action today on the farm bill, and sent it to Mr. Eisenhower for his signature. Republican leaders predict that the President will sign it.

The Labor Department reported rising employment today in virtually all sections of the country, except in the auto manufacturing centers, Detroit and Flint, Michigan..South Bend, Indiana...and Kenosha, Wisconsin...were designated as surplus labor areas warranting federal aid.

In a speech tonight...in Phoenix, Arizona,... Attorney General Brownell said it is important to uphold the Supreme Court. "Our duty", he said, "is to support each branch of government in the performance of its functions. We must continue to discharge this duty, if we are to avoid anarchy in all government."

Former President Truman today denied saying that the World War Two landings at Salerno and Anzio must have been planned by some "squirrel-headed general." He told reporters, "I'm sorry obout it. I don't want to embarrass anybody." Correspondents covering Mr. Truman's visit to Italy still say they quoted him accurately.

In Paris, Pierre Mendes-France resigned today from the French cabinet. Mendes-France was deputy premier and minister of state without portfolio in the Mollet government. He resigned because he disagrees with Mollet on Algerian policy.

It seems to be agreed by well informed onlookers in Washington that the inter-service dispute in the Pentagon is not just an ordinary row, like so many disputes in the past. It is the result of our having scrapped many traditional concepts of warfare, and of trying in a desperate hurry to get ahead, or keep abreast, of ultra-modern developments. It is being pointed out that the clash of opinions is not something that can be safely smothered in secrecy. The differences need airing because they need discussion. They are too grave, and about things too new, to be resolved without it. The armed services are feeling their way. Strong divergences in theory and evaluation not only are to be expected, but under the circumstances are highly desirable. This explanation is being given today as though to reassure the public.

However, those who say such things seem hardly to realize how little reassurance they are bringing. Actually we could sleep sounder if this were just an ordinary inter-service row. For then it could be settled by cracking some heads together, by a resignation, or a promotion, by the military and departmental devices for maintaining discipline. Then the country could relax, feels safe, and go on believing that the big problems of defense already have been solved and we are getting not only safety, but our full money's worth for the hundreds of billions of dollars that defense is costing.

The fact that the service departments are in deep difficulties over the new concepts of warfare can be emphasized without the least disrespect. To say it is not criticism. President Eisenhower himself said today we live in a time of revolutionary changes. But it isn't going to calm or educate the public simply to say that the men in the services are not moved by ambition, or lust for power, or loyalty to their own branches. What the public begins to realize, and should be made to realize, is that the problems of defense are far more challenging at this hour than it had been allowed to believe.

To be sure, the laymen cannot grasp the essentials of problems that divide the experts. But there are some things the lay public can ask pertinent questions about. Take the news, for example, of yesterday's test of the army's Nike rocket, which is very much in dispute. The Nike is the army's ground-to-air anti-aircraft weapon, on which to some extent the safety of our main cities is going to depend. So far as the public knows, some cities already are ringed, and others will be, by installations to fire Nikes at invading aircraft. Yesterday, in New Mexico, an unmanned guided tarket was flown over the proving grounds, and two Nikes were fired to bring it down. One of them scored hits on the target, but the device came to earth by parachute. However, the army said that the Nike would have destroyed any aircraft that received the damage the target showed.

The layman is bound to be puzzled by this test, for the accounts of the altitude of the target vary from sixteen thousand feet to thirty-five thousand feet. A little while ago this would have seemed quite an altitude, enough to insure the safety of a guarded city. But only a few days ago, thy hydrogen bomb was dropped from a B-52 from an altitude of fifty thousand feet. Could a Nike have reached this altitude, and knocked out the B-52? Suppose it could, would not the interception of an invading bomber have to take place long before a city was reached, and if the answer is yes, that this is already being provided, then what is the precise value of the Nike? If the answer is that it would bring down a plane that got through the intercepting cordon, how much protection would there be if the plane dropped a hydrogen bomb before it was brought down, or came down with a hydrogen bomb that then exploded? General Twining, at Secretary Wilson's extraordinary news conference, called the Nike the "best weapon we have." If this is so, the layman is in need of much more education about the defense against airborne atomic weapons. Army spokesman say the "Nike B" will have greater range and altitude.

The story of Billy Mitchell is now one of the legends of our time. This also was a dispute not born of lesser service rivalries. It dealt with the future, which General Mitchell saw better than his contemporaries. If we now can face conditions as revolutionary for us as the airplane was in the time of Billy Mithhell, it would seem that the wilder the discussion of the problems the better. Presumably there won't be any Billy Mitchells in the Pentagon disputes today. But national safety may be involved even more than in his day.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERICAL

MURROW: Military concepts are changing. The President does not object to argument among the armed services so long as it constitutes a search for truth. He might have taken for his text these words by William Penn: "In all debate, let Truth be your aim, not victory or an unjust interest. And endeavor to gain, rather than expose, thy Antagonist."

Good Night and Good Luck!

Edward R. Murrow Thurs., May 24, 1956

This is the news:

The White House said today that it "would not be surprised" if the Joint Chiefs of Staff accepted an invitation to visit Moscow. The White House spokesman... Murray Snyder... hastened to add that, so far, no invitation had been received. A spokesman at the Pentagon said "serious consideration" would be given to such an invitation, "depending on the conditions imposed." These statements were in reaction to a story carried this morning by the New York Daily News. The News said Russia had told Washington that it would welcome a visit by the entire U.S. joint chiefs of staff "for an inspection of the Soviet armed forces." The newspaper attributed its information to United Nations sources. Other reports from Washington say that the Air Force chief of staff... General Twining... has been extended an invitation to attend the celebration of Aviation Day in Moscow on June 24th. These reports are based on a conversation which is said to have taken place last Monday between a Pentagon officer and an attache at the Soviet embassy. The invitation would apparently apply to Twining and two or three other top Air Force officers. Indications are that, so far, Twining has not received a formal invitation... but that one will be forthcoming.

The Army asked for new aircraft today... capable of tracking missiles beyond the combat zone assigned to Army aviation. The request appeared in a paper called "The Army Aviation Fact Sheet." An agreement between the Army and Air Force... in 1952... limited the Army to operation of aircraft weighing not more than 5-thousand pounds within a designated combat zone that would normally be from 50 to 100 miles deep. The Army said it needs aircraft of wider range to spot and track targets for artillery and guided missiles.... and obtaining information about the enemy "not otherwise obtainable by air reconnaissance agencies of the other services."

The Senate Internal Security Subcommittee called formally today for the removal of Soviet United Nations Delegate Sobolev from the United States. The subcommittee accused Sobolev's staff of using "coercion, force and duress", in trying to induce nine Russian sailors to return home. The sailors had asked... and received... asylum in this country. Four of them stayed. Two lesser members of the Soviet delegation already have been expelled from the United States, in connection with the case.

The Senate passed a housing bill today, authorizing construction of 135-thousand public housing units a year for the next four years. President Eisenhower had asked for construction of only 35-thousand units for each of the next two years. The measure now goes to the House.

The White House today issued a "priority list" of legislation President Eisenhower wants Congress to pass before it adjourns in July. Among the measures listed as "very important" are the programs for school and highway construction, civil rights, housing and foreign aid. The White House said Mr. Eisenhower still has "great interest" in statehood for Hawaii and amendment of the Taft-Hartley Act... and is "not giving up on any of his other legislative recommendations." The farm bill was passed yesterday and is on the President's desk.

The government reports that the cost of ~~living last month went up~~ two-tenths ~~of one percent.~~ The rise ~~means an automatic cent-an-hour~~ pay increase ~~for a million workers in the auto, aircraft and farm equipment industries.~~

Secretary of Commerce Weeks told a news conference today that the national economy is "spotty". "Automobiles, farm implements and some other industries," he said, "have sagged off more than we thought they would." (More than 120-thousand workers are idle in Detroit). "But the encouraging fact," Weeks said, "is that every sector of industry is spending money, showing that they have confidence that this economy will move ahead."

Henry Ford the Second told a stockholders meeting today that in the next two years, the Ford Motor Company will spend nearly a billion dollars for plant expansion and improvement. He described the long-term future as "particularly bright". But this year, he said, sales and profits will be down.

Egypt announced today that Premier Nasser has accepted an invitation to visit Red China. The date of the visit has not been fixed. An invitation for an Egyptian military mission to visit Peiping was also accepted. (Egypt announced its recognition of Communist China last week.)

In Jordan today, the Arab Legion got a new commander. The new chief of staff is a member of the so-called "free officers" group which persuaded King Hussein... last March... to dismiss the British commander, General Glubb. He had called Glubb "the worst enemy to Anglo-Jordan understanding."

The United Nations secretary general... Dag Hammarskjold... said today that five governments have agreed to send 21 more officers to serve as truce supervisors in Palestine. He identified the governments as Australia, New Zealand, Norway and Sweden and Canada.

Fighting against rebel forces continued today in Algeria. The French say in one action, in Northeastern Algeria, 39 rebels were killed.

Disagreement over Algerian policy has caused political repercussions in France. I asked my colleague David Schoenbrun if he would give us that reaction. Here is his report, recorded tonight from Paris.

(tape runs 6:14, ends on cue, "Now back to ERM in NY."

That was the report of David Schoenbrun from Paris, on the reaction to the Algerian stalemate. This is Edward R. Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. (pause) But first, here is Hugh Holder.

Word for Today

Another ~~political~~ coalition in France has come unstuck. The French humorist, Pierre Daninos, once remarked: "France is the only country in the world where, if you add 10 citizens, you have not made an addition. You have made 20 divisions." Mendes-France is making a new endeavor. As William the Silent said, many centuries ago, "Even without hope, a man can try."

Goodnight and good luck!

CBS RADIO DIVISION

EDWARD R. MURROW

Thursday, May 24, 1956
7:45-8:00 p.m.

MURROW: ..... Fighting against rebel forces continued today in Algeria. The French say in one action in northeastern Algeria thirty-nine rebels were killed. I asked my colleague, David Schoenbrun, if he would give us the reaction in France to the situation. Here is his report, recorded tonight from Paris.

SCHOENBRUN: The resignation of Mendes-France from the Guy Mollet Government has set off a critical debate on Algeria, the gravest issue facing France and one that is of great concern to statesmen throughout the entireworld. In New Delhi today, Prime Minister Nehru conferred with the French Ambassador, who asked them for a further clarification of the new Indian peace proposal to end the war in Algeria. In Belgrade, an envoy of the Arab Liberation Committee is conferring with another potential peace-maker, Marshal Tito, of Yugoslavia, and in Morocco the Sultan, newly independent ruler of a former French protectorate, is trying to find a formula to make peace between his blood cousins and his new allies, the Algerians and the French.

Here, in France, millions of people are wondering and worryingabout their future, the future of their nation. Most Frenchmen are convinced that the struggle for Algeria is a struggle for the survival of France as a world power and the survival of French democracy itself. Mendes stated in his letter of resignation yesterday that he could no longer approve the Algerian policy of this Government. He criticized Gy Mollet for using military force alone to try to quell a revolution. Mendes insists that simultaneously with power there must be political and social reforms to win the masses of the people away from the rebels, otherwise, the terror will spread and he predicts disaster. It's disaster, not only for France but for the whole world if the flames engulf the key countries of the Mediterranean. For French-men particularly it is disaster for they are convinced that the struggle for Algeria is a struggle for the survival of France as a world power and of French democracy itself, thus, when a man of the national and world prestige of a Mendes-France says the country is heading for disaster things are very bad, indeed, and so the Prime Minister has had to move swiftly to counteract the shocking effect of Mendes' resignation. This morning he decided to schedule a major parliamentary debate on Algeria, to seek a confidence vote that would impress both the Algerian rebels and the French soldiers that this nation means business. Such a demonstration is urgently needed. With the advent of spring weather a few weeks ago, the rebels launched a new and powerful offensive;every day brings a mounting toll of dead in Algeria.

Even more serious is the effect on the morale of the armed forces, not the regular troops so much as the reservists who are being called back to the colors. Frenchmen have been fighting now almost without interruption for seventeen years, The "black series," as they call it here in Paris, began with World War 11, in 1939, then five years of the resistance movement and then shortly after liberation Frenchmen were fighting again in the jungles and marshes of the Red River in Indochina, a cruel war that lasted eight years, the longest of the century, and now, today, another call to the colors in Algeria. The latest (drowned out) of men called up this week includes thousands of married men and fathers, men who had just started to build a new life, a business, profession, a family, and now they must give it up and pick up a gun once again. The grumbling, the discontent, are widespread. Hardly a day goes by without a protest demonstration. They even found a new trick to slow up the transport to North Africa to express their anger. It's a rope trick. As soon as the troop train begins to pull out a soldier rips the emergency cord and stops the train. A big troop train was stalled all day yesterday by this new French version of the rope trick, so, there's potent reason to hold an urgent debate, to seek a confidence vote from the people's representatives, for only a major debate can air and answer the charges raised by Mendes-France. Why did Mendes do this, a man of unquestioned patriotism and political acumen, knowing the gravity of the time and the repercussions of his charges? Well, for one thing, as Premier Guy Mollet himself has said, Mendes is sincere. He is a tortured man. He could not stay in a government whose policy he disapproves. That's a generous appraisal from Mollet, the man whom Mendes is attacking. This observer would agree with Mollet's estimate, - Mendes is a sincere man, too patriotic to play politics in a time of revolution. Nevertheless, I would suggest that politics are inevitably and very much on his mind as they affect the timing of his resignation. Since Mendes is convinced that the current policy is leading France to disaster, then the sooner he precipitates a crisis and a change of policy the better. As for his own future role, the sooner he divorces himself from the mistakes of today, as he sees them, the more chance he has of saving France in the future. That, indeed, is the role in which he sees himself , in which, by temperament and experience, he is cast, the role of a savior, the man to whom people turn in national crisis. Three years ago this summer, "Mr. France" was called to power after the catastrophe of Dienbienphu and now another colonial crisis is menacing France. Mendes wants a free hand a free voice to meet that new threat. That is the role, the role of savior and prophet of doom, that was the role of Charles de Gaulle the first ten years of this fourth Republic, but de Gaulle is the hero of the Right and Mendes is the hero of the Left. He is a Left-Wing de Gaulle and since de Gaulle's name is again being brought forward by the Right today to save France the time is ripe for Mendes to reassume his competitive role as savior from the Left. This is the background to the extraordinary scene being played out here in Paris tonight, a prelude to a new drama. The curtain rises next week.

Now, back to Edward R. Murrow in New York.

Ed.trans.@A.A.Cardiff (30)

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

THURSDAY, MAY 24, 1956
7:45-- 8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

The White House said today that it "would not be surprised" if the Joint Chiefs of Staff accepted an invitation to visit Moscow. The White House spokesman..Murray Snyder..hastened to add that, so far, no invitation had been received. A spokesman at the Pentagon said "serious consideration" would be given to such an invitation, "depending on the conditions imposed." These statements were in reaction to a story carried this morning by the New York Daily News. The News said Russia had told Washington that it would welcome a visit by the entire U.S. joint chiefs of staff "for an inspection of the Soviet armed forces." The newspaper attributed its information to the United Nations sources. Other reports from Washington say that the Air Force chief of staff...General Twining..has been extended an invitition to attend the celebration of Aviation Day in Moscow on June 24th. These reports are based on a conversation which is said to have taken place last Monday between a Pentagon oficer and an attache at the Soviet embassy. The invitation would apparently apply to Twining and two or three other top Air Force officers. Indications are that, so far, Twining has not received a formal invitation.. tht that one will be forthcoming.

The Senate Internal Security Subcommittee called formally today for the removal of Soviet United Nations Delegate Sobolev from the United States. The subcommittee accused Sobolev's staff of using "coercion, force and duress", in trying to induce nine Russian sailors to return home. The sailors had asked..add received asylum in this country, Four of them stayed. Two lesser members of the Soviet delegation already have been expelled from the United States, in connection with the case.

The Senate passed a housing bill today, authorizing construction of 135-thousand public housing units a year for the next four years. President Eisenhower had asked for construction on only 35-thousand units for each of the next two years. The meauure now goes to the House.

The white House today issued a "priority list" of legislation President Eisenhower wants Congress to pass before it adjourns in July. Among the measures listed as "very important" are the programs for school and highway construction, civil rights, housing and foreign aid. The White House said Mr. Eisenhower still has "great interest" in statehood for Hawaii and amendment of the Taft-Hartley Act..and is "not giving up on any of his other legislative recommendations." The farm bill was passed yesterday and is on the President's desk.

Secretary of Commerce Weeks told a news conference today that the national economy is "spotty". "Automobiles, farm implements and some other industries", he said, "have sagged off more than we thought they would." (More than 120-thousand workers are idle in Detroit.) "But the encouragaing fact," Weeks said, "is that every sector of industry is spending money, showing that they have confidence that this economy will move ahead."

Henry Ford the Second told a stockholders meeting today that in the next two years, the Ford Motor Company will spend nearly a billion dollars for plant expansion and improvement. He described the long-term future as "particularly brihgt." But this year, he said, sales and profits will be down.

Egypt announced today that Premier Nasser has accepted an invitation to visit Red China. The date of the visit has not been fixed. An invitation for an Egyptian military mission to visit Peiping was also accepted. Egypt announced its recognition of Communist China last week.

In Jordan today, the Arab Legion got a new commander. The new chief is a member of the so-called "free officers" group which persuaded King Hussein...last March...to dismiss the British commander, General Glubb. He had called Glubb "the worst enemy of Anglo-Jordan understanding."

The United Nations secretary general...Dag Hammarskjold..said today that five governments have agreed to send 21 more officers to serve as truce supervisors in Palestine. He identified the governments as Australia, New Zealand Norway and Sweden and Canada.

Fighting against rebel forces continued today an Algeria. The French say in one action, in Northeastern Algeria, 39 rebels were killed.

Disagreement ofer Algerian policy has caused political repercussions in France. I asked my colleague David Schoenbrun if he would give us that reaction. Here is his report, recorded tonight from Paris.

SCHOENBRUN: The resignation of Mendes-France from the Guy Mollet Government has set off a critical debate on Algeria, the gravest issue facing France and one that is of great concern to statesmen throughout the entire world. In New Delhi today, Prime Minister Nehru conferred with the French Ambassador, who asked them for a further clarification of the new Indian peace proposal to end war with Algeria. In Belgrade, an envoy of the Arab Liberation Committee in conferring with another potential peace-maker, Marshal Tito, of Yugoslavia and in Morocco, the Sultan, newly independent ruler of a former French protectorate, is trying to find a formula to make peace between his blood cousins and his new allies, the Algerians and the French.

Here, in France, millions of people are wondering and worrying about their future, the future of their nation. Most Frenchmen are concerned that the struggle for Algeria ia a struggle for the survival of France as a world power and the survival of French democracy itself. Mendes stated in his letter of resignation yesterday that he could no longer approve the Algerian policy of this government. He criticized Guy Mollet for using military forces alone to try to quell a revolution. Mendes insists that simultaneously with power there must be political and social reforms to win the masses of the people away from the rebels, otherwise, the terror will spread and he predicts disaster. It's disaster, not only for France but for the whole world if the flames engulf the key countries of the mediterranean. For Frenchmen particularly it is disaster for they are convinced that the struggle for Algeria is a struggle for the survival of France as a world power and of French democracy itself, thus, when a man of the national and world prestige of a Mendes-France says the country is heading for disaster things are very bad, indeed, and so the Prime Minister has had to move swiftly to counteract the shocking effect of Mendes resigantion. This morning he decided to schedule a major parliamentary debate on Algeria, to seek a confidence vote that would impress both the Algerian rebels and the French soldiers that this nation means business. Such a demonstration is urgently needed. With the advent of spring weather a few weeks ago, the reblel launched a new and powerful offensive; every day brings a mounting toll of dead in Algeria.

Even more serious is the effect on the morale of the armed forces, not the regular troops so much as the reservists who are being called back to the colors. Frenchmen have been fighting now almost without interruption for seventeen years,. The "black series" as they call it here in Paris, began with World War II, in 1939, then five years of the resistance movement and then shortly after liberation Frenchmen were fighting again in the jungles and marshes of the Red River in Indochina, a cruel war that lasted eight years, the longest of the century, and now, today, another call to the colors in Algeria. The latest (drowned out) of men called up this week includes thousands of married men and fathers, men who had just started to build a new life, a business, profession, a family, and now they must give it up and pick up a gun once again. The grumbling, the discontent, are widespread. Hardly a day goes by without a protest demonstration. They even found a new trick to slow up the transport to North Africa to express their anger. It's a rope trick. As soon as the troop train begins to pull out, a soldier rips the emergency cord and stops the train. A big troop train was stalled all day yesterday by this new French version of the rope trick, so, there's potent reason to hold an urgent debate, to seek a confidence vote from the peoples representatives, for only a major debate can air an answer the charges raised by Mendes-France. Why did Mendes do this, a man of unquestioned patriotism and political acumen, knowing the gravity of the time and repercussions of his charges? Well, for one thing, as Premier Guy Mollet himself has said, Mendes is sincere. He is a tortured man. He could not stay in a government whose policy he disapproves. That's a generous appraisal from Mollet, the man whom Mendes is attacking. This observer would agree with Mollet's estimate, Mendes is a sincere man, too patriotic to play politics in a time of revolution. Nevertheless, I would suggest that politics are inevitably and very much on his mind as they affect the timing of his resignation. Since Mendes is convinced that the current policy is leading France to disaster, then the sooner he precipitates a crisis and a change of policy the better. As for his own future role, the sooner he divorces himself from the mistakes of today, as he sees them, the more chance he has of saving France in the future. That, indeed, is the role in which he sees himself, in which, by temperment and experience, his is cast, the role of a savior, the man to whom people turn in national crisis. Three years ago this summer, "Mr.France" was called to power after the catastrophe of Dienbienphu and now another colonial crisis is menacing France. Mendes wants a free hand, a free voice to meet that new threat. That is the role, the role of savior and prophet of doom, th was the role of Charles de Gaulle the first ten years of this fourth Republic, but de Gaulle is the hero of the Right and Mendes is the hero of the Left. He is a Left-Wing de Gaulle and since de Gaulle's name is again being brought forward by the Right today to save France the time is ripe for Mendes to reassume his competitive role as savior from the Left. This is the back ground to the extraordinary scene being played out here in Paris tonight, a prelude to a new drama. The curtain rises next week.

Now, back to Ed Murrow in New York.

MURROW: That was the report of David Schoenbrun from Paris, on the reaction to the Algerian stalemate. This is Edward R. Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. But first, here is Hugh Holder.

HOLDER: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: Another coalition in France has come unstuck. The French humorist, Pierre Daninos, once remarked: "France is the only country in the world where, if you add 10 citizens, you have not made an addition. You have made 20 divisions." Mendes-France is making a new endeavor. As William the Silent said, many centuries ago, "Even without hope, a man can try."

Good Night and Good Luck!

Edward R. Murrow Fri., May 25, 1956

This is the news:

President Eisenhower said today that Communism is, "in deepest sense, a gigantic failure," although it has subjugated many nations. People dominated by Communism, he said, have kept their faith, and dream of the day they will be free. He suggested an educational program, to help needy countries develop their natural resources. And he called for establishment of "a free United States of Europe".

Mr. Eisenhower spoke at the commencement exercises at Baylor University, in Waco, Texas, where he received an honorary degree. The speech was billed as a major foreign policy address, and I should like to discuss it in further detail, in a few minutes.

The President was in Waco only a few hours... and is already back in Washington. When he arrived in Waco this morning, he was greeted at the airport by Democratic Governor Shivers (who supported him in 1952), and by Jack Porter, the Republican national committeeman from Texas. Porter said yesterday that the President's visit "certainly would not hurt his chances of carrying Texas again this year."

→

Great Britain announced today that the British secretary of state for air has been invited to attend Russia's Aviation Day celebration in Moscow on June 24. A spokesman for the British air ministry said the invitation is "under consideration". The United States Air Force chief of staff... General Twining... has received a similar invitation. Secretary of State Dulles said today that he understands Russia has issued "quite a lot" of these invitations. "Then," said a reporter, "you don't consider the invitation for American Air Force officers too significant?" Mr. Dulles said no, he did not.

Congress was briefed on Russian airpower today by General Partridge, chief of the Continental Air Defense Command. Partridge told a Senate committee that between now and 1958, "any attack by the Russians, involving a large number of jet aircraft, would give us difficulties from an operational point of view." At present, he said, Russian jet engines are more powerful than ours, and their interceptor fighters are "slightly superior". He added that new American models, now in production, should change the situation. Partridge warned that a defense against mass destruction weapons, such as the intercontinental ballistic missile, "is going to be exceedingly difficult." He said development of American missiles for that defensive role, is equally urgent as development of missiles for offense.

Our Present operational Fighters Do not have speed or altitude to intercept Russia's intercontinental bombers

The Senate voted 115-million dollars today for the United States Information Agency. The bill was approved only after Democratic Leader Johnson promised a full investigation of the agency's operations. (Senator Ellender of Louisiana had charged it was "wasting money", by giving foreign countries the wrong kind of information). The Voice of America and the overseas library program are operated by the United States Information Agency. Republican Senator Kuchel disagreed with Ellender. He said employes of the agency had done "a magnificent job."

The Senate Finance Committee approved a Social Security bill today, and sent it to the Senate floor. The measure extends Social Security coverage to more than 200-thousand additional persons, including lawyers and dentists. And it lowers the retirement age for widows from 65 to 62. An amendment approved by the House... setting up a system of benefits for totally disabled persons at age 50... was eliminated. So was a provision for payments to single women and wives of retired husbands at the age of 62.

Finis J. Garrett, Democratic leader of the House of Representatives during the Wilson administration, died today at his home in Washington. Mr. Garrett served 12 terms as a representative from Tennessee. ~~He retired last year as chief judge of the United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals.~~

At the United Nations today, the African-Asian countries decided to demand Security Council consideration of the revolt in Algeria. France, in the past, has opposed United Nations intervention on grounds that Algeria is part of metropolitan France... and consequently a domestic issue.

News correspondents in Algeria were placed on a war footing today. The French resident minister... Robert LaCoste... issued a set of rules forbidding correspondents to report French casualties and operational plans without official authorization. They are virtually the same rules that were in effect during the Indo-china War.

Saudi Arabia today accused Britain of commiting "atrocities" in the Aden protectorate. The atrocity charge referred to reports that British aircraft recently strafed and destroyed a number of trucks entering Aden from the direction of Saudi Arabia.

Russia and Great Britain signed a new fishing agreement today in Moscow. The new agreement runs five years and allows British fighermen in the Barents Sea to operate as close as three miles from Soviet territory. Under the old agreement, British fishing trawlers were not allowed to operate less than 12 miles from the Russian coast.

Edward R. Murrow: May 25, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

Commencement speeches are usually something to be endured - they seldom make news. Today's speech by the President at Baylor University in Texas was an exception. He said: "Communism poses a threat from which even this mighty nation is not wholly immune. Yet communism is, in the deepest sense, a gigantic failure. Even in the countries it dominates, hundreds of millions who dwell there still cling to their religious faith; still are moved by aspirations for justice and freedom that cannot be answered merely by more steel and bigger bombers; still seek a reward that is beyond money, or place or power; still dream of the day that they walk fearlessly in the fullness of human freedom."

Mr. Eisenhower said that the fundamental principles of human liberty and free government are powerful sources of human energy, loyalty, dedication and guides to enduring success. They are mightier than armaments and armies. "People" he said, "are what count. The most unyielding expression of people's aspirations seems to be an intense nationalism. We Americans believe the rights of the weak are identical with those of the strong. We will continue to hail with satisfaction the birth of each new nation whose people, achieving independence and freedom, become peaceful members of the world community." This attitude is, as the President said, part of the American tradition. It is permissible to hope that the State Department, which is supposed to carry out the President's foreign policy, will take note of his words.

Mr. Eisenhower went on to say that the increase of independent nations creates new political boundaries, and that far too often these political boundaries become serious barriers to the flow of trade. The economic inter-dependence of peoples is increasing. The emotional urge for a completely independent existence may conflict with an equal desire for higher living standards. The President thought we must put to ourselves this question: "How can we help answer both the great desire of peoples for a separate independent existence, and the need for economic union, or at least effective co-operation among them? He suggested again a United States of Europe, outlined the progress that has been made, contended that the failure to achieve more was the result of national pride, the fear of losing cultural and political institutions, and the failure of populations as a whole to grasp the long-term political, economic and security advantages of European union.

The President did not deal with the current economic competition between the United States and the Soviet Union; nor did he say what is recognized and admitted in every allied and neutral capital around the world - namely that if those nations cannot trade with us, they will trade where they can because they must, and that specifically includes trade behind the Iron Curtain.

The President had one idea for strengthening the free world which will commend itself to everyone who believes in the power of ideas. He put it in these words:

TAPE: END CUE: "Responsibility of the people where the school might be built."

This proposal has been likened to a Point Four educational proposal. However, Point Four was not financed by private or philanthropic institutions, but by the Government. And it is to be doubted that our great universities, or private foundations can supply the funds required for such an undertaking. The proposal is imaginative, would certainly be effective in the long run. As a matter of fact the tenor of the President's whole speech was a long-range look at the philosophic and economic problems that confront us as the leader of the free world. He said: "It would be idle to talk of a community of interest with other free people in measures for defense, without recognizing community of interests with them in that which is to be defended."

To this reporter the speech at Baylor was that of a patient and confident man. It may be that this year's graduates will find the realities a little more real than they have been led to expect. But that, after all, has been happening to each ~~college generation~~ graduating class for the last twenty-five years.

Word for Today

President Eisenhower has made a ~~worthwhile and~~ imaginative... proposal for an international education program. Edward Everett said, "Education is a better safeguard of liberty than a standing army." And Robert Millikan once remarked, "If the growth of modern science has taught anything, it is that the method of progress is the method of evolution---not revolution."

Goodnight and good luck!

Eisenhower "Point Four" educational proposal

Excerpt: "The whole free world would be stronger if there existed adequate institutions of modern techniques and sciences in areas of the world where the hunger for knowledge and the ability to use knowledge are unsatisfied because educational facilities are often not equal to the need. I firmly believe that if some or all of our great universities, strongly supported by private foundations that exist throughout our land, would devote themselves to this task, the prospects for a peaceful and prosperous world would be mightily enhanced. In no respect should the purpose of these institutions be to transplant into a new area the attitudes, the forms, the procedures of America. The staffing, the conduct, the curriculum of each school would be the responsibility of the people where the school might be built."

Runs 56 seconds

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

FRIDAY, MAY 25, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

President Eisenhower said today that Communism is "in deepest sense a gigantic failure.", although it has subjugated many nations. People dominated by Communism, he said, have kept their faith and dream of the day they will be free. He suggested an educational program to help needy countries develop their natural resources. And he called for establishment of "a free United States of Europe."

Mr. Eisenhower spoke at the commencement exercises at Baylor University, in Waco, Texas, where he received an honorary degree. The speech wis billed as a major foreign policy address, and I should like to discuss it in further detail in a few minutes.

The President was in Waco only a few hours..and is already back in Washington. When he arrived in Waco this morning, he was greeted at the airport by Democratic Governor Shivers (who supported him in 1952), and by Jack Porter, the Republican national committeeman from Texas. Porter said yesterday that the President's visit "certainly would not hurt his chances of carrying Texas again this year."

Great Britain announced today that the British secretary of state for air has been invited to attend Russia's Aviation Day celebration in Moscow on June 24. A spokesman for the British Air ministrysaid the invitation is "under consideration." The United States Air Force chief of staff...General Twining...has received a similar invitation. Secretary of State Dulles said today that th understands Russia has issued "quite a lot" of these invitations. "Then," said a reporter, "you don't consider the infitation for American Air Force officers too significant?"Mr. Dulles said no, he did not.

Congress was briefed on Russian airpower today by General Partridge, chief of the Continental Air Defense Command. Partridge told a Senate committee that between now and 1958, "any attack by the Russians involving a large number of jet aircraft would give us difficulties from an operational point of view." At present, he said, Russian jet engines are more powerful than ours and their interceptor fighters are "slightly superior". He added that new American models now in production should heange the situation. Partridge warned that a defense against mass destruction weapons, such as the intercontinental ballistic missile, "is going to be exceedingly difficult." He said development of American missiles for that defensive role is equally urgent as development of missiles for offense. But present operational fighters do not have the speed or altitude to intercept Russians intercontinental bombers.

The Senate voted 115-million dollars today for the United States Information Agency. The bill was approved only after Democratic Leader Johnson promised a full investigation of the agency's operations. (Senator Ellender of Louisiana had charged it was "wasting money" by giving foreign countries the wrong kind of information.) The Voice of American and the overseas library program are operated by the United States Information agency. Republican Senator Kuchel disagreed with Ellender. He said employees of the agency had done "A magnificnet job."

The Senate Finance Committee approved a Social Security bill today and sent it to the Senate floor. The measure extends Social Security coverage to more than 200-thousand additional persons, including lawyers and dentists. And it lowers the retirement age for widows from 65 to 62. An amendment approved by the House...setting up a system of benefits for totally disabled persons at age 50--was eliminated. So was a provision for payments to single women and wives of retired husbands at the age of 62.

Finis J. Garrett, Democratic leader of the House of Representatives during the Wilson administration, died today at his home in Washington. Mr. Garrett served 12 terms as a representative from Tennessee.

At the United Nations today, the African - Asian countries decided to demand Security Council consideration of the revolt in Algeria. France, in the past, has opposed United Nations intervention on grounds that Algeria is part of metropolitan France...and consequently a domestic issue.

News correspondents in Algeria were placed on a war footing today. The french resident minister.. Robert La Coste..issued a set of rules forbidding correspondents to report French casualties and operational plans without official authorization. They are virtually the same rules that were in effect during the Indo-China War.

Saudi Arabia accused Britain of commiting "atrocities" in the Aden protectorate. The atrocity charge referred to reports that British aircraft recently strafed and destroyed a number of trucks entering Aden from the direction of Saudi Arabia.

Russia and Great Britain signed a new fishing agreement today in Moscow. The new agreement runs five years and allows British fishermen in the Barents Sea to operate as close as three miles from Bovict territory. Under the old agreement, British fishing trawlers were now allowed to operate less than 12 miles fromthe Russian coast.

Commencement speeches are usallly something to be endured - they seldom make news. Today's speech by the President at Baylor University in Texas was an exception. He said: "Communism poses a threat from which even this mighty nation is no wholly immune. Yet communism is, in the deepest sense, a gigantic failure Even in the countries it dominates, hundreds of millions who dwell the there still cling to their religious faith; still are moved by aspirations for for justice and freedom that cannot be answered merely by more steel and bigger bombers; stillseek a reward that is beyond money, or place or power; still dream of the day that they walk fearlessly in the fullness of human freedom.

Mr. Eisenhower said that the fundamental principles of human liberty and free government are powerful sources of human energy, loyalty, dedication and guides to enduring success. They are mightier than armaments and armies. "People" he said, "are what count. The most unyielding expression of people's aspirations seems to be an intense nationalism. We Americans believe the rights of the weak are identical with those of the strong. We will continue to hail with satisfaction the birth of each new nation whose people, achieving independence and freedom, become peaceful members of the world community." This attitude is, as the President said, part of the American tradition. It is permissible to hope that the State Department, which is supposed to carry out the President's foreign policy, will take note of his words.

Mr. Eisenhower went on to say that the increase of independent nations creates new political boundaries, and that far too often these political boundaries become serious barriers to the flow of trade. The economic inter-dependence of peoples is increasing. The emotional urge for a completely independent existence may conflict with an equal desire for higher living standards. The President thought we must put to ourselves this question: "How can we help answer both the great desire of peoples for a separate independent existence, and the need for economic union, or at least effective co-operation among them? He suggested again a United States of Europe, outlined the progress that has been made, contended that the failure to achieve more was the result of national pride, the fear of losing cultural and political institutions, and the failure of populations as a whole to grasp the long-term political, economic and security advantages of European union.

The President did not deal with the current economic competition between the United States and the Soviet Union; nor did he say what is recognized and admitted in every allied and neautral capital around the world - namely that if those nations cannot trade with us, they will trade where then can, because they must, and that specifically includes trade behind the Iron Curtain.

The President had one idea for strengthening the free world which will commend itself to everyone who believes in the power of ideas. He put it in these words:

EISENHOWER: "The whole free world would be stronger if there existed adequate institutions of modern techniques and sciences in areas of the world where the hunger for knowledge and the ability to use knowledge are unsatisfied because educational facilities are often not equal to the need. I firmly believe that if some or all of our great universities, strongly supported by private foundations that exist throughout our land, would devote themselves to this task, the prospects for a peaceful and prosperous world would be mightily enhanced. In no respect should the purpose of these institutions be to transplant into a new area the attitudes, the forms, the procedures of America. The staffing, the conduct, the curriculum of each school would be the responsibility of the people where the school might be built."

MURROW: This proposal has been likened to a Point Four educational proposal. However, Point Four was not financed by private or philanthropic institutions, but by the Government. And it is to be doubted that our great universities, or private foundations can supply the funds required for such an undertaking. The proposal is imaginative, would certainly be effective in the long run. As a matter of fact the tenor of the President's whole speech was a long-range look at the philosophic and economic problems that confront us as the leader of the free world. He said: It would be idle to talk of a community of interest with other free people in measures for defense, without recognizing community of interests with them in that which is to be defended."

To this reporter the speech at Baylor was that of a patient and confident man. It may be that this year's graduates will find the realities a little more real than they have been led to expect. But that, after all, has been happening to each graduating class for the last twenty-five years.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: President Eisenhower has made an imaginative proposal for an international education program. Edward Everett said, " ducation is a better safefuard of liberty than a standing army." And Robert Millikan once remarked," If the growth of modern science has taught anything, it is that the method of progress is the method of evolution....not revolution."

Good Night and Good Luck!

Edward R. Murrow Mon., May 28, 1956

This is the news:

President Eisenhower today nominated Fred Seaton, a White House aide, to succeed Douglas McKay as secretary of the interior. McKay resigned from the cabinet last month to run for the United States Senate from Oregon. Seaton was appointed in 1951 to serve out the unexpired term of the late Senator Wherry of Nebraska. He did not seek election in 1952, but returned to Nebraska to manage his extensive newspaper and broadcasting interests.

Mr. Eisenhower today also nominated David A. Hamil, speaker of the Colorado general assembly, to be chief of the Rural Electrification Administration. Mr. Hamil succeeds Ancher Nelsen, who resigned to seek the Republican nomination for governor of Minnesota.

President Eisenhower signed the farm bill today. Mr. Eisenhower said, "Despite the shortcomings of the bill, its advantages outweigh its harmful provisions." The President said he was "disappointed" that the measure does not provide for advance payments... this year... under the soil bank program. And he described the new provisions applying to cotton as "particularly unfortunate". Under terms of the bill, 5-million bales of Government-owned cotton are to be sold overseas at competitive world prices. Mr. Eisenhower called the soil bank program... aimed at reducing crop surpluses by taking land out of production... "a concept rich with promise for improving our agriculture situation." He noted that most of the "harmful provisions" of the bill that he vetoed on April 16th, had been removed. For example, the provision calling for high, rigid price supports was dropped.

→

Democratic Senator Chavez said today that the Senate Appropriations Committee may add as much as two billion dollars to the defense appropriation bill "to expand our long-range bomber and missile programs. Chavez is chairman of a subcommittee that is now studying the measure. "I'm pretty certain," he said, "that Congress wants to stay ahead of Soviet Russia in these fields."

Secretary of the Army Brucker said today... in a speech in Detroit... that the concept of a push-button war is a "dangerous myth". [redacted]

→

The Army, he said, is still the component of the defense team "which has the means and capability to gain and to maintain effective control over the land and resources of an enemy." Brucker said the Army's weapons... both atomic and non-atomic... are the best that have been developed. And he called the Nike missile the nation's "major ground weapon against hostile aircraft." (I should like to discuss this question of defense further in a few minutes).

The Senate-House committee on atomic energy was told today that the United States should help build atomic power plants in foreign countries where fuel is scarce. The proposal came from Robert McKinney, the Santa Fe publisher who recently headed a committee that reported on peaceful uses of nuclear power. McKinney suggested that the United States spend 350-million dollars for this purpose. Such a project, he said, would help off-set Russia's new assistance program.

Early, inconclusive returns from the Italian elections are favorable to the pro-Western center parties. All the contests were for local offices. But the results are being watched as a barometer to the gain... or loss... of Communist influence. It's estimated that of the 30-million persons [redacted] eligible to vote, 85 percent went to the polls. That, in itself, is taken as a sign that the Communists may have suffered a setback. So far, only 4 percent of the vote has been counted. The final outcome is not expected to be known until late tomorrow.

In Paris today, the foreign ministers of France and Morocco signed an agreement of "inter-dependence". The agreement gives Morocco, the former French protectorate, complete diplomatic freedom... but the two countries will consult if their common interests are threatened. Morocco reserves the right to review the agreements whereby France... in 1950... gave the United States permission to set up air bases in Morocco.

The northern French port of St. Nazaire was the scene of violence today when mobs demonstrated against the sending of 200 French reservists to Algeria. Police who tried to put down the demonstration were stoned. Tear gas was used without effect, and the disorder lasted more than an hour.

Meantime... in Algeria... the action between French and rebel forces continued. French authorities say 35 insurgents were killed today "in the Constantine area".

A British soldier died on Cyprus today... the victim of a night ambush.

And in Athens, ~~the~~ Greek foreign minister Theotokis resigned in protest against what he called the "irreconcilable" attitude of foreign powers toward the demand that Cyprus be turned over to Greece. Theotokis had been under fire in Greece for following a "moderate" policy in the Cyprus dispute.

~~Japanese scientists say that the United States has apparently ~~[illegible]~~ set off another hydrogen explosion in the South Pacific. There is no confirmation from Washington. Instruments in Japan recorded atmospheric pressure waves from the direction of Bikini for about 40 minutes. The strength of the pressure waves ~~is reported as~~ being about the same as those which followed the hydrogen bomb test a week ago.~~

At the United Nations today, Great Britain asked Secretary General Hammarskjold to continue his good offices for peace in the Middle East. The British resolution will be presented to the Security Council tomorrow, when it opens debate on ~~the~~ Hammarskjold's recent mission... aimed at lessening tensions between Israel and the Arab states. ~~The British resolution commends the secretary general "on the progress already achieved"... and says~~

→

both sides "should speedily carry out the measures already agreed upon," specifically, the various agreements to observe a cease-fire along their mutual frontiers.

In politics.... here in this country... the Missouri Democratic state convention today acclaimed Senator Symington as its favorite son candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination. The 38-vote Missouri delegation was instructed to vote as a unit for Symington-for-President.

Edward R. Murrow: May 28, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

It takes only a little sense of historic perspective to see that a week-end that produced the testimony of General Partridge and General LeMay on the ability of the Soviet Union to destroy the United States, is one of the most notable of recent years. It may be as notable as any week-end since the Korean war. Never have two such irreproachable authorities spoken more frankly. General LeMay heads the Strategic Air Command, General Partridge the Continental Air Defense Command. American air-defense is their prime responsibility. No two Americans know the problems better. Their testimony was carefully censored for security reasons.

Here in a nutshell is what General Partridge testified: We now have no fighter planes that can fly high or fast enough to intercept the Soviet inter-continental jet bomber, the Bison. By 1958 we shall have F-101, 102 and 104's that "probably" could meet the threat of the Bison, though not necessarily of a bomber superior to the Bison, if one were to be developed. The Soviet Union is now capable of attacking us with hundreds of bombers. If it did so, we must be prepared to accept severe damages within this country. Forty percent of the population of this country, and sixty percent of its industry, would be brought under fire in a large-scale attack using nuclear and probably thermo-nuclear bombs. The defense against an inter-continental ballistic missile - expected in 1958 - would be one of the most difficult tasks ever undertaken." An adequate program to meet the threat of Soviet bombers - not including the ballistic missiles - would cost sixty-one billion dollars, in the fifteen years ending in 1965. The capital outlay would be twenty-four billion, operating cost would be thirty-one billions. Very little of this has been spent already. The big costs lie ahead. I should add that General Partridge believes an adequate defense may altogether deter an attack, but deterrence would not be complete unless the defense were one hundred percent effective.

General LeMay testified that by 1959 the Soviet Union will have twice as many long-range bombers as the United States, and by 1959-60 will have a greater striking power than our plans for ourselves call for. He said that if an attack were made, and we committed all possible mistakes in meeting it, (which he didn't think we would), we might not be able to carry out any retaliatory mission of our own. We have only thirty-one bases, all of which could be hit, and if they were, we would have practically nothing left with which to retaliate. However, General LeMay testified that if war should come today we would do very well, and probably would win. This assertion does not quite harmonize with General Partridge's testimony about the range of our present fighters. I should add that General Partridge also said that radar detection does not at present function at an altitude that meets fully the needs of defense.

It is worth mentioning how these statements were handled by New York's two best-known newspapers. The Herald Tribune gave General LeMay a two-column headline on page one on Sunday, and General Partridge top-of-column position in the first column of page one on Saturday. The New York Times did not give either story top-of-column position. That is, its editors thought several stories of the day were more important. Neither newspaper carried an editorial about it Sunday or this morning. The Wall Street Journal also was editorially silent. Other subjects must have seemed more significant.

And yet the upshot of the testimony is that we are falling behind the Soviet Union in striking power in the air, and will be more so in another three or four years.

The effect of the news abroad will not be small. Not so long ago the world was told that the capacity for massive retaliation was the keystone of our defense. Now this capacity for massive retaliation is compromised and may have passed, or be passing, to the Soviet Union. This is no secret. We are advertising it.

Our position among nations is based first of all on power, since this is still the era of sovereign power. We like to think that our leadership depends still more on our influence and prestige. But to some extent, influence and prestige are measured by our power. And if our relative power is less, it follows that our influence and prestige also will be less. Since this is true, the news about it is hardly something for this country to be indifferent about.

Word for Today

There are grounds for alarm in the recent testimony on Russian air power. And a measure of fear in this is healthy. As E. W. Howe remarked, "A good scare is worth more to a man than good advice." But there is not much time. As Shakespeare warned in Henry the Sixth, "Defer no time. Delays have dangerous ends."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

MONDAY, MAY 28, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

President Eisenhower today nominated Fred Seaton, a White House aide, to succeed Douglas McKay as Secretary of the Interior. McKay resigned from the cabinet last month to run for the United States Senate from Oregon. Seaton was appointed in 1951, to serve out the unexpired term of the late Senator Wherry of Nebraska. He did not seek reelection in 1952, but returned to Nebraska to manage his extensive newspaper and broadcasting interests.

Mr. Eisenhower today also nominated David A. Hamil, speaker of the Colorado general assembly, to be chief of the Rural Electrification Administration. Mr. Hamil succeeds Ancher Nelsen who resigned to seek the Republican nomination for governor of Minnesota.

President Eisenhower signed the farm bill today. Mr. Eisenhower said, "Despite the shortcomings of the bill, its advantages oughtweigh its harmful provisions." The President said he was "disappointed" that the measure does not provide for advance payments..this year..under the soil bank program. And he described the new provisions applying to cotton as "particularly unfortunate". Under terms of the bill, 5-million bales of Government-owned cotton are to be sold overseas at competitive world prices. Mr. Eisenhower called the soil bank program..aimed at reducing crop surpluses by taking land out of production... "a concept rich with promise for improving our agriculture situation." He noted that most of the "harmful provisions" of the bill that he vetoed on April 16th has been removed. For example, the provisions calling for high rigid price supports was dropped.

Democratic Senator Chavez said today that the Senate Appropriations Committee may add as much as two billion dollars to the defense appropriation bill "to expand our long-range bomber and missile programs. Chavez is chairman of a subcommittee that is now studying the measure. "I'm pretty certain", he said, "that Congress wants to stay ahead of Soviet Russia in these fields."

Secretary of the Army Bruckner said today..in a speech in Detroit..that the concept of a push-button war is a "dangerous myth." The Army, he said , is still the component of the defense team "which has the means and capability to gain and to maintain effective control over the land and resources of an enemy." Brucker said the Army's weapons..both atomic and non-atomic..are the best that have been developed. And he called the Nike missile the nation's "major ground weapon against hostile aircraft." (I should like to discuss this question of defense further in a few minutes).

The Senate-House committee on atomic energy was told today that the United States should help build atomic power plants in foreign countries where fuel is scarce. The proposal came from Robert McKinney, the Santa Fe publisher who recently headed a committee that reported on peaceful uses of nuclear power. McKinney suggested that the United States spend 350-million dollars for this purpose. Such a project, he said, would help off-set Russia's new assistance program.

Early, inconclusive returns from the Italian elections are favorable to the pro-Western center parties. All the contests aere for local offices. But the results are being watched as a barometer to the gain..or less..of communist influence. It's estimated that of the 30-million persons eligible to vote, 85 percent went to the polls. That, in itself, is taken as a sign that the Communists may have suffered a setback. So far, only 4 percent of the vote has been counted. The final outcome is not expected to be known until late tomorrow.

In Paris today, the foreign ministers of France and Morocco signed an agreement of "inter-dependence." The agreement gives Morocco, the former French protectorate, complete diplomatic freedom..but the two countries will consult if their common interests are threatened. Morocco reserves the right to review the agreements whereby France..in 1950..gave the United States permission to set up air bases in Morocco.

The northern French port of St. Nazaire was the scene of violence today when mobs demonstrated against the sending of 200 French reservists to Algeria. Police who tried to put down the demonstration were stoned. Tear gas was used without effect, and the disorder lasted more than an hour.

Meantime..in Algeria..the action between French and rebel forces continued. French authorities say 35 insurgents were killed today "in the Constantine area."

A British soldier died on Cyprus today ,the victim of a night ambush.

And in Athens, Greek foreign minister Theotokis resigned in protest against what he called the "irreconcilable" attitude of foreign powers toward the demand that Cyprus be turned over to Greece. Theotokis had been under fire in Greece for following a "moderate" policy in the Cyprus dispute.

At the United Nations today Great Britain asked Secretary General Hammarskjold to continue his good offices for peace in the Middle East. The British resolution will be presented to the Security Council tomorrow, when it opens debate on Hammarskjold's recent mission..aimed at lessening tensions between Israel and the Arab states.

In politics..here in this country..the Missouri Democratic state convention today acclaimed Senator Symington as its favorite son candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination. the 38-vote Missouri delegation was instructed to vote as a unit for Symington - for - President.

It takes only a little sense of historic perspective to see that a week end that produced the testimony of General Partridge and General LeMay on the ability of the Soviet Union to destroy the United States, is one of the most notable of recent years. It may be as notable as any week end since the Korean war. Never have two such irreproachable authorities spoken more frankly. General LeMay heads the strategic Air Command, General Partridge the Continental Air Defense Command. American air defense is their prime responsibility. No two Americans know the problems better. Their testimony was carefully censored for security reasons.

Here in a nutshell is what General Partridge testified: We now have no fighter planes that can fly high or fast enough to intercept the Soviet inter-continental jet bomber, the Bison. By 1958 we shall have F-101, 102 and 104's that "probably" could meet the threat of the Bison, though not necessarily of a bomber superior to the Bison, if one were to be developed. The Soviet Union is now capable of attacking us with hundreds of bombers. If it did so, we must be prepared to accept severe damages within this country. Forty percent of the population of this country, and sixty percent of its industry, would be brought under fire in a large-scale attack using nuclear and probably thermo-nuclear bombs. The defense against an inter-continental ballistic missile - expected in 1958 - would be "one of the most difficult tasks ever undertaken." An adequate program to meet the threat of Soviet bombers - not including the ballistic missiles - would cost sixty - one billion dollars, in the fifteen years ending in 1965. The capital outlay would be twenty-four billion, operating cost would be thirty-one billions. Very little of this has been spend already. The big costs lie ahead. I should add that General Partridge believes an adequate defense may altothther deter an attack, but deterrence would not be complete unless the defense were one hundred percent effective.

General LeMay testified that by 1959 the Soviet Union will have twice as many long-range bombers as the United States, and by 1959-1960 will have a greater striking power than our plans for ourselves call for. He said that if an attack were made, and we committed all possible mistakes in meeting it, (which he didn't think we would), we might not be able to carry out any retaliaotry mission of our own. We have only thirty- one bases, all of which could be hit, and if they were, we would have practically nothing left with which to retaliate. However, General LeMay testified that if war should come today we would do very well, and probably would win. This assertation does not quite harmonize with General Partridge's testimony about the range of our present fighters. I should add that General Partridge also said that radar detection does not at present function at an altitude that meets fully the needs of defense.

It is worth mentioning how these statements were handled by New York's two best-known newspapers. The Herald Tribune gave General LeMay a two-column headline on page one on Sunday, and General Partridge top- of - column position in the first column on page one on Saturday. The New York Times did not give either story top-of-column position. That is, its editors thought several stories of the day were more important. Neither newspaper carried an editorial about it Sunday or this morning. The Wall Street Journal also was editorially silent. Other subjects must have seemed more significant.

And yet the upshot of the testimony is that we are falling behind the Soviet Union in striking power in the air, and will be more so in another three or four years.

The effect of the news abroad will not be small. Not so long ago the world was told that the capacity for massive retaliation was the keystone of our defense. Now this capacity for massive retaliation is compromised and may have passed, or be passing, to the Soviet Union. This is no secret. We are advertisin advertising it.

Our position among nations is based first of all on power, since this is still the era of sovereign power. We like to think that our leadership depends still more on our influence and prestige. But to some extent, influence and prestige are measured by our power. And if our relative power is less, it follows that our influence and prestige also will be less. Since this is true, the news about it is hardly something for this country to be indifferent about.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with a Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: There are grounds for alarm in the recent testimony on Russian air power. And a measure of fear in this is healthy. As E. W. Howe remarked, " A good scare is worth more to a man than good advice." But there is not much time. As Shakespeare warned in Henry the Sixth, "Defer no time. Delays have dangerous ends."

Goodnight and Good Luck !

Edward R. Murrow Tues., May 29, 1956

This is the news:

Debate on the Middle East question opened today in the United Nations Security Council. The British delegate... Sir Pierson Dixon... submitted a resolution urging Israel and the Arab states to comply with the 1949 armistice agreements... and to accord full freedom of MOVEMENT to the United Nations truce observers. The resolution proposed that Secretary General Hammarskjold continue his "good offices" in lessening tension in the area. The British delegate warned the Council against trying to force a settlement. "We should recognize the DELICACY of the situation," he said, "and the need to build up confidence." Hammarskjold formally submitted the report on his recent peace mission to the Middle East. He called on the Arab States and Israel for voluntary action to strengthen and maintain their cease-fire agreements. //

86 lines

On Cyprus today, British troops broke up a battle between Cypriot Greeks and Turks on the outskirts of Nicosia. At least one Greek was killed. The outlawed Communist party scattered leaflets in Nicosia, calling for an end to the bloodshed.

86

May 29, 1956

U R G E N T

EDWARD R. MURROW
CARE JACK WHITE
WJR, DETROIT

The Soviet embassy said today that Russia has proposed an exchange of visits by American and Soviet warships. A Russian spokesman said the matter was discussed with Pentagon officials last summer, but nothing came of it. Under the proposal, American warships would visit Russia... and Soviet warships would pay a courtesy call at one or more ports in the United States.

Moscow announced today that a full session of the Supreme Soviet, or Parliament, will convene on July eleventh. The agenda was not disclosed. At its last meeting... in December... the Supreme Soviet received reports on foreign and domestic policy, and approved a budget. There is no sign the new session will be of an emergency nature.

11

A Russian newspaper said today that the former prime minister of Azerbaijan... and three of his associates... have been executed for treason. Azerbaijan is a Soviet ~~[illegible]~~ republic bordering on Iran. The paper said the four officials were accomplices of Lavrenty Beria, former head of the Russian secret police, who was executed soon after the death of Stalin. ~~One of the charges~~ One charge was that while in power they obtained false confessions from persons who were actually loyal members of the Communist Party. Their trial is said to have taken place last month. ~~[illegible]~~ Two defendants convicted on similar charges were sentenced to 25 years imprisonment.

21

Italy has held its most important elections in three years. For the results... and a report on their significance... we switch by recording to Rome and Winston Burdett.

/tape report from Rome/

Today,.. in Venice... the foreign ministers of six European countries agreed to call a regional conference on atomic energy and trade. The meeting... to be held next month... will draw up plans for the creation of an atomic energy pool for Western Europe. It will also try to write a treaty for a six-nation "single market", in which tariff barriers would gradually be eliminated and export and import restrictions removed. The six nations involved are Italy, France, West Germany and the Benelux countries.

President Eisenhower asked Congress today for an additional 112-million dollars for expansion of the atomic energy program. The money would be spent to develop and produce new atomic weapons... and to step up the development of atomic power reactors for peaceful purposes.

3-

Senator Anderson of New Mexico proposed a multi-billion-dollar program today, for building atomic power plants in friendly countries around the world. Anderson is chairman of the Senate-House atomic energy committee. He said... in a speech before the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia... that there are many areas were power costs are high and where atomic power will soon be relatively cheap. Russia, he said, is building atomic plants in East Germany and China, and may expand her atomic penetration next into Egypt. And he asked, "Shall we permit a Communist country to occupy the areas that we leave open?" A similar proposal was made yesterday by Robert McKinney, an authority on peaceful uses of atomic energy.

Walter Reuther, president of the United Auto Workers, told Congress today that... compared with what Russia is doing... the atomic power program of the United States is "shockingly inadequate". Reuther urged the joint atomic energy committee to approve legislation in this field sponsored by Senator Gore of Tennessee. Gore's measure would autherize government construction of six nuclear power reactors, to demonstrate the practical value of atomic power for industry.

The keels for two more atomic submarines were laid today at Groton, Connecticut. [This makes nine atomic subs under construction or already built.]

The Internal Revenue Service ruled today that supplementary unemployment benefits are subject to federal income tax. The ruling applies to the supplementary payments that General Motors, Ford and Chrysler are scheduled to start making to idle workers on Friday. The Internal Revenue Service said these payments are not to be regarded as wages. Consequently, they will not be subject to various withholding taxes, such as for Social Security.

[Primary elections were held today in Florida and Kentucky. A heavy turnout is reported from Kentucky, where interest centers on the race for the Democratic senatorial nomination. In that race, former Representative Bates has the support of Governor Chandler against Senator Clements. Florida Democrats are choosing between Adlai Stevenson and Senator Kefauver, and the voting there has been light. No significant returns are available from either state.

Clearing weather eased the flood threat today in Indiana and Illinois. In Indianapolis, it was announced that the 500-mile auto race will be run tomorrow as scheduled.]

70

Word for Today

Edward R. Murrow
Care Jack White
WJR, Detroit

... The Italian Socialists may join the Reds to form a popular front. The French political writer, Susanne Labin, recently observed, "Whenever the non-Communist left has accepted an alliance with Communism, its fate has been sealed. Initially it serves as a cloak for Communism. It ends by surrendering its power and disappearing into the ditch." Goodnight and good luck.

CBS RADIO DIVISION

E. R. MURROW

Tuesday, May 29, 1956
7:45 - 8:00 P.M.

MURROW: ... Italy has held its most important election in three years. For the results, and a report on their significance, we switch by recording to Rome and Winston Burdett.

BURDETT: The Italian government political scene, in the wake of the nationalwide local elections just held here, presents a picture that is even more complex,if possible, than usual. There has been no major dramatic shift of votes in this election. The middle-of-the-road Democrati party, led by the Catholic party, the Christian Democrats, held held their own in the country at large. They are still Italy's leading political force and together they account for 45-to-50 per cent of the total vote. The extreme Right-Wing parties, the Monarchists and the Fascists, appear to have lost a little ground. But not as much as was expected and they still form a solid bloc. The extreme Left-Wing, the Communists and Socialists, are a solid bloc also. And seemingly, an irreduceable one; for their voting strength at latest count was still at the same count where it has been for so many years, thirty-five or thirty-six per cent of the nationwide vote.

Nevertheless, in this election, some striking and remarkable things have happened. The most striking and encouraging has been the sharp decline of the Communist vote in several big cities of the industrial north. Ever since the end of the war the Communist vote has climbed steadily in such key centers as Genoa, Turin and Milan. Now for the first time in those key cities the Communists have suffered a net loss at the polls. The north is politically the most sophisticated part of Italy and it's generally agreed that this northern setback is the penalty which the Italian Communist party has pad to pay for the recent about-face in Moscow, the sudden denunciation of Stalin and the resultant confusion in the Communist ranks here. But this encouraging turn has to be balanced immediately with another development that is not so encouraging While the Communists have stumbled, the party which is their close ally and moral satellite, the Socialists, have forged ahead in the same three cities, picking up what the Communists have lost and compensating for their setback. The result is that the overall strength of the Left-Wing bloc, the combined vote of Communists and Socialists, is pretty much the same throughout the north as it was before. Indeed, in Genoa, the Left-Wing outvoted the Center parties and dislodged the Christian Democrats from the control of the great port city.

In the Red citadel of Bologna, the Left won an absolute majority and the Communists kept also most of their smaller strongholds like Ferrara and Lasfezia.

Here in Rome, the world center of Catholicism, more people voted for the Communists and their Socialist allies than ever before; more people and a greater percentage of the electorate. The Left-Winghere outvoted the Christian Democrats by 350,000 to 323,000. It is true that all the Center parties together, the Christian Democrats and their allies, ammased more votes than their Left-Wing opponents. But, unfortunately, this year that is not enough.

Under a new electoral law, based on proportional representation, a party or group of parties must get an absolute majority in order to win control of the city government. The Center parties have failed to win that majority because more than 200,000 votes went to the Fascists and Monarchists. The only alternative forthe Center parties, therefore, is to form an alliance or coalition with the Fascists or Monarchists here in the capital of the Italian Republic. This is something which Christian Democratic leaders have said repeatedly they will not do. They have said they will not accept alliance with the extreme parties of Right or Left. But if Rome is to have a government, it looks as though they will have to do it.

What has happened in Rome has happened also in countless other cities throughout thecountry. Proportional representation has had the same effect here that it's had in many other places. In terms ofpractical politics, the result of the three-way split of the Italian vote is that here in Rome, and in Genoa, Florence, Venice, Leghorn, Siena, Trieste, Bari and Torento, the Right-Wing minority parties hold the balance ofpower. Even in cities where the Center or the Left made their strongest showing.

To avoid stalemate and confusion, the Democratic parties must now enter into local deals and alliances with parties whom they have vowed they would never collaborate with.

In the long turn, perhaps the most significant point of this election has been the upsurge of the Socialist vote. Politicians all over Western Europe have been watching this weather vane election in order to measure the impactx on the Western nations of the new Moscow line of peace, co-existence and popular front. The Socialists here, led by the Stalin peace prize winner Pietro Nenni, are Italy's Popular Front party, bound to the Communists but professing to be Democratic. They're the Communists' Trojan horse on the Italian scene. They preach co-existence among nations and co-existence among parties and they want to get into the government. They will use their present success at the polls as an argument for getting into the Italian government soon.

The Communist Party boss, Palmiro Togliatti, is now in Belgrade conferring with Tito. AndItalians guess that one of the things they are talking about is the new Popular Front strategy. With the success of the Socialists here, it is bound to be a major theme of Italian politics for a long time to come.

And now back to Ed Murrow.

MURROW: Today in Venice, the Foreign Ministers of six European countries ...

(30)

Ed. trans. P. O.

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

TUESDAY, MAY 29, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

Debate on the Middle East question opened today in the United Nations Security Council. The British delegate...Sir Pierson Dixon..submitted a resolution urging Israel and the Arab states to comply with the 1949 armistice agreements..and to accord full freedom of movement to the United Nations truce observers. The resolution proposed that Secretary General Hammarskjold continue his "good offices" in the lessening tension in the area. The British delegate warned the Council against trying to force a settlement. "We whould recognize the delicacy of the situation", he said, "and the need to build up confidence." Hammarskjold formally submitted the report on his recent peace mission to the Middle East. He called on the Arab states and Israel for voluntary action to strengthen and maintain their cease-fire agreements.

On Cyprus today, British troops broke up a battle between Cypriot Greeks and Turks on the outskirts of Nicosia. At least one Greek was killed. The outlawed Communist party scattered leaflets in Nicosia, calling for an end to the bloodshed.

The Soviet embassy said today that Russia has proposed an exchange of visits by American and Soviet warships. A Russian spokesman said the matter was discussed with Pentagon officials last summer, but nothing came of it. Under the proposal, American warships would visit Russia..and Soviet warships would pay a courtesy call at one or more ports in the United States.

Moscow announced today that a full session of the Supreme Soviet or Parliament will convene on July eleventh. The agenda was not disclosed. At its last meeting..in December..the Supreme Soviet received reports on foreign and domestic policy, and approved a budget. There is no sign the new session will be on an emergency nature.

A Russian newspaper said today that the former prime minister of Azerbaijan...and three of his associates..have been executed for treason. Azerbaijan ia a Soviet republic bordering on Iran. The paper said the four officials were accomplices of Lavrenty Beria, former head of the Russian secret police, who was executed soon after the death of Stalin. One charge was that while in power they obtained false confessions from persons who were actually loyal members of the Communist Party. Their trial is said to have taken place last month. Two defendents convicted on similar charges were sentenced to 25 years imprisonment.

Italy has held its most important elections in three years. For the results..and a report on their significance..we switch by recording to Rome and Winston Burdett.

BURDETT: The Italian government political scene, in the wake of the nationwide local elections just held here, presents a picture that is even more complex if possible, than usual. There has been no major dramatic shift of votes in this election. The middle-of-the-road Democratic party, led by the Catholic party, the Christian Democrats, held their own in the country at large. They are still Italy's leading political force and together they account for 45-to-50 per cent of the total vote. The extreme Right-Wing parties, the Monarchists and the Fascists, appear to have lost a little ground. But not as much as was expected and they still form a solid bloc. The extreme Left-Wing, the Communists and the Socialists, are a solid bloc also. And seemingly, an irreducable one; for their voting strength at latest count was still at the same count where it has been for so many years, thirty-five or thirty six percent of the nationwide vote.

Nevertheless, in this election, some striking and remarkable things have happened. The most striking and encouraging has been the sharp decline of the Communist vote in several big cities of the industrial north. Ever since the end of the war the Communist vote has climbed steadily in such key centers as Genoa, Turin and Milan. Now for the first time in those key cities the Communists have suffered a net loss at the polls. The north is politically the most sophisticated part of Italy and it's generally agreed that this northern setback is the penalty which the Italian Communist party has had to pay for the recent about - face in Moscow, the sudden denunciation of Stalin and the resultant confusion in the Communist ranks here But this encouraging turn has to be balanced immediately with another development that is not so encouraging. While the Communistshave stumbled, the party which is their close ally and moral satellite, the Socialists have forged ahead in the same three cities, picking up what the Communists have lost and compensating for their setback. The result is that the overall strength of the Left-Wing bloc, the combined vote of the Communists and Socialists, is pretty uch the same throughout the north as it was before. Indeed, in Genoa, the Left-Wing outvoted the Center parties and dislodged the Christian Democrats from the control of the great port city.

In the Red citadel of Bologna, the Left won an absolute majority and the Communists kept also most of their smaller strongholds like Ferrara nad Lasfazia.

Here in Rome, the world center of Catholicism, more poeple voted for the Communists and their Socialist allies than ever before; more people and a greater pertentage of the electorate. The Left Wing here outvoted the Christian Democrats by 350,000 to 323,000. It is true that all the Center parties together, the Christain Democrats and their allies, ammased more votes than their Left-Wing opponents. But, unfortunately, this year that is not enough.

Under a new electoral law, based on proportional representation, a party of group of parties must get an absolute majority in order to win control of the city government. The Center parties have failed to win that majority because more than 200,000 votes went to the Fascists and monarchists. The only alternative for the center parties, therefore, is to form an alliance or coalition with the Fascists or Monarchists here in the capital of the Italian Republic. This is something which Christain Democratic leaders have said repeatedly they will not do. They have said they will not accept alliance with the extreme parties of Right or Left. But if Rome is to have a government, it looks as though they will have to do it.

What has happened in Rome has happened also in countless other cities throughout the country.Proportional representation has had the same effect here that it's has in many other places. In terms of practical polticcs. the result of the three-way split of the Italian vote is that here in Rome, and in Genoa, Florence, Venice, Leghorn, Siena, Trieste, Bari and Torento, the Right- ing minority parties hold the balance of power. even in cities where the Center or the Left made their strongest showing.

To avoid stalemete and confusion, the Democratic parties must now enter into local deals and alliances with parties whom they have vowed they would never collaborate with.

In the long turn, perhaps the most significant point of this election has been the upsurge of the Socialist vote. Politicians all over Western Europe have been watching this weather vane election in order to measure the impact on Western nations of the new Moscow line of peace, co-existence and popular front. The Socialists here, led by the Stalin peace prize winner Pietro Nenni, are Italy's Popular Front part , bound to the Communists but professing to be Democratic. They're the Communists' Trojan horse on the Italian scene. They preach co-existence among nations and co-existence among parties and they want to get into the government. They will use their present success at the polls as an argument for getting into the Italian government soon.

The Communist Party boss, Palmiro Togliatti, is now in Belgrade conferring with Tito. And Italians guess that one of the things whey are talking about is the new Popular Front strategy. With the success of the Socialists here, it is bound to be a major theme of Italian politics for a long time to come.

And now back to Ed Murrow.

MURROW: Today..in Venice..the foreign ministers of six European countries agreed to call a regional conference on atomic energy and trade. The meeting. to be held next month..will draw up plans for the creation of an atomic energy pool for Western Europe. It will also try to write a treaty for a six-nation "single market", in which tariff barrier would gradual y be eliminated and export and import restrictions removed. The six nations involved are Italy, France, West Germany and the Benelux countries.

President Eisenhower asked Congress today for an additional 112-million dollars for expansion of the atomic energy program. The money would be spent to. evelop and produce new atomic weapons..and to step up the development of atomic power reactors for peaceful p rposes.

Senator Anderson of New Mexico proposed a multi-billion-dollar program today, for building atomic pow r plants in friendly countries around the world. Anderson is chairman of the Senate-House atomic energy committee. He said.. in a speech before the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia..that there are many areas where power costs are high and where atomic power will soon be relatively cheap. Russia, he said, is building atomic plants in East Germany and China, and may expand her atomic penetration next into Egypt. And he asked, "Shall we permit a Communist country to occupy the areas that we leave open?" A similar proposal was made yesterday by Robert McKinney, on peaceful uses of atomic energy.

Walter Reuther, president of the United Auto Workers, told Congress that .. compared with what Russia is doing..the atomic power program of the United Seates is "shockingly inadequate." Reuther urged the joint atomic energy committee to approve legislation in this field sponsoredd by Senator Gore of Tennessee. Gore's measure would authroize government conctruction of six nuclear power reactors, to demonstrate the practical value of atomic power for industry.

The keels for two more atomic submarines were laid today at Groton, Connecticut. This makes nine atomic subs under construction or already built. The Internal Revenue Service ruled today that supplementary, unemployment benefits are subject to federal income tax. The ruling applies to the supplementary payments that General Motors, Ford or Chrysler are scheduled to start making to idle workers of Friday. The Internal Revenue Service said these payments are not to be regarded as wages. Consequently, they will not be subject to various withholding taxes, such as for Social Security.

Primary elections were held today in Florida and Kentucky. A heavy turnout is reported from Kentucky, where interest centers on the race for the Democratic senatorial nomination. In that race, former Representative Bates has the support of Governor Chandler against Senator Clements. Florida Democrats are choosing between Adlai Stevenson and Senator Kefauver, and the voting there has been light. No significant returns are available from either state.

Clearing weather eased the flood threat today in Indiana and Illinois.In Indianapolis, it was announced that the 500-mile auto race willbe run tomorrow as scheduled.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today.

ANNOUNCER: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: The Italian Socialists may join the Reds to form a popular front. The French political writer, Susanne Labin, recently observed, "Whenever the non-Communist left has accepted an alliance with Communism, its fate has been sealed. Initially it serves as a cloak for Communism. It ends by surrendering its power and disappearing into the ditch."

G od Night and Good Luck!

Edward R. Murrow Wed., May 30, 1956

This is the news:

The United States has formally accepted the Russian invitation for the Air Force chief of staff... General Twining... to attend Aviation Day ceremonies in Moscow on June 24. The acceptance was authorized by President Eisenhower and announced today by Secretary of the Air Force Quarles. Quarles said that General Twining will be accompanied to Moscow by "several" Air Force officers. At the White House, News Secretary Hagerty was asked if there was any chance that other members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff might be invited to Russia. And Hagerty said, "Not that I know of." Last week, the White House said it "would not be surprised" if the Joint Chiefs accepted such an invitation. The White House made this statement when asked for comment on reports that Russia had said a visit by the entire Joint Chiefs would be welcome. The Associated Press says opinion in the Pentagon is divided as to whether the invitation to Twining should have been accepted. Some officials reportedly feel that the United States should have held out for an invitation to all the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Democratic Senator Mansfield said today that Congress should raise the pay of Air Force pilots and technicians as a means of bolstering American air power. Mansfield said that over a four-year enlistment period it costs 15-thousand dollars to train a regular enlisted man in the Air Force, 75-thousand dollars to train an electronics expert, and 600-thousand dollars to train a triple-rated pilot of an atomic bomber. "With all that investment," he said, "it would be good business for the government to pay these men enough to retain them, rather than lose them to private industry." Mansfield said the question is "not one of balancing the budget but of maintaining our security and our freedom."

President Eisenhower led the nation in observance of Memorial Day today by going to church to offer prayers for enduring peace. Secretary of the Army Brucker placed a presidential wreath on the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier at Arlington National Cemetery, and later... in a speech... warned Americans against being lulled into a false sense of security.

→

Brucker said, "The propagation of the myth that we can ever manufacture security in the laboratory, or in the machine shop, can lead to nothing but disaster." There is no easy way, he said, "short of blood and sacrifice."

Memorial services were held at American military cemeteries around the world, from Normandy to Seoul.

The West German parliament was told today that 70-thousand East Germans have died in Communist prisons and concentration camps since the end of World War Two. Jakob Kaiser, minister for all-German affairs, said an additional 47-thousand East Germans... arrested since the end of the war... are now missing. In the last two years in East Germany, he reported, 13-thousand political prisoners have been set free.

The French resident minister for Algeria... Robert LaCoste...told the French Senate today, "The Algerian problem is an internal problem. It never will be settled in an international setting." This apparently referred to efforts on the part of some African and Asian countries to have the Algerian question taken up by the United Nations Security Council. LaCoste said that next month there will be 364-thousand French troops in Algeria. They should be enough, he said, to put down the Arab revolt.

→

~~A full debate on Premier Mollet's policy toward Algeria opens tomorrow in the French Assembly.~~

One hundred and six rebels were killed in Algeria in the last 48 hours.

And the French say that 71 Nationalist guerrillas were killed yesterday in Southern Tunisia.

On Cyprus today, a bomb was tossed into a truckload of British troops. Two of the soldiers were killed. Twenty-four others were wounded.

~~The British governor... Sir John Harding... said the parade in honor of Queen Elizabeth's birthday will be held tomorrow as planned.~~

~~A Russian trade paper said today that automation of industry in Russia has increased productivity and lightened the load of factory workers "incalculably". The paper cited shorter working hours and claimed that in a socialist society automation cannot lead to over-production and unemployment.~~

The head of the Italian Communist Party... Palmiro Togliatti... ended two days of conferences today with Marshal Tito of Yugoslavia. Togliatti

→

said he made his surprise visit to Belgrade, simply to establish personal contact with Tito, to learn more of his Communist "line". He said it was "quite accidental" that he came just as Tito was about to visit Moscow. He left for there tonite

In Vatican City, Pope Pius has suspended all audiences until further notice because of general fatigue. The Pope underwent a general medical examination tonight, and the doctors found no infection. His heart was pronounced "sound".

Almost complete returns from the Democratic presidential primary in Florida show Adlai Stevenson defeating Senator Kefauver by about 13-thousand votes. Stevenson won 22 delegates, Kefauver 6. Stevenson says he is grateful to the people of Florida for their endorsement. And the senator from Tennessee says he has won what he considers "a great moral victory." "It shows," he says, "that I have strength in the South."

In the Democratic primary in Kentucky, Earle Clements has won nomination for re-election to the Senate by a wide margin. Former Representative Bates... who had the support of Governor Chandler... got only 40 percent of the vote.

In Washington, congressional leaders predict early agreement on a highway bill. The Senate measure... passed late last night... is not much different from the House version. Both measures call for a multi-billion-dollar highway construction program to be paid for by increased taxes on gasoline, tires, buses, and trucks. This is the biggest public works project in peacetime history.

At the Indianapolis Speedway, the 500-mile auto racing classic was won this afternoon by Pat Flaherty of Chicago. A series of pile-ups prevented a track record. There were no fatalities.

Edward R. Murrow: May 30, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

The Florida primary, which Stevenson won by a nose, could not have gratified him, though undoubtedly he found it a lot better than losing by a nose. It must have disappointed Kefauver keenly, despite his calling it a moral victory. It could not have added to Florida's self-esteem, since fewer than forty percent of the voters went to the polls, less than half the percentage that voted in this week's local elections in Italy. / And the primary certainly did not bring comfort to anyone who thinks that the most democratic procedure possible has been devised to choose a president.

The result in Florida was meaningless. It would have meant something to the candidates, if either of them had been beaten by a wide margin. / But the effect of primaries these days is largely negative. / That is because they are not nation-wide. / The number of delegates chosen by direct popular vote, is smaller than those chosen by state conventions. / Eighteen states are holding primaries this year, and will have chosen only forty-two percent of the delegates to the Democratic convention, and forty-one percent of the Republican convention.

The national conventions will still be dominated by party leaders. A score or so in the Democratic convention will really decide who will be nominated. These leaders may size up the primary results as an indication of trends, but they will feel no obligation to put the expressed preference of voters above their own judgment. A revolt against the party leadership still is theoretically possible at a convention, but it hasn't been made more so by the eighteen primaries held this year. ~~It even may be true that the partial-primary system tends to defeat its own purpose, because voters know there is little reality in their action. To some extent it keeps them away from the polls.~~

~~That is not saying that the primary is a poor way to get rid of party boss rule, or to give the people a free choice in selecting candidates.~~ It may be ~~the only effective way.~~ Primaries as now operated put candidates to an excessive amount of expense and exertion. They spend time and money on just getting around, making appearances, shaking hands by the tens of thousands. They have little occasion or encouragement to discuss national policies thoughtfully. They are spurred into showmanship rather than statesmanship. Maybe the California primary will end up on a somewhat higher level than the others. The state is too large to be won by hand-shaking and baby-kissing, and the appeal to voters has to be based to some degree on ideas. But even the California decision will not decide anything, unless it goes against Stevenson and pushes him out of the race. A victory either for him or Kefauver would not assure either of them the nomination.

The weakness of the present primary situation is widely acknowledged. But the public is not as yet agreed on a substitute. Senator Barkley, before his death, strongly urged a national primary for the nomination of both the president and vice president. Former President Truman, however, thought that no individual could put up enough money to conduct a nation-wide primary. This objection would be overcome if the primary were to be held at government expense, with campaign contributions strictly limited to a nominal figure. It might be necessary to hold two primaries, a first one to give favorite sons their innings, then a run-off.

In such a campaign the scope for personal contacts, hand-shaking and baby-kissing, would be limited. Much of a candidate's appeal would rest on what he had to say. To some extent it would rest on the impression he made saying it over television. Politics is a field for communications, and in a country of our size, it has to rely increasingly on electronics. The old-fashioned political campaign already is out of date. To be sure, there would be drawbacks in relying altogether on television, radio and newspapers. A man might become popular because he was photogenic, or knew

Word for Today

This is Memorial Day, a time for remembering. Carl Sandburg said, "There never has been a time that there were not clouds upon the horizon of this country, and there was one crisis after another that could be named. And always there has been a saving remnant. Always there has been a small faithful minority, faithful to the death."

Goodnight and good luck!

how to sell ideas rather than think them. Even so, ideas would play a bigger part than they do in the convention system, or in the primaries as now conducted. The conventions, to be sure, are picturesque, but it would be no fatal loss to our democracy to have them confined to drafting the national platforms.

This reporter is familiar with the argument that wise leadership is not automatically guaranteed when its choice is left to a vote of all the people. However, the hazards of a general election seem smaller than those of the convention. And it takes more than wise leadership to keep democracy growing. That requires, quite as much, a sense of participation by the individuals who make up the nation. That sense of participation now seems to be on the wane. There was mighty little of it in Florida. A national presidential primary might do much to revive it.

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

WEDNESDAY, MAY 30, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

The United States has formally accepted the Russian invitation for the Air Force chief of staff..General Twining..to attend Aviation Day ceremonies in Moscow on June 24. The acceptance was authorized by President Eisenhower and announced today by Secretary of the Air Force Quarles. Quarles said that General Twining will be accompanied to Moscow by "several" Air Force officers. At the White House, News Secretary Hagerty was asked if there was any chance that other members of the joint Chiefs of Staff might be invited to Russia. And Hagerty said, "Not that I know of." Last week, the White House said it "would not be surprised" if the Joint Chiefs accepted such an invitation. The White House made this statement when asked for comment on reports that Russia had said a visit by the entire Joint Chiefs would be welcome. The Associated Press says opinion in the Pentagon is divided as to whether the invitation to Twining should have been accepted. Some officials reportedly feel that the United States should have held out for an invitation to all the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Democratic Senator Mansfield said today that Congress should raise the pay of Air Force pilots and technicians as a means of bolstering American air power Mansfield said that over a four-year enlistment period it costs 15-thousand dollars to train a regular inlisted man in the Air Force, 75-thousand dollars to train an electronics expert, and 600-thousand dollars to train a triple-rated pilot of an atomic bomber. "With all that investment," he said, "it would be good business for the government to pay these men enough to retain them, rather than lose them to private industry." Mansfield said the question is "not one of balancing the budget but of maintaining our security and our freedom."

President Eisenhower led the nation in observance of Memorial Day today by going to church to offer prayers for enduring peace. Secretary of the Army Brucker placed a presidential wreath on the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier at Arlington National Cemetery, and later..in a speech..warned Americans against being lulled into a false sense of security.

Brucker said, "The propagation of the myth that we can ever "manufacture" security in the laboratory, or in the machine shop, can lead to nothing but disaster." There is no easy way, he said, "short of blood and sacrifice."

Memorial services were held at American military cemeteries around the world, from Normandy to Seoul.

The West German parliament was told today that 70-thousand East Germans have died in Communist prisons and concentration camps since the end of World War Two. Jakob Kaiser, minister for all-German affairs, said an additional 47-thousand East Germans..arrested since the end of the war are now missing. In the last two years in East Germany, he reported 13-thousand political prisoners have been set free.

The French resident minister for Algeria...Robert LaCoste..told the French Senate today, "The Algerian problem is an internal problem. It never will be settled in an international setting." This apparently referred to efforts on the part of some African and Asia countries to have the Algerian question taken up by the United Nations Security Council. La Coste said that next month there will be 364 thousand French troops in Algeria. They should be enough, he said, to put down the Arab revolt.

One hundred and six rebels were killed in Algeria in the last 48 hours.

And the French say that 71 Nationalist guerillas were killed yesterday in Southern Tunisia.

On Cyprus today, a bomb was tossed into a truckload of British troops. Two of the soldiers were killed. Twenty-four others were wounded.

The head of the Italian Communist Party..Palmiro Togliatti..ended two days of conferences today with Marshal Tito of Yugoslavia. Togliatti said he made his surprise visit to Belgrade, simply to establish personal contact with Tito, to learn more of his Communist "line". He said it was "quite accidental" that he came just as Tito was about to visit Moscow. He left for there tonight.

In Vatican City, Pope Pius has suspended all audiences until further notice because of general fatigue. The Pope underwent a general medical examination tonight, and the doctors found no infection. His heart was pronounced "sound".

Almost complete returns from the Democratic presidential primary in Florida show Adlai Stevenson defeating Senator Kefauver by about 13-thousand votes. Stevenson won 22 delegates, Kefauver 6. Stevenson say he is grateful to the people of Florida for their endorsement. And the Senator from Tennessee says he has won what he considers "a great moral victory." "It shows", he says, "that I have strength in the South."

In the Democratic primary in Kentucky, Earle Clements has won nomination for re-election to the Senate by a wide margin. Former Representative Bates.. who had the support of Governor Chandler..got only 40 percent of the vote.

In Washington, congressional leaders predict early agreement on a highway bill. The Senate measure..passed late last night..is not much different from the House version. Both measures call for a multi-billion-dollar highway construction program to be paid for by increased taxes on gasoline, tires, buses, and trucks. This is the biggest public work project in peacetime history.

At the Indianapolis Speedway, the 500-mile auto racing classic was won this afternoon by Pat Flaherty of Chicago. A series of pile-ups prevented a track record. There were no fatalities.

The Florida primary, which Stevenson won by a nose, could not have gratified him, though undoubtedly he found it a lot better than losing by a nose. It must have disappointed Kefauver keenly, dispite his calling it a moral victory. It could not have added to Florida's self-esteem, since fewer than forty percent of the voters went to the polls, less than half the percentage that voted in this week's localelections in Italy. And the primary certainly did not bring comfort to anyone who thinks that the most democratic prodecure possible has been devised to choose a president.

The result in Florida was meaningless. It would have meant something to the candidates if either of them had been beaten by a wide margin. But the effect of primaries these days is largely negative. That is because they are not nation-wide. The number of delegates chosen by direct popular vote is smaller than those chosed by state conventions. Eighteen states are holding primaries this year, and will have chosen only forty-two percent of the delegates to the Democratic convention, and forty-one percent of the Republican convention.

The national conventions will still be dominated by party leaders. A score or so in the Democratic convention will really decide who will be nominated. These leaders may size up the primary results as an indication of trends, but they will feel no obligation to put the expressed preference of voters above their own judgement. A revolt against the party leadership still is theoretically possible at convention, but it hasn't been made more so by the eighteen primaries held this year.

Primaries as now operated put candidates to an excessive amount of expense and exertion. They spend time and money on just getting around, making appearances, shaking hands by the tens of thousands. They have little occasion or encouragement to discuss the national policies thoughtfully . They are spurred into showmanship rathern than statesmanship. Maybe the California primary will end up on a somewhat higher level than the others. The state is too large to be won by hand-shaking and baby-kissing, and the appeal to voters has to be based to some degree on ideas. But even the California decision will not decide anything, unless it goes against Stevenson and pushes him out of the race. A victory either for him or Kefauver would not assure either of them the nomination.

The weakness of the present primary situation is widely acknowldeged. But the public is not as yet agreed on a substitute. Senator Barkley, before his death, strongly urged a national primary for the nomination of both the president and vice president. Former President Truman, however, thought that no individualcould put up enough money to conduct a nation-wide primary. This objection would be overcome if the primary were to be held at government expense, with campaign contributions strictly limited to a nominal figure. It might be necessary to hold two primaries, a first one to give favorite sons their innings, then a run-off.

In such a campaign the scope for personal contacts, hand-shaking and baby kissing, would be limited. Much of a candidate's appeal would rest on what he had to say. To some extent it would rest on the impression he made saying it over television. Politics is a field for communications, and in a country of our size, it has to rely increasingly on electronics. The old fashioned political campaign already is out of date. To be sure, there would be drawbacks in relying altogether on television, radio and newspapers. A man might become popular because he was photogenic, or knew how to sell ideas rather than think them. Even so, ideas would play a bigger part than they do in the convention system, or in the primaries as now conducted. The conventions, to be sure, are picturesque, but it would be no fatal loss to our democracy to have them confined to drafting the national platform.

This reporter is familiar with the argument that wise leadership is not automatically guaranteed when its choice is left to a vote of all the people. However, the hazards of a general election seem smaller than those of the convention. And it takes more than wise leadership to keep democracy growing. That requires, quite as much, a sense of participation by the individuals who make up the nation. That sense of participation now seems to be on the wane. There was mighty little of it if Florida. A national presidential primay might do much to revive it.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Dixnn.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: This is Memorial Day, a time for remembering. Carl Sandburg said, "There never has been a time that there were not clouds upon the horizon of this country, and there was one crisis after another that could be named. And always there has been a saving remnant. Always, there has been a small faithful minority, faithful to the death."

Goodnight and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Thurs., May 31, 1956

This is the news:

Russia tonight accused the United Nations command in Korea of "gross violation" of the Korean armistice. A Moscow broadcast said the real reason the U.N. command had ordered the four-nation armistice commission out of South Korea was the increasing rearmament of South Korea. The commission supervising the Korean armistice is made up of representatives of Poland, Czechoslovakia, Sweden and Switzerland. In ordering it out of South Korea, the United Nations command said the Polish and Czech members had covered up Communist violations in North Korea and frustrated the attempts of the Swedish and Swiss to investigate those violations. The U.N. command said tonight its order will stick, until the Reds get rid of the 400 or more fighter planes acquired illegally by the North Korean air force.

Here in New York today, the United Nations Security Council resumed debate on the Middle East question. The Soviet delegate said Russia will lend "all necessary support" to establishing peace in the area, "taking into account the will of the states of the Middle East and without outside intervention." Various Arab delegates objected to the wording of the British resolution, urging Secretary General Hammarskjold to continue his "good offices" in establishing peace. They said the phrase "good offices" is too vague. The Syrian delegate asked, "Just what is Mr. Hammarskjold expected to continue?"

→

In Paris, a full-scale debate on Algerian policy opened today in the French Assembly. Much of the anticipated fireworks failed to materialize. Instead of attacking the Algerian program, the speakers on this first day of debate charged that the Mollet government had erred in freeing Tunisia and Morocco from French control. The debate continues tomorrow. And a vote of confidence is expected to be taken on Tuesday.

~~According to semi-official reports reaching Munich, the Communist government of Hungary has re-arrested the Catholic primate, Joseph Mindszenty. These reports... which are not confirmed... say Mindszenty refused to sign papers recognizing church laws passed by the Red regime.~~

President Eisenhower today summoned a meeting of outstanding American citizens to a White House conference, to draw up a plan for promoting peace through contacts with the peoples of other nations. The meeting with be held on June 12th. Mr. Eisenhower's proposal for establishing ~~mmmmo~~ technical schools in foreign countries will be discussed.

President Eisenhower told a political meeting in Washington today, that he will campaign as "cheerfully, energetically and enthusiastically as possible" for a Republican victory in November. / Mr. Eisenhower's speech opened a two-day meeting of the National Citizens for Eisenhower Committee. / He said he would not know he had a heart attack last year, except that "the doctors keep reminding me of it." / He said, I am perfectly ready to go forward." / And he cautioned the Republicans against complacency in the campaign. / He said they should go out and fight, not only for his own re-election, but also for the election of a Republican Congress. In that way, he said, the Administration would be able to carry on its "great middle of the road philosophy of government." On the subject of foreign affairs, Mr. Eisenhower said, "The prestige of the United States has never been as high since the last World War, as it is today. / We know," he said, "that we have largely nullified the Communist reliance on force, and threat of force. We know it has felt the pressure of ideas and ideals in its own country, and back of the Iron Curtain." He explained that the United States has avoided being drawn into quarrels between other countries, so it could carry on its role of mediator. "America," he said, "has preserved its position as the friend of all."

The political aspirations of Democratic Governor Harriman got a boost today. A New York banker, Robert Dowling, announced that a nationwide committee is being formed to support Harriman's candidacy for the Democratic presidential nomination. Dowling said the committee would be composed of prominent businessmen who are not antagonistic to labor.

Secretary of Agriculture Benson announced plans today for putting the new soil bank program into effect. Benson said "generous" payments will be made this year, to farmers who plow under their crops of corn, wheat, cotton, peanuts, tobacco and rice. Such action, he believed, would be justified, so long as no mature crops were involved. He said payments will go out as soon as compliance can be determined. and machinery for making the payments can be set up. Benson said the rates [illegible] paid for taking cotton, wheat and corn out of production will be equivalent to about 60 percent of parity. For rice, the equivalent rate will be about 50 percent of parity.

The House voted today to extend the Defense Production Act for two years. Under this act, the President has authority to buy and allocate strategic materials to meet wartime requirements. The House added a provision that an investigation of the shortage of nickel be made by the Secretary of Commerce, in conjunction with appropriate committees of Congress. The measure now goes to the Senate.

~~And~~ The Senate today passed and sent to the House a bill allowing the death penalty for persons convicted of peddling heroin to teen-agers. The measure would also allow imposition of the death penalty on a third conviction of sale of the drug to adults.

Joint talks between representatives of the country's three biggest steel companies and the United Steelworkers Union opened today. ~~[redacted]~~ It is the first time that U.S. Steel, Bethlehem Steel and Republic Steel have appeared together at the bargaining table. Union and company representatives met for three hours, then recessed until next Wednesday. The company negotiators said they would spend that time studying the union's demands.

Edward R. Murrow: May 31, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

The most sensitive instrument to measure the antagonism that divides the world is Germany. It is a better barometer than the state visits to and from Moscow, or even unilateral reductions in armed forces, which simply may be ways of fighting the cold war. In a sense, Germany is the world conflict in a nutshell. An antagonistic world can't be expected to unify Germany, and Germany can't expect unification until world antagonisms are dispelled, or are in the process of being genuinely dispelled. So it can be instructive to see what is happening about German unification. (It pretty well tells the state of the cold war.)

This week a good deal has been happening about German unification. Premier Grotewohl of Communist East Germany made a speech urging direct negotiations between East and West Germany. The Kremlin line is that unification is the exclusive business of Germans, and the Western powers should keep hands off. Herr Grotewohl was repeating the Communist line, and could hardly have expected much of a response. He knows the West Germans say they will not negotiate unification with him or his regime. But he would like to get technical talks started about routine details in the relations between the two neighbors. Technical talks, once begun, could broaden, and once they broadened the Western powers might be kept out. Ultimately Germany might be united as the neutralist leader of Europe. And that would be the Kremlin's greatest victory in the cold war.

A committee of the West German Bundestag had been working for some time on a program of demands to make for just such an opening. They weren't seriously going to plug for direct talks, but they wanted to prod the Western powers to do more about unification.

The West Germans virtually proposed technical talks on a wide range of subjects. These are: the reopening of frontiers; restoration of normal rail, water and road transportation; resumption of normal telephone and telegraph communication; abolition of the three-mile "dead zone" between the two countries; the release of political prisoners. Other proposals covered the free circulation of newspapers, periodicals and books; a guarantee of completely free travel between the two countries; and an end of the jamming of West German broadcasts.

At first glance this offer doesn't look too forbidding for East Germany, even though the West Germans repeated that technical talks were not to be construed as recognition of the East German government, which is ruled out. But the single item about releasing prisoners is the joker in the deck.

And to make sure it wouldn't be ignored, the West German government spelled out some shocking figures about political prisoners in East Germany. Although East Germany has released nearly 15,000 prisoners since January '54, the Bonn government says it knows that 18,900 still were in prison the first of this month. It went on to say that 70,000 have died in prison since 1945. Twenty-three thousand five hundred prisoners are missing from whom nothing has been heard since their arrest. Another 24,000 have occasionally sent word to the outside world. It states that political prisoners receive worse treatment in East Germany than criminal convicts. The East German regime last November stopped delivery of food parcels to prisoners, so that their health is now deplorable.

Let me point out that this West German offer to negotiate is like the West's willingness to negotiate with the East. A large number of quite reasonable demands are made, which Herr Grotewohl might be induced to meet, but he is told that there is no point of dealing with them unless deep injustices perpetrated by his Communist regime are rectified. In the same way the West is ready to negotiate with the Kremlin if the basic wrongs committed by its tyranny are corrected. In both cases a deadlock appears unavoidable.

But is it a complete deadlock? Perhaps not. The West Germans, in proposing technical talks, have advanced a few steps closer to the Communist position about unification. If the East Germans want to get technical talks started, they have only to advance somewhat closer to the West German position. That is not to say that concessions like these will end up in German unification. Nor is it likely that the little steps the Kremlin and the West have made toward getting technical talks underway will bring a complete political agreement ending the cold war. But the two situations are alike, even almost identical. It would be unrealistic to expect much from such efforts for a long time. Still it would be short-sighted not to recognize that things aren't at a complete standstill in Germany, and in the world at large.

George Buyanovsky

Word for Today

The division of Germany is a reflection of larger divisions, and cannot be regarded separately. Yet the ~~temptation~~ desire for the Germans themselves to seek unification is strong. Shakespeare said, "There is a time for all things." But there are Germans who would go along with the ancient proverb, "He who waits for the right time may wait forever."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

THURSDAY, MAY 31, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

Russia tonight accused the United Nations command in Korea of "gross violation" of the Korean ammistice. A Moscow broadcast said the real reason the U.N. command had ordered the four-nation armistice commission out of South Korea was the increasing rearmament of South Korea. The commission supervising the Korean armistice is made up of representatives of Poland, Czechoslovkia Sweden and Switzerland. In ordering it out of South Korea, the United Nations said the Polish and Czech members had covered up Communist violations in North Korea and frustrated the attempts of the Swedish and Swiss to investigate those violations. The U.N. command said tonight its order will stick, until the Red get rid of the 400 or more fighter planes aquired illegally by the North Korean air force.

Here in New York today, the United Nations Security Council resumed debate on the Middle East question, the Soviet delegate said Russia will lend "all necessary support" to establishing peace in the area, "taking into account the will of the states of the Middle East and without outside intervention." Various Arab delegatesn objected to the wording of the British resolution, urging Secretary General Hammarskjold to continue his "good offices" in establishing peace. They said the phrase "good offices" is too vague. The Syrian delegate asked "Just what is Mr. Hammarskjold expected to continue?"

In Paris, a full-scale debate on Algerian policy opened today in the French Assembly. Much of the anticipated fireworks failed to materialize. Instead of attacking the Algerian program, the speakers on this first day of debate charged that the Mollet government had erred in freeing Tunisia and Morocco from French control. The debate continues tomorrow. And a vote of confidence is expected to be taken on Tuesday

President Eisenhower today summoned a meeting of outstanding American citizens to a White House conference, to draw up a plan for promoting peace through contacts with the peoples of other nations, The meeting with be held on June 12th. Mr. Eisenhower's proposal for establishing teshnical schools in foreign countries will be discussed.

President Eisenhower told a politicall meeting in Washington today that he will campaign as "Cheerfully, energetically and enthusiastically as possible" for a Republican victory in November. Mr. Eisenhower's speech opened a two-day meeting of the National Citizens for Eisenhower Committee. He said he would not know he had a heart attack last year, except that "the doctors keep reminding me of it." He said, I am perfectly ready to go forward." And he cautioned the Republicans against complacency in the campaign. He said they should go out and fight, not only for his own re-election, but also for the election of a Republican Congress In that way, he said, the Administration would be able to carry on its "great middle of the road philosophy of government." On the subject of foreign affairs, Mr. Eisenhower said, "The prestige of the United States has never been as high since the last World War as it is today. We know," he said, "that we have largely nullified the Communist reliance on force and threat of force. We know it has felt the pressure of ideas and ideals in its own country and back of the Iron Curtan." He explained that the United States has avoided being drawn into quarrels between other countries, so it could carry on its role of mediator. "America", he said, "has preserved its position as the friend of all."

Secretary of Agriculture Benson announced plans today for putting the new soil bank program into effect. Benson said "generous " payments will be made this year to farmers who plow under their crops of corn, wheat, cotton, peanuts, tobacco and rice Such action, he believed, would be justified, so long as no mature crops were involved.

The Senate today passed and sent to the House a bill allowing the death penalty for persons convicted of pedding heroin to teen-agers. The measure would also allow imposition of the death penalty on a third conviction of sale of the drug to adults.

Joint talks between representatives of the country's three biggest steel companies and the United Steelworkers Union opened today. It is the first time that U. S. Steel, Bethlehem Steel and Republic Steel have appeared together at the bargaining table. Union and company representatives met for three hours, then recessed until next Wednesday. The company negotiators said they would spend that time studying the union's demands.

The most sensitive instrument to measure the antagonism that divides the world is Germany. It is a better barometer than the state visits to and from Moscow, or even unilateral reductions in armed forces, which simply may be ways of fighting the cold war. In a sense, Germany is the world conflict in a nut-shell. An Antoa onistic world can't be expected to unify Germany, and Germany can't expect unification until world antagonisms are dispelled, or are in the process of being genuinely dispelled. So it can be instructive to see what is happening about German unification. It pretty well tells the state of the cold war.

This week a good deal has been happening about German unification. Premier Grotewohl of Communist East Germany made a speech urging direct negotiations between East and West Germany. The Kremlin line is that unification is the exclusive business of Germans, and the Western powers should keep hands off. Herr Grotewohl was repeating the Communist line, and could hardly have expected much of a response He knows the West Germans sa they will not negotiate unification with him or his regime. But he would like to get technical talks started about routine details in the relations between the two neighbors.

Technical talks, once begun, could broaden, and once they broaden the western powers might be kept out. Ultimately Germany might be united as the neutralist leader of Europe. And that would be the Kremlin's greatest victory in the cold war.

A committee of the West German Bundestag had been working for some time on a program of demands to make for just such an opening. They weren't seriously going to ply for direct talks, but they wanted to prod the Western powers to do more about unification.

The West Germans virtually proposed technical talks on a wide range of subjects. These are: the reopening of frontiers; restoration of normal rail, water and road transportation; resumption of normal telephone and telegraph communication; abolition of the three-mile "dead zone" between the two countries; the release of political prisoners. Other proposals covered the free circulation of newspapers, periodicals and books; a guarantee of completely free travel between the two countries; and an end of the jamming of West German broadcasts.

At first glance this offer doesn't look too forbidding for East Germany, even though West German repeated that technical talks were not to be construed as recognition of the East German government, which is ruled out. But the single item about releasing prisoners is the joker in the deck. And to make sure it wouldn't be ingored, the West German government spelled out some shocking figures about political prisoners in East Germany Although East Germany has released nearly 15,000 prisoners since January '54, the Bonn government says it knows that 18,000 still were in prison the first of this month. It went on to say that 70,000 have died in prison since 1945. Twenty-three thousand five hundred prisoners are missing from whom nothing has been heard since their arrest. Another 24,000 have occasionally sent word to the outside world. It states that political prisoners receive worse treatment in East Germany than criminal convicts. The East German regime last November stopped delivery of food parcels to prisoners, so that their health is now deplorable.

Let me point out that this West German offer to negotiate is like the West's willingness to negotiate with the East. A large number of quite reasonable demands are made, which Herr Grotewohl might be induced to meet, but he is told that their is no point of dealing with them, unless deep injustices perpetrated by his Communist regime are rectified. In the same way the West is ready to negotiate with the Kremlin in the basic wrongs committed by its tryanny are corrected. In both cases a deadlock appears unavoidable.

But is it a complete deadlock? Perhaps not. The West Germans, in proposing technical talks, have advanced a few steps closer to the Communist position about unification. If the East Germans want to get technical talks started, they have only to advance somewhat closer to the WesternGerman position. That is not to say that concessions like these will end up in German unification. Nor is it likeley that the little steps the Kremlin and the West have made toward getting technical talks underway will bring a complete political agreement ending the cold war. But the two situations are alike, even almost identical. It would be unrealistic to expect much from such efforts for a long time. Still it would be short sighted not to recognize that things aren't at a complet standstill in Germany, and in the world at large.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is George Bryan.

BRYAN: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: The division of Germany is a reflection of larger divisions, can cannot be regarded separately. Yet the desire for the Germany themselves to seek unification is strong. Shakespears said, "There is a time for all things." But there are Germans who would go along with one ancient proverb, "He who waits for the right time may wait forever." ...Goodnight and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow Fri., June 1, 1956

This is the news:

Russia announced today that Soviet Foreign Minister Molotov has resigned. The new foreign minister is Dimitri Shepilov, editor of the Communist Party newspaper Pravda. Since February, Shepilov has also been secretary of the party central committee and alternate member of the presidium. Molotov had been foreign minister since 1939, and closely associated with the policies of Stalin---many of which have recently been denounced. Last year, Molotov confessed publicly he was "theoretically mistaken" when he said... in a speech... that only the "foundations" of socialism had been laid in Russia. Also last year, when the Russian leaders went to Yugoslavia to patch up their quarrel with Marshal Tito, Molotov stayed at home. Tomorrow, Tito arrives in Moscow for a state visit. The timing of the resignation of Molotov and the arrival of Tito may not be entirely coincidental.

In Washington, Senator George of Georgia commented on the Molotov resignation, calling it "in line with Russia's new policy of sweetness and light." He said, "They just know Molotov is pretty hard boiled, and they know the rest of the world knows it." George is chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Senator Wiley, the top Republican member of that committee, declined to draw any conclusions. "We'll watch developments with interest," he said, "and keep our powder dry." Secretary of State Dulles was vacationing, and unavailable for comment.

Red China today expressed "deep regret" at the rejection yesterday of its proposal for a new conference on Korea. The United Nations, it said, "must bear full responsibility for the consequences." It also attacked the U.N. command decision to suspend activities of the Korean armistice commission.

Communist Premier Chou En-lai told the Reuters news agency today that the Chinese proposal for a conference on Korea showed that Red China is willing to help in a relaxation of tension. On the subject of Formosa, he said Communist China prefers a "peaceful liberation" of the island. He said Red China wants peace because it needs time to become industrialized. He called his country's non-representation in the United Nations "an unjust situation which cannot last for long."

The United Nations Security Council continued [redacted] debate today on the Middle East. Great Britain amended its resolution, in an effort to meet ~~the~~ Arab objections. [redacted] The paragraph asking Secretary General Hammarskjold to continue his "good offices" was revised, so as to be more specific. The British delegate also agreed to a change of language, holding the truce observation teams strictly to armistice boundaries. But the Arab states called the resolution "just as bad as before." They do not like the paragraph calling for a peaceful settlement on "a mutually acceptable basis". They argued that it might upset previous U.N. decisions.

In Israel, Premier Ben-Gurion said today that Israel "must refrain from initiating war, even if provocation by Arab rulers is intensified." But the situation, he said, demands "constant military readiness." He reiterated his view that any war in the Middle East is likely to develop into a world war.

British Prime Minister Eden today accused Greece of trying, through radio broadcasts "of the foulest character", to foment trouble for the British forces on Cyprus. Eden made the charge, in addressing a meeting of his Conservative supporters. He said that as long as the broadcasts continue, "there can be no confidence, still less, friendship."

In Paris, former premier Paul Reynaud urged the Mollet government to spell out its Algerian policy. Reynaud ~~said~~ told the National Assembly, "~~We are~~ fighting an adversary who has proclaimed his war aims. France must proclaim its goals of peace." [redacted] In Algeria, the French say they have killed 230 rebels in the heaviest action of the 18-month revolt. And the action, they say, is continuing. [redacted]

Vice President Nixon told the "Citizens for Eisenhower" meeting in Washington today that the Republican Party can present a better case this year than in 1952, because now it can point to "the record". The chief danger for the Republicans, Nixon said, is that too many satisfied voters will stay away from the polls. White House News Secretary Hagerty told the meeting it will be a low-level campaign. The Democrats will make it "rough and dirty", he said, because they have no real issues to present.

President Eisenhower today named a seven-member "cabinet committee" to study the problems of small businessmen and make recommendations. The committee will be headed by Arthur F. Burns, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers.

An Alabama state court today issued a temporary injunction, prohibiting the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People from "further activities" in Alabama. The state attorney general had charged the association with causing "irreparable injury" to the rights of Alabama citizens by supporting the boycott of city buses in Montgomery. The association has 30 days in which to file a formal reply.

Edward R. Murrow: June 1, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

The crisis over the Korean armistice teams has two aspects that call for comment. One is that it marks the end of patience; not only the patience of the United States, but of the allies in the United Nations command as well. The flagrant partisanship of the Czech and Polish inspection teams was no new discovery. The decision of the U.N. command to order their withdrawal from South Korea came after a considerable history of previous warnings and callous Communist disregard of the requirements of neutrality. We were disturbed by it, our Allies were disturbed, and the Swiss and Swedish governments, who supply the other half of the inspection teams, wrote notes protesting against the frustration to which their representatives were being subjected.

The other aspect worth stressing, is that the breakdown of the inspection system is a failure in a kind of test try-out, of disarmament inspection. In Korea, disarmament as such was not being inspected, but it was something close to it. And the failure there seems bound to have serious consequences on future disarmament talks. A fool-proof inspection system is the heart of the disarmament problem. In Korea it was anything but fool-proof.

At the timeof the armistice North Korea had no air power. Now it has ~~five~~ 4 to ~~six~~ 5 hundred planes, half of them jet fighters and bombers. These were all brought in in violation of armistice terms, and through evasion of inspection. The evasion was not the fault of the Swiss and the Swedes, who did their utmost to stop the violations. Part of the time the Poles and Czechs simply vetoed any action being taken; part of the time their eyes were closed to the use of other points of entry for military shipments. All of the time they were content with North Korea's failure to supply information and documents.

It always has been assumed that inspection of disarmament, when the time comes, would be assigned to smaller nations on whose integrity the whole operation would depend. In Korea it fell to four states. Of these only two were truly neutral. The Czechs and the Poles right from the start were party to North Korea's violation of the armistice terms. They connived to cover up the movement of illegal troops, guns and planes. They stymied their Swiss and Swedish colleagues when they tried to carry out their duty. If that is the accepted standard of Communist probity, disarmament would be a long way off ~~XXX~~ for this reason alone.

Apparently the Communists realized that Allied patience over the fiasco of the inspection system was wearing out, and that drastic action might be coming. They tried to offset it. In April, Communist China proposed to Great Britain that a new Korean conference should be called to complete the unification of the country, and that all foreign troops be withdrawn at once. A little later the North Korean government announced that it was reducing its forces by 80,000 men, but said nothing about its ill-gotten air force. ~~Today Chou En-lai, the Chinese Premier, gave a highly conciliatory interview to a correspondent of Reuters.~~ But the British did not rise to the bait of a new Korean conference, stating bluntly that there was no evidence whatever that North Korea or Red China had changed their views, so as to make agreement possible. And they rejected the conference on behalf of all the U.N. allies.

I have said that this week's action by the U.N. Command was preceded by a history of paralysis in the inspection system. The first six months of the armistice were the worst from the standpoint of the U.N. Command. North Korea got in the bulk of its present strength in that time. But the North Koreans made only eleven reports of munitions replacements, and reported no accession of airplanes whatever. In the same period the U.N. Command reported the replacement of 13,000,000 rounds of ammunition and of over 2,000 airplanes. By June of last year the Communists had stepped up their reports a little, making a total of 162. But in the same period the U.N. Command made 1,969. There was no secret about the arrival of weapons and supplies through other cities than those designated in the armistice agreement. In one instance the North Koreans built a special railway to by-pass an inspection city and bring in materials unhindered.

It does not seem probable that the expulsion of the Czechs and Poles from South Korea will bring a renewal of the fighting. The U.N. Command specifically gave assurances that the Allies will hold to the armistice and will avoid hostilities, unless attacked. If attacked, retaliation would come in fifteen seconds, General I.D. White of the Eighth Army announced. But the North Korean government also said it would not resume fighting. So that danger does not appear imminent. In the meantime all the inspection teams are expected to withdraw to the neutral zone around Panmunjom, and stay there. That is, they will not pass out of existence. They simply will be inactive.

The regulation of armaments... without adequate inspection... has been tried in Korea and found wanting. There may be in this experience with the Communists a lesson which can be applied to the question of world disarmament. In the words of Benjamin Franklin, "Let us not merely be entertained by the tale. Let us draw a small moral from it."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

FRIDAY, JUNE 1, 1956
7:45-- 8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

Russia announced today that Soviet Foreign Minister Molotov has resigned. The new foreign minister is Dimitri Shepilov, editor of the Communist Party newspaper Pravda. Since February, Shepilov has also been secretary of the party central committee and alternate member of the presidium. Molotov has been foreign minister since 1939, and closely associated with the policies of Stalin -- many of which have recently been denounced. Last year, Molotov confessed publicly he was"theoretically mistaken" when he said..is a speech..that only the "foundations" of socialism had been laid in Russia. Also last year, when the Russian leaders went to Yugoslavia to patch up their quarrel with Marshal Tito, Molotov stayed at home. Tomrorow, Tito arrives in Moscow for a state visit. The timing of the resignation of Molotov and the arrival of Tito may not be entirely coincidental.

In Washington, Senator George of Georgia commented on the Molotov resignation,calling it "in line with Russia's new policy of sweetness and light." He said, "They just know Molotov is pretty hard boiled, and they know the rest of the world knows it." George is chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Senator Wiley, the top Republican member of that committee, declined to draw any conclusions. "We'll watch developments with interest," he said "and keep our powder dry." Secretary of State Dulles was vacationing, and unavailable for comment.

Red China toda expressed "deep regret" at the rejection yesterday of its proposal for a new conference on Korea. The United Nations, it said, "must bear full responsibility for the consequences." It also attacked the U.N. command decision to suspend activities of the Korean armistice commission.

Communist Premier Chou En-lai told the Reuters news agency today that the Chinese proposal for a conference on Korea showed that Red China is willing to help in a relaxation of tension. On the subject of Formosa, he said Communist China prefers a "peaceful liberation" of the island. He said Red China wants peace because it needs time to become industrialized. He called his country's non-representation in the United Nations "an unjust situation which cannot last for long."

The United Nations Security Countil continued debate today on the Middle East. Great Britain amended its resolution, in an effort to meet Arab objections. The paragraph asking Secretary General Hammarskjold to continue his "good offices" was revised, so as to be more specific. The British delegate also agreed to a change of language, holding the truce observation teams strictly to armistice boundaries. But the Arab states called the resolution "just as bad as before." They do not like the paragraph calling for a peaceful settlement on "a mutually acceptable basis." They argued that it might upset previous U.N. decisions.

In Israel, Premier Ben-Guriaon said today that Israel "must refrain from initiating war, even if provocation by Arab rulers is intensified." But the situation, he said, demands "constant military readiness". He reiterated his view that any war in the Middle East is likely to develop into a world war.

British Prime Minister Eden today accused Greece of trying, through radio broadcasts "of the foulest character", to foment trouble for the British forces on Cyprus. Eden made the charge in addressing a meeting of his Conservative supporters. He said that as long as the broadcasts continue, "there can be no confidence, still less, friendship."

On Paris, former premier Paul Renaud urged the Mollet government to spell out its Algerian policy. Reynaud told the National Assembly, "We are fighting an adversary who has proclaimed his war aims. France must proclaim its goals of peace." In Algeria, the French say they have killed 230 rebels in the heaviest action of the 18-month revolt. And the action, they say, is continuing.

Vice President Nixon told the "citizens for Eisenhower" meeting in Washiggton today that the Republican Party can present a better case this year than in 1952, because now it can point to "the record". They chief danger for the Republicans, Nixon said, is that too many satisfied voters will stay away from the polls. White House News Secretary Hagerty told the meeting it will be a low-level campaign. The Democrats will make it "rough and dirty", he said, becuase they have no real issues to present.

President Eisenhower today named a seven-member "cabinet committee" to study the problems of small businessmen and make recommendations. The committee will be headed by Arthur F. Burns, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers.

An Alabama state court today issued a temproary injunction, prohibiting the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People from "further activieies" in Alabama. The state attorney general had charged the association with causing "irreperable injury" to the rights of Alabama citizens by supporting the boycott of city buses in Montgomery. The association has 30 days in which to file a formal reply.

The crisis over the Korean armistice terms has two aspects that call for comment. One is that it marks the end of patience; not only the patience of the United States, but of the allies in the United Nations command as well. The flagrant partisanship of the Czech and Polish inspection teams was no new discovery. The decision of the U.N. command to order their withdrawal from South Korea came after a considerable history of previous warnings and callous Communist disregard of the requirements of neutrality. We were disturbed by it, our Allies were disturbed, and the Swiss and Swedish governments, who supply the other half of the inspection teams, wrote notes protesting against the frustration to which their representatives were being subjected.

The other aspect worth stressing, is that the breakdown of the inspection system is a failure in a kind of test try-out, of disarmement inspection. In Korea, disarmament as such was not being inspected, but it was something close to it. And the failure there seems bound to have serious consequences on future disarmement talks. A fool-proof inspection system is the heart of the disarmement problem. In Korea it was anything but fool-proof.

At the time of the armistice North Korea had no air power. Now it has 4 to 5 hundred planes, half of them jet fighters and bombers. These were all brought in in violation of armistice terms, and through evasion of inspection. The evasion was not the fault of the Swiss and Swedes, who did their utmost to stop the violations. Part of the time the Poles and Czechs simply vetoed any action being taken; part of the time their eyes were closed to the use of other points of entry for military shipments. All of the time they were content with North Korea's failure to supply information and documents.

It always has been assumed that inspection of disarmement, when the time comes, would be assigned to smaller nations on whose integrity the whole operation would depend. In Korea it fell to four states. Of these only two were truly neutral. The Czechs and the Poles right from the start were party to North Korea's violation of the armistice terms. They convived to cover up the movement of illegal troops, guns and lanes. They stymied their Swiss and Swedish colleagues when they tried to carry out their duty. If that is the accepted standard of Communist probity, disarmament would be a long way off for this reason alone.

Apparently the Communist realized that Allied patience over the fiasco of the inspection system was wearing out, and that drastic action might be coming. They tried to offset it. In April, Communist China proposed to Great Britain that a new Korean conference should be called to complete the unification of the country, and that all foreign troops be withdrawn at once. A little later the North Korean government announced that it was reducing its forces by 80,000 men, but said nothing about its ill-gotten air force. But the British did not rise to the bait of a new Krrean conference, stating bluntly that there was no evidence whatever that North Korea or Red China had changed their views, so as to make agreement possible. And they rejected the conference on behalf of all the U.N. allies.

I have said that this week's action by the U.N' Command was preceded by a history of paralysis in the inspection system. The first six months of the armistice were the worst from the standpoint of the U.N. Command. North Korea got in the bulk of its present strength in that time. But the North Koreans made only eleven reports of munitions replacements, and reported no accession of airplanes whatever. In the same period the U.N. Command reported replacement of 13,000,000 rounds of ammunition, and of over 2,000 airplanes. By June of last year the Communists had stepped up their reports a little, making a total of 162. But in the same period the U.N. Command made 1,969. There was no secret about the arrival of weapons and supplies through other cities than those designated in the armistice agreement. In one instance the North Koreans built a special railway to by- pass an inspection city and bring in materials unhindered.

It does not seem probable that the expulsion of the Czechs and Poles from South Korea will bring a nrewwal of the fighting. The U.N. Command specifically gave assurances that the Allies will hold to the armistice and will avoid hostilities unless attacked. If attacked, retaliation would come in fifteen seconds, General I. D. White of the Eighth Army announced. But the North Korean government also said it would not resume fightin . So that danger does not appear imminent. In the meantime, all the inspection teams are expected to withdraw to the neutral zone around Panmunjom, and stay there. That is, they will not pass out of existence. The simply will be inactive.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for To ay. First, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: The regulation of armaments..without adequate inspection..has been tried in Korea and found wanting. There may be in this experience with the Communists a lesson which can be applied th the question of world disarmament. In the words of Benjamin Franklin, "Let us not merely be entertained by the tale. Let us draw a small moral from it."

Good Night and Good Luck.

Edward R. Murrow June 4, 1956

This is the news:

The United Nations Security Council voted unanimously today for Secretary General Hammarskjold to continue his "good offices" to ease tension in the Middle East. The action was taken on a British resolution which also commended Hammarskjold for past achievements, and asked him to report to the Security Council "as appropriate". A paragraph calling for settlement of the Arab-Israeli dispute on "a mutually acceptable basis" was dropped, on the insistence of the Arab states.

The State Department today made public a text of the speech Communist Party Boss Khrushchev made last winter, denouncing Stalin. The State Department does not vouch for the authenticity of the document, but understands it was prepared for the guidance of a Communist party outside Russia. Khrushchev spoke before the party congress in Moscow on February 24th. Much of his criticism of Stalin had already leaked out. But the 25-thousand-word text... released today...

→

underscores the charges. According to Khrushchev, Stalin not only laid down wrong policies but was a "sickly suspicious man" who saw enemies everywhere, who murdered thousands of innocent people, and who... by nervousness and hysteria... bungled the defense of Russia against the German invasion. (I should like to discuss this, and another Khrushchev speech, further in a few minutes).

Marshal Tito of Yugoslavia visited the mausoleum of Lenin and Stalin in Moscow today and left a wreath in tribute to Lenin. He ignored Stalin, who forced a break with Yugoslavia in 1948. In a luncheon speech, Tito said the Yugoslav people welcome the restoration of good relations with Russia, on a basis of equal rights.

West German Chancellor Adenauer and French Premier Mollet conferred for ten hours in Luxembourg today on the future of the Saar. Tonight, Adenauer told correspondents covering the meeting, "All went well. Everything has been settled." Later, it was Explained that Mollet and Adenauer had agreed on specific instructions for their experts to work out a general settlement. What the instructions are was not disclosed.

In Paris, the French government announced today that it will need a quarter of a billion dollars in new taxes to finance the war in Algeria. A vote of confidence on the government's Algerian policy will be held tomorrow in the National Assembly.

In Eastern Algeria, French troops are reported to have defeated a strong rebel force in an action that lasted for four days. The French say more than 300 rebels were killed and 260 captured.

New rioting between Greek and Turkish Cypriots broke out tonight on Cyprus, after it was learned that a policeman killed earlier in the day was a Turk.

In London, the British governor of Cyprus... Sir John Harding... conferred for two hours with Prime Minister Eden on the future of the island colony. They are believed to have discussed possible first steps toward a constitutional settlement.

Queen Elizabeth and her husband, the Duke of Edinburgh, sailed from England tonight for a three-day visit to Sweden. And the royal couple was closely guarded against possible Cypriot attack.

Great Britain revealed today that it has given all British colonies discretion to export goods of potential military value to Communist China, provided the same goods are allowed to be exported to Russia. The Foreign Office confirmed the move after the governments of Malaya and Singapore announced they were authorizing "reasonable" shipments of rubber to the Chinese Reds. ~~The~~ United States has long opposed the relaxation of export restrictions for Red China.

President Eisenhower dedicated the new A.F.L.-C.I.O. headquarters in Washington today, and said that labor organizations... as well as government... "must serve the individual and not seek to dominate." Mr. Eisenhower called the A.F.L.-C.I.O. merger "a source of great new strength", but with the new strength, he said, also comes an increase in responsibility.

The Supreme Court ruled today that there is nothing in the Taft-Hartley law to keep states from acting under their own labor statutes to prevent violence. The 6-to-3 decision affirmed a ruling by the Wisconsin Supreme Court that the state had the right, in 1954, to restrict picketing during the Kohler Company strike. The majority decision... delivered by Justice Reed... said, "The dominant interest of the state in preventing violence and property damage cannot be questioned."

Edward R. Murrow: June 4, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

The attack which Khrushchev made secretly on Stalin in the last Communist Party congress - the text of which was released by the State Department today - was even stronger than the original reports of it. It fills in the case against Stalin with a richness of convincing and anecdotal detail.

At the same time, another secret speech by Khrushchev has come to light. He made it a month later in Warsaw when he was there for the funeral of the Polish leader Beirut. According to the New York Times, Khrushchev added to the charges against Stalin that he had nearly wrecked relations with Communist China. He said the Soviet dictator made economic demands on China that "smacked of colonialism," and insisted on having the last word on communist developments inside China. He demanded that joint Soviet-Chinese companies be set up to exploit China's resources and run Chinese industries, and that Russia be given special concessions. Mao Tse-tung was embittered and refused to accept Stalin's authority. Had it not been for the tough United States policy toward Communist China, Khrushchev said, the Peiping government might well have decided to break openly with the Soviet Union as Tito had done. Mao's long visit to Moscow in 1949-50 made matters somewhat better, but the tensions continued till Stalin's death. Not till Khrushchev and Bulganin went to China in October of '54 was intimacy restored. The Russian leaders dissolved the jointly-owned companies, cancelled the special concessions and stepped up the aid program.

Khrushchev, in his three-hour attack on Stalin, talked freely about the particularly dark periods in Stalin's career. One came early, when he insulted Lenin's wife, and Lenin threatened to break relations unless he apologized. In this period Lenin warned Stalin against using brutality in conducting party affairs.

Then came the great purges of the thirties. According to Khrushchev Stalin did away with seventy percent of the party's central committee. In this time he officially authorized the police to torture prisoners, and changed court procedure to accept their confessions without corroboration.

There followed the black period at the start of the war with Germany. Stalin blankly refused to believe in the coming Nazi attack, though amply warned. He failed to mobilize industry or men adequately. And he had contributed to the disaster by the execution of five thousand officers a few years before. When the attack came he went into a psychotic black-out, in which he was incapable of acting or giving orders. "All is lost that Lenin built" he once lamented to the Politburo. Later, when he resumed direction, he became like Hitler in issuing imperious orders that courted catastrophe. In one instance, which Khrushchev knew about personally, he ordered the encirclement of Kharkov. Khrushchev tried to telephone him personally, but Stalin refused to answer. Only Malenkov would speak, and he said that Stalin's order had to be obeyed. It cost hundreds of thousands of Russian soldiers.

The last period came to a head just before his death. By that time Stalin was a sickly suspicious man. He had a microphone installed in the home of Voroshilov, whom he considered an English spy. He devised the "doctor's plot," and when the extorted confessions were available he told the party congress that they were like blind kittens. "What would you do without me?" he asked. Finally he determined to wipe out all the Old Bolsheviks, and was preparing charges against Molotov and Mikoyan. Had not Stalin "providentially died when he did" as Khrushchev is reported to have put it, neither man would have been present to take part in last February's congress.

"How is it possible that a person confesses to crimes he has not committed? Only in one way - by the application of physical methods, or pressuring him, torture, bringing him to a state of unconsciousness, deprivation of his judgment, taking away his human dignity."

Khrushchev, toward the end of his oration, warned that consideration of the Stalin case had to be withheld from the press and kept within the party. "That is why" he said, "we are considering it here in a closed session. We should know the limits; we should not give ammunition to the enemy; we should not wash our dirty linen before his eyes." The statement was greeted with loud applause.

Perhaps the most ironical passage in the speech dealt with President Tito, that is, it is ironical now, when Tito is having the reception of a prodigal son in Moscow. Stalin personally engineered the break with Yugoslavia, and at the time he told Khrushchev: "I have only to shake my little finger, and there will be no more Tito." "We have paid dearly" said Khrushchev" for the shaking of the little finger."

Of all the shattering political events of this era, it is hard to match this Khrushchev speech. It did more than smash a national idol. It indicted the system that created and bore so long with the mad tyrant. It may be, as some in Washington are inclined to believe, that in the end

Stalin himself was killed, to prevent still blacker crimes. If so, the story was not in the least redeemed, but was made only the more instructive.

Word for Today

Khrushchev has portrayed Stalin as a tyrant... full of suspicion... who killed thousands of comrades in cold blood. Such is the tradition of tyrants. ~~Aeschylus~~ ESKOLUS observed, long ago, "The disease somehow inheres in tyranny, to have no faith in friends." But Russia is still a totalitarian state. As Cicero said, "Though the tyrant dies, the tyranny persists."

Goodnight and good luck!

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

MONDAY, JUNE 4, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

The United Nations Security Council voted unanimously today for Secretary General Hammarskjold to continue his "good offices" to ease tension in the Middle East. The action was taken on a British resolution which also commended Hammarskjold for past achievements, and asked him to report to the Security Council "as appropriate" A paragraph calling for settlement of the Arab-Israeli dispute on a "mutually acceptable basis" was dropped, an the insistence of the Arab states..

The state Department today made public a text of the speech Communist Party Boss Khrushchev made last winter, denouncing Stalin. The State Department does not vouch for the authenticity of the document, but understands it was prepared for the guidance of a Communist party outside Russia. Khrushchev spoke before the party congress in Moscow on February 24th. Much of his criticism of Stalin had already leaked out. But the 25-thousand-word text ..released today.. underscores the charges. According to Khrushchev, Stalin not only laid doen wrong policies but was a "sickly suspicious man" who saw enemies everywhere, who murdered thousands of innocent people, and who..by nervousness and hysteria..bungled the defense of Russia against German invasion. (I should like to discuss this, and another Khrushchev speech, further in a few minutes.)

Marshal Tito of Yugoslavia visited the Mausoleum of Lenin and Stalin in Moscow today and left a wreath in tribute to Lenin. He ignored Stalin, who forced a break with Yugoslavia in 1948. In a luncheon speech, Tito said the Yugoslav people welcome the restoration of good relations with Russia, on a basis of equal rights.

West German Chancellor Adenauer and French Premier Mollet conferred for ten hours in Luxembourg today on the future of the Saar. Tonight, Adenauer tole correspondents covering the meeting, "All went well. Everything has been settled." Later, it was explained that Mollet and Adenauer had agreed on specific instructions for their experts to work out a general settlement. What the instructions are was not disclosed.

In Paris, the French government announced today that it will need a quarter of a billion dollars in new taxes to finance the war in Algeria. A vote of confidence on the government's Algerian policy will be held tomorrow in the National Assembly.

In Eastern Algeria, French troops are reported to have defeated a strong rebel force in an action that lasted for four day. The French say more than 300 rebels were killed and 260 captured.

New rioting between Greek and Turkish Cypriots broke out tonight on Cyprus, after it was learned thata policeman killed earlier in the day was a Turk.

In London, the British governor of Cyprus ...Sir John Harding..conferred for two hours with Prime Minister Eden on the future of the island colony. They are believed to have discussed possible first steps toward a constitutional settlement.

Queen Elizabeth and her husband, the Duke of Edinburgh, sailed from England tonight for a three-day visit to Sweden. And the royal couple was closely guarded against possible Cypriot attack.

Great Britain revealed today that it has given all British colonies discretion to export goods of potintial military value to Communist China, provided the same goods are allowed to be exported to Russia. The Foreign Office confirmed the move after the governments of Malaya and Singapore announced they were authorizing "reasonable" shipments of rubber to the Chinese Reds. The United States has long opposed the relaxation of export restrictions for Red China.

President Eisenhower dedicated the new A.F.L. - C.I.O headquarters in Washington today, and said that labor organizations..as well as government.. "must serve the individual and not seek to dominate." Mr. Eisenhower called the A.F.L. - C.I.O. merger "a source of great new strength", but with the new strength, he said, also comes an increase in responsibility.

The Supreme Court ruled today that there is nothing in the Taft-Hartley law to keep states from acting under their own labor statutes to prevent violence. The 6-to-3 decision affirmed a ruling by the Wisconsin Supreme Court that the state had the right, in 1954, to restrict picketing during the Kohler Company strike. The majority decision..delivered by Justice Reed..said, "The dominant interest of the state in preventing violence and property damage cannot be questioned.

The attack which Khrushchev made secretly on Stalin in the last Communist Party congress - the text of which was released by the State Department today was evenstronger than the original reports of it. It fills in the case against Stalin with a richness of convincing and anecdotal detail.

At the same time, another secret speech by Khrushchev has come to light. He made it a month later in Warsaw when he was there for the funeral of the Polish leader Beirut. According to the New York Times, Khrushchev added to the charges against Stalin that he had nearly wrecked relations with Communist China. He said the Soviet dictator made economic demands on China that "smacked of colonialism," and insisted on having the last word on communist developments inside China. He demanded that joint Soviet-Chinese companies be set up to exploit China's resources and run Chinese industries, and that Russia be given special concessions. Mao Tse-tung was embittered and refused to accept Stalin's authority. Had it not been for the tough United States policy toward Communist China, Khrushchev said, the Peiping government might well have decided to break openly with the Soviet Union as Tito had done. Mao's long visit to Moscow in 1949-50 made matters somewhat better, but the tensions continued till Stalin's death. Not till Khrushchev and Bulganin went to China in October of '54 was intimacy restored. The Russian leaders dissolved the jointly-owned companies, cancelled the special concessions and stepped up the aid program.

Khrushchev, in his three- hour attack on Stalin, talked freely about the particularly dark periods in Stalin's career. One came early, when he insulted Lenin's wife, and Lenin threatened to break relations unless he apologized In this period Lenin warned Stalin against using brutality in concucting party affairs.

Then came the great purges of the thirties. According to Khrushchev, Stalin did away with seventy percent of the party's central committee. In this time he officially authorized the police to torture prisoners, and changed court producure to accept their confessions without corroboration.

There followed the black period at the start of the war with Germany. Stalin blankly refused to believe in the coming Nazi attack, though amply warned. He failed to mobilize industry or men adequately. And he had contributed to the disaster by the execution of five thousand officers a few years before. When the attack came he went into a psychotic black-out in which he was incapable of acting or giving orders. "All is lost that Lenin built," he once lamented to the Politburo. Later, when he resumed direction, he became like Hitler in issuing imperious orders that courted catastrophe. In one instance, which Khrushchev knew about personally, he ordered the encirclement of Kharkov. Khrushchev tried to telephone him personally, but Stalin refused to answer. Only Malenkov would speak, and he said that Stalin's order had to be obeyed. It cost hundreds of thousandnds of Russian soldiers.

The last period came to a head just before his death. By that time Stalin was a sickly suspicious man. He had a microphone installed in the home of Voroshilov, whom he considered an English spy. He devised the "doctor's plot", and when the extorted confessions were available, he told the party congress that they were like blind kittens. "What would you do without me?" he asked. Finally he determined to wipe out all theo old Bolsheviks, and was preparing charges against Molotov and Mikoyan. Had not Stalin "providentially died when he did" as Khrushchev is reported to have put it, neither man would have been present to take part in last February's congress.

"How is it possible that a person confesses to crimes he has not committed? Only in one way - by the application of physical methods, or pressuring him, torture, bringing him to a state of unconsciousness, deprivation of his judgement, taking away his human dignity."

Khrushchev, toward the end of his oration, warned that consideration of the Stalin case had to be withheld from the press and kept within the party. "That is why" he said, "we are considering it here in a closed session. We should know the limits; we should not give ammunition to the enemy; we should not wash our dirty linen before hie eyes." Thestatement was greeted with loud appluuse.

Perhaps the most ironical passage in the speech dealt with President Tito, that is, it is ironical now, when Tito is having the reception of a prodigal son in Moscow. Stalin personally engineered the break with Yugoslavia, and at the time he told Khrushchef: "I have only to shake my little finger, and there will be no more Tito." We have paid dearly said Khrushchev" for the shaking of the little finger."

Of all the shattering political events of this era, it is hard to match this Khrushchev speech. It did more than smash a national idol. It indicated the system that created and bore so long with the mad tyrant. It may be, as some in Washington are inclined to believe, that in the end Stalin himself was killed, to prevent still blacker crimes. If so, the story was not in the least redeemed, but was made only the more instructive.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. First, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: Khrushchev has portrayed Stalin as a tyrant..full of suspicion.... who killed thousands of comrades in cold blood. Such is the tradition of tyrants. Aeschylus observed, long ago, "The disease somehow inheres in tyranny to have no faith in friends." But Russia is still a totalitarian state. As Cicero said, "Though the tyrant dies, the tyranny persists."

Good Night and Good Luck!

Edward R. Murrow Tues., June 5, 1956

This is the news:

President Eisenhower made a personal appeal tonight, for a restoration of cuts in his foreign aid program./ Last month, the House Foreign Affairs Committee voted to slash more than a billion dollars from the program, and to deny the President the authority he requested for long-term economic assistance./ The measure comes up for debate tomorrow on the House floor, and tonight... on the eve of that debate.... Mr. Eisenhower called in Republican and Democratic leaders of the House, to appeal personally for restoration of the cuts. House Republican Leader Martin said the President believes his mutual security program will be "crippled", if the billion-dollar reduction is allowed to stand.

The Senate Interior Committee gave unanimous approval today to the nomination of Fred Seaton, for secretary of the interior./ The action came after Seaton, a former White House aide, told the committee he supports President Eisenhower's policy of developing water power in partnership with private industry. He succeeds Douglas McKay, who resigned to run for the Senate.

→

The Commerce Department reported today that personal income in April reached an all-time high. Personal farm income in April was up 500-million dollars over the preceding month.

Returns from yesterday's primary in Iowa show Republican Senator Hickenlooper renominated for a third term. His opponent, Dayton Countryman, conceded defeat by saying, "The farmers have shown they are happy." Countryman had campaigned for high, rigid supports.

Primary elections were held today in California, New York, Montana, and South Dakota. President Eisenhower was assured of victory in the presidential primaries in all four states. Here in New York, most of the 98 delegate votes for the Democratic national convention are expected to go to Governor Harriman. The big race is between Adlai Stevenson and Senator Kefauver in California, where 68 delegate votes are at stake. In all of these primaries, the voting is still in progress. ~~Meanwhile~~ City ~~meeting in Birmingham is reported a little heavier than expected.~~

In Montgomery, Alabama, a three-judge court panel ruled today that racial segregation on Montgomery city buses is unconstitutional. The decision was split, 2 to 1. The majority opinion said that both city and state segregation laws requiring separate seating facilities for white and Negro passengers violate the Federal Constitution. The dissenting opinion held that separate but equal facilities are constitutional. ~~The majority decision does not take immediate effect, since a formal judgment has not been entered. Opposing attorneys were given two weeks in which to submit their views on how the formal anti-segregation order should be entered... and whether a stay should be granted pending an appeal. In this case, an appeal can be made directly to the Supreme Court.~~

~~A Negro boycott of Montgomery city buses today entered its seventh month.~~

Marshal Tito of Yugoslavia began formal talks with Soviet leaders today in Moscow. And it was noted that Molotov, who resigned last week as foreign minister, took part in the discussions. No report was issued on the progress on the talks. But at a Kremlin luncheon, Tito said the problem of world disarmament demands "immediate solution". (In Washington, Republican Senator McCarthy introduced a bill to cut off American aid to Yugoslavia. He said to continue helping Yugoslavia in the face of Tito's pro-Russian statements would be "stark immorality").

→

Prime Minister U Nu of Burma resigned today to give full attention to reorganizing his party. His successor is the defense minister, OO-BAH-SWAY U Ba Swe, who said there will be no change in Burma's foreign policy.

French Premier Guy Mollet was given a vote of confidence tonight in the National Assembly. The main issue was the government's policy toward Algeria, and Mollet won the test 271 to 59. The 150 Communist deputies abstained. During the debate, the government was asked about the shipment of French arms to Arab countries. Foreign Minister Pineau said that France would discontinue the shipment of all small arms to the Middle East.

France and West Germany have announced the procedure by which the Saar will be transferred to German control. Under the agreement... reached by French Premier Mollet and West German Chancellor Adenauer... the Saar will return to Germany next January first. For the three following years, special measures will liquidate France's economic union with the Saar. And, after that, France will retain only certain agreed economic and customs privileges. Experts will now put the details into a formal treaty, to be ratified by the German and French parliaments.

It was announced today that Chancellor Adenauer will arrive in New York on Saturday, for a brief visit in this country. On Monday, he will go to Washington for informal talks with President Eisenhower and Secretary of State Dulles.

Edward R. Murrow: June 5, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

I want to come back again to the Khrushchev speech on Stalin's misdeeds, to say that one must doubt that it will bring much assurance to the Soviet people that such things will not happen again. What Khrushchev denounced in Stalin was not that he used terror, but that he used it against Communists and innocent people. Lenin used terror and believed in it - against enemies of the revolution. Khrushchev went out of his way to make this clear. The down-grading of Stalin was not because he was brutal and cruel, but because he was brutal and cruel to the wrong people, and at the wrong time. Lenin used terror when the revolution was in danger, Khrushchev said. When power had been attained, he turned it off. Stalin used terror after the revolution already had won. But while Khrushchev used the most violent language to describe what Stalin did he also said this: "Stalin believed that what he did was necessary for the defense of the interests of the working classes against the plotting of enemies and the attack of the imperialist camp. We cannot say that these were the deeds of a giddy despot. He considered that this should be done in the interest of the laboring people, of the working masses, in the name of defense of the revolution. In this lies the whole tragedy."

The passage might well dismay many in the Soviet Union when they hear of it. It came in Khrushchev's explanation why Stalin's colleagues on the Central Committee and the Politburo did not curb him. They didn't at first, because they knew Stalin had fought loyally for Leninism, he said. They felt they must back him up. They didn't fight him. at the end because it became too dangerous to do so. The Central Committee and the Politburo did not meet often, and Stalin dominated the Politburo by breaking it up into groups of six, seven and eight, which kept many members from knowing what was being done. So when Stalin might have been stopped, he wasn't. Then it grew too late.

If this could happen once, what keeps it from happening again? Khrushchev did not answer this beyond promising that the principle of collective leadership had been restored. That is the principle expounded by, and adhered to, by Lenin. But if it could be swept aside by Stalin, it could be swept aside by someone as able and ambitious as Stalin, though probably not yet. It is too early for the consolidation of one-man power.

At present, Soviet citizens can mark a change in the air. Neighbors aren't being sent off in the night to prison camps, and a few who were sent are coming back. New laws have been decreed strengthening the codes of justice. But they also know that justice codes were over-ridden before.

The Kremlin has been able to keep the Khrushchev speech pretty much of a secret, but that is soon to end. The text is being poured over the Iron Curtain by dozens of radio stations. Before long the shock that registered in the Congress when Khrushchev spoke will be felt from one end of the country to the other.

One may be sure that the pathetic appeals which innocent prisoners of Stalin or Beria wrote from their death cells will become part of folk history, as stories of martyrdom so often do. Khrushchev quoted some of these with electric effect. Here is what Old Bolshevik Kedrov wrote to the Central Committee after having experienced Beria's torture chamber: "I am calling you from a gloomy cell in the Lefortovsky prison. Let my cry of horror reach your ears! Do not remain deaf; take me under your protection! Please help remove the nightmare of interrogations, and show me this has all been a mistake. My torture has reached the extreme. My health is broken, my strength and energy are waning, the end is drawing near. How monstrous this all is! Unsurpassed bitterness and pain grip my heart. No! no! this will not happen, this cannot be! Neither the party nor the Soviet Government, nor the People's Commissar will permit this irreparable injustice. I believe that truth and justice will triumph. I believe! I believe!" The Military Collegium has subsequently established Kedrov's innocence. But Beria had had him shot.

The effect of the repudiation of Stalin will probably be much greater in the Satellite countries. They had been Stalin's exclusive charge, he had decreed their exploitation and ~~run~~ dominated their internal affairs. After the revolt of Tito he became even more ruthless. Now, not only has Stalin's policy been modified, Tito is back in Moscow enjoying the full vindication of his defiance of Stalin. The satellites have been told they are to enjoy greater independence. "You must swim by yourselves", Khrushchev has told their leaders.

But satellite peoples will know they have Tito to thank for this more than Khrushchev. Tito stood up to Stalin while he lived. Khrushchev had to wait till he died. Inside Russia the dictatorship does not appear to be greatly weakened. But the world will watch these neighboring countries with new expectations.

In Prague yesterday flags were raised for an international festival. For the first time the Soviet flag did not fly at the highest level alongside the Czech flag, but was below it, along with the flags of the other visiting countries. It could be a symbol.

Bob Hite.

Word for Today

The West is seeing to it that Khrushchev's expose of Stalin gets to the people living behind the Iron Curtain. For as Thoreau said, "It takes two to speak the truth---one to speak, another to hear." And William James said, "There is no worse lie than a truth misunderstood by those who hear it." ~~The~~ ~~chance~~ the Russian people will ~~not~~ probably understand.

Goodnight and good luck!

Edward R. Murrow June 6, 1956
Wednesday

This is the news:

President Eisenhower said today it would be "tragic" not to support his foreign aid program. Mr. Eisenhower told his weekly news conference, "We must continue to wage peace." He said, "As long as we are not shooting, we are not spending one-tenth as much as we would if we were shooting. And remember," he said, "there is no destruction that we saw in World War Two that would even give a hint of what another war would bring." Mr. Eisenhower reportedly told House leaders last night that the cut of more than a billion dollars... voted by the House Foreign Affairs Committee... would endanger national security. House Speaker Rayburn said today that he will try to have 600-million dollars of the cut restored. Chairman Richards of the House Foreign Affairs Committee said the President's eleventh hour plea failed to convince him that the committee had made a mistake. But Rayburn described the chances of restoring the 600-million as "pretty good".

Mr. Eisenhower was asked about Marshal Tito's visit to Moscow, and whether it would affect American aid to Yugoslavia. And the President agreed there would have to be a re-evaluation of policy. "We will have to take a look," he said, "and see what serves our best interests." Regarding countries like India... which are neutral... he reminded reporters that the United States was a young country once, "and we were neutral."

President Eisenhower said that if Secretary of Defense Wilson were invited to visit Russia, he would certainly invite the Soviet defense minister... Marshal Zhukov... to visit the United States, if Zhukov showed an interest in coming. Mr. Eisenhower said the speech by Communist Party Boss Khrushchev, denouncing Stalin, revealed clearly how the Communist system subjugates the individual to the state. It was meant to be a denunciation of a dictator, he said, but it was actually a denunciation of dictatorship. He believed the speech was intended primarily for home consumption.

On the subject of domestic politics, the President said he was adopting a hands-off attitude on the candidacy of Republican Senator Wiley for re-election. Wiley has been a strong supporter of Administration foreign policy. And largely because of support of that policy, the Republican state convention in Wisconsin recently denied him endorsement for another term. Mr. Eisenhower said, "I don't believe this is a place where the President of the United States should be interfering." When informed of Mr. Eisenhower's attitude, Senator Wiley said he agreed "fully" that the President should not become involved in primaries. At the same time, Wiley said he hoped Mr. Eisenhower "might choose" to express regard for his loyalty, without attempting to interfere in the forthcoming Wisconsin primary.

The last major primary of 1956 was held yesterday in California. For the results... and what they may signify... here is my colleague, Eric Sevareid, reporting from Los Angeles.

report to run approx four minutes, returns on cue "--to Ed Murrow in New York."

The Senate today confirmed the nomination of Fred Seaton for secretary of the interior. The vote was unanimous. The Senate also approved the nomination of Charles Lowen, Jr., as administrator of the Civil Aeronautics Administration.

Soviet Premier Bulganin said today... in a broadcast beamed to South America... that Russia is cutting its armed forces because it sees no possibility of war. "In Europe," he said, "Britain will not start a war. The French don't want it, and the Germans can't make it." / Bulganin described the possibilities of trade between Russia and the Latin American countries as "very bad". But he offered Russian collaboration in technical and industrial projects, with... he said... no strings attached.

Russia and Yugoslavia signed a trade agreement today, increasing the exchange of goods between the two countries, this year, by 40-million dollars. The agreement makes Russia Yugoslavia's biggest partner in foreign trade.

In Russia today, Marshal Tito visited an atomic power plant... and then attended a reception in his honor at the Kremlin. He said at the reception, that Senator McCarthy's resolution to cut off American aid to Yugoslavia was "not very important". / He predicted his reconciliation with Moscow will have no effect on Yugoslavia's "friendly relations with the United States." My colleague, Dan Schorr, asked Tito if he would like to visit the United States. And Tito said, "If I'm invited, of course I'll go. But I haven't been invited."

A Cairo newspaper said today that Egyptian Premier Nasser will visit Marshal Tito in Belgrade soon. The date is indefinite.

In Paris, the French government today banned the further shipment of light arms to the Middle East. The boycott applies to both Israel and the Arab states.

And in Algeria today, French troops... supported by tanks... sealed off a large mountainous area, east of Algiers, in the hope that a considerable rebel force would be trapped. The troops are now engaged in "tightening the noose".

British Foreign Secretary Selwyn Lloyd said today that Communist China has asked for permission to set up a special diplomatic office in Hong Kong. The office, Lloyd said, would be filled by what Red China chooses to call "a commissioner of foreign affairs", and his staff. Lloyd told the House of Commons, Communist China made the request in February, but that no action had been taken. The proposal, he said, raises issues that "want consideration".

Indonesia announced today that... like Malaya and Singapore... it will soon start making rubber shipments to Red China. The announcement said Indonesia was no longer observing the embargo voted by the United Nations General Assembly (at the start of the Korean War), in order "to safeguard Indonesian rubber producers, and protect the national interest." Indonesia, with Malaya and Singapore, produces more than half the world's supply of natural rubber. Much of that supply will now be available to Communist China.

Hiram Bingham, the former senator from Connecticut, died in Washington today after a long illness. Mr. Bingham also served a year as governor of Connecticut. He was 80 years old.

Here in New York today, police searched the Dominican Line freighter Fundacion for clues in the disappearance of Dr. Jesus de Galindez (GA-LEAN-DEZ), an instructor at Columbia University and a bitter foe of General Trujillo of the Dominican Republic. Galindez disappeared mysteriously on March 12th. Anti-Trujillo forces charged he had been murdered on board the freighter. Police who searched the ship for four hours today said they found no sign of violence.

Representatives of the nation's three biggest steel companies and the United Steelworkers Union resumed their bargaining talks today in New York. The contract talks had been taking place in Pittsburgh. Both sides appeared hopeful that a new agreement would be reached before the current contract expires on June 30th.

The Western Union Telegraph Company reached agreement today with two unions on a new two-year contract. The contract ~~Among other benefits, the contract~~ calls for a 13-cent-an-hour pay increase for all Western Union employes.

Word for Today

Adlai Stevenson has won a major test in his campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination. And Mr. Stevenson doubtless would agree with Polybius, who said it takes great skill and wisdom to make use of victory. Nor does Senator Kefauver mean to surrender. He would say with Wendell Phillips, "What is defeat? Nothing but education."

Goodnight and good luck!

CBS RADIO DIVISION

EDWARD R. MURROW

Wednesday, June 6, 1956
7:45-8:00 p.m.

MURROW: ..... The last major primary of 1956 was held yesterday in California. For the results and what they may signify here is my colleague, Eric Sevareid, reporting from Los Angeles.

SEVAREID: Ed, we've seen a dramatic climax to the long, gruelling contest between Kefauver and Stevenson out here in California and we've also seen evidence of a gradual shift in party allegiances in this second largest State in the Union. At this hour the returns are still not complete but Stevenson is running around eight hundred thousand votes, Kefauver around five hundred thousand. President Eisenhower will run up somewhere toward nine hundred thousand perhaps. He's getting more than Stevenson but he will end up with about four hundred thousand below the combined Democratic total. This is cause enough to produce some hard Republicanwork out here for next November, but not cause enough for any really deep Republican worry. The President, after all, was unopposed in the Republican primary.

This primary here has been a surprise to political experts on two counts: the size of the total turn-out and the size of the Stevenson victory over Kefauver. Stevenson's margin is about thirty percent bigger than even his own hopeful advisors were predicting when I got out here last week. The vote turn-out was not spectacular but stronger than the surface air of apathy had indicated it would be. Perhaps Kefauver's tactics helped turn out the voters. That was his aim in stepping up his personal attacks on Stevenson throughout the State, but there's no evidence in the figures that the larger turn-out helped the Senator at all and they may ... it may have harmed him. The California vote has not definitely decided who the Democratic nominee will be; it has decided who it will not be, - it will not be Mr. Kefauver. That, at least, is the conviction of the small band of eastern political reporters who shuttled last night back and forth between the gloom in Kefauver's headquarters and the declamatory joy in the Stevenson headquarters Stevenson himself, of course, was pleased and relieved but not exactly exuding joy. He was looking fresh and strong, but he already had his mind on the problems that lie ahead. Many of the professionals out here think nobody now can stop him from getting the nomination, but apparently he isn't ready himself to work on that assumption. He's obviously been unhappy about the turn the struggle has taken over the last weeks, not so much because he was forced to the hand-shaking, streetcorner-style of campaigning, he has demonstrated he can do that and enjoy it, but because of the acrimony that developed in Florida and carried over here, the bruised feelings and enmity that have developed within his party, What they may have done to party unity and to his own prospects by enveloping him in intra-party controversy. At any rate, he's won back his place ad the Democratic front-runner and he's done it the hard way. (?) Earlier on he distressed the party professionals who thought he was too lofty and remote from ordinary people, then he slugged it out on the streetcorner level, meeting tens of thousands of ordinary people and this distressed his intellectual supporters who thought he wasn't lofty enough. Well, if he is stopped in the convention by a swing to a dark horse, the swing is now less likely toward a compromise choice like Senator Symington and more likely toward a militant "new dealer" like Harriman. That assumes, of course, if the northern Governors in the convention with the Negro vote in mind will decide on a showdown with the south, but California has probably diminished that possibility. Stevenson now has some hard evidence that he is not opposed by a majority of Negroes. He has shown real strength among them in the north, Minneapolis; in the south, Florida, and now out here in the west.

This State has more registered Demerats than Republicans, yet Republicans have controlled the State House for nearly twenty years, have both Senate seats, most of the House seats. There are a lot of complicated reasons for this anomely that I won't go into here, but, anyway, for years many Republicans have been winning nomination in both parties. Well, yesterday's results suggest the end of this one-way street may be in sight. Generally Republican candidates did not win in the Democratic primary so theymust fight it out in November in the fashion normal to other States. Even many Democrats here think Eisenhower will win California in November, but there seems little doubt that on other levels the Democratic threat to Republican domination out here is rising.

Now, back to Ed Murrow in New York.

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 6, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

This is the news:

President Eisenhower said today it would be "tragic" not to support his foreign aid program. Mr. Eisenhower told his weekly news conference, "We must continue to wage peace." He said, "As long as we are not shooting, we are not spending one-tenth as much as we would if we were shooting. And remember," he said, "There is no destruction that we saw in World War Two that would even give a hint of what another war would bring." Mr. Eisenhower reportedly told House leaders last night that the cut of more than a billion dollars.. voted by the House Foreign Affairs Committee..would endanger national security. House Speaker Rayburn said today that he will try to have 600-million dollars of the cut restored Chairman Richards of the House Foreign Affairs Committee said that the President's eleventh hour plea failed to convince him that the committee had made a mistake. But Rayburn described the chances of restoring the 600-billion as "pretty good."

Mr. Eisenhower was asked a out Marshal Tito's visit to Moscow, and whether it would affect American aid to Yugoslavia. And the President agreed there would have to be a re-evaluation of policy. "We will have to take a look, " he said, "and see what serves our best interests." Regarding countries like India...which are neutral..he reminded reporters that the United States was a young country once "and we were neutral."

President Eisenhower said that if Secretary of Defense Wilson were invited to visit Russia, he would certainly invite the Soviet defense minister Marshal Zhukov..to visit the United States, if Zhukov showed an interest in coming. Mr. Eisenhower said the speech by Communist Party Boss Khrushchev, denouncing Stalin revealed clearly how the Communist system subjugates the individual to the state. It was meant to be a denunciation of a dictator, he said, but it was actually a denunciation of dictatorship. He believed the speech was intended primarily for home consumption.

On the subject of domestic politics, the President said he was adopting a hands - off attitude on the candidacy of Republican Senator Wiley for re-election. Wiley had been a strong supporter of Administration foreign policy. And largely because of support of that policy, the Republican state convention in Wisconsin recently denied him endorsement for another term. Mr. Eisenhower said, "I don't believe this is a place where the President of the United States should be interfering." When informed of Mr. Eisenhower's attitude, Senator Wiley said he agreed "fully" that the President should not become involved in primaries. At the same time, Wiley said he hoped Mr. Eisenhower "might choose" to express regard for his loyalty, without attempting to interfere in the forthcoming Wisconsin primary.

The last major primary of 1956 was held yesterday in California. For the results, and what they may signify..here is my colleague, Eric Sevareid, reporting from Los Angeles.

SEVAREID: Ed, we've seen a dramatic climax to a long, gruelling contest between Kefauver and Stevenson out here in California and we've also seen evidence of a gradual shift in party allegiances in this second largest state in the Union. At this hour the returns are still not complete but Stevenson is running around eight hundred thousand votes, Kefauver around five hundred thousand. President Eisenhower will run up somewhere toward nine hundred thousand perhaps. He's getting more than Stevenson but he will end up with about four hundred thousand below the combined Democratic total. This is cause enough to produce some hard Republican work out here for next November.

but not cause enough for any equaly deep Republican worry. The President, after all, was unopposed in the Republican primary.

This primary here has been a surprise to political experts on two counts: the size of the total turn-out and the size of the Stevenson victory over Kefauver. Stevenson's margin is about thirty percent bigger than even his own hopeful advisors were predicting when I got out here last week. The vote turn-out was not spectacular but stronger than the surface air of apathy had indicated it would be. Perhaps Kefauver's tactics helped turn out the voters. That was his aim in stepping up his personal attacks on Stevenson throughout the state, but there's no evidence in the figures that the larger turn-out helped the Senator at all and they may...it may have harmed him. The Californis vote has not definitely decided who the Democratic nominee will be; it has decided who it will not be, - it will not be Mr. Kefauver. That, at least, is the conviction of the small band of esstern political reporters who shuttled last night back and forth between the gloom in Kefauver's headquarters and the declamatory joy in the Stevenson headquarters. Stevenson himself, of course, was pleased and relieved but not exactly exuding joy. He was looking fresh and strong, but he already had his mind on the problems that lie ahead. Many of the professionals out here think nobody now can stop him from getting the nomination, but apparently he isn't ready himself to work on that assumption. He's obviously been unhappy about the turn the struggle had taken over the last weeks, not so much because he was forced to the hand-shaking, street corner style of campaigning, he has demonstrated he can to that and enjoy it, but because of the acrimony that developed in Florida and carried over here, the bruised feelings and enmity that have developed within his party, what they may have done to party unity and to his own prosspects by envloping him in intra-party controversy. At any rate, he's won back his place as the Democratic front-runner and he's done it the hard way. Earlier he distressed the party professionals who thought he was too lofty and remote from ordinary people, then he slugged it out on the streetcorner level, meeting tens of thousands of ordinary people and this distressed his intellectual supporters who thought he wasn't lofty enough. Well, if he is stopped in the convention by a swing to a dark horse, the swing is now less likely toward a compromise choice like Senator Symington and more likely toward a militant "new dealer" like Harriman. That assumes, of course, if the northern governors in the convention with the Negro vote in mind will decide on a show-down with the south, but California has probably diminished that possibility. Stevenson now has some hard evidence that he is not opposed by a majority of Negroes. He has shown real strength among them in the north, Minneapolis; in the south, Florida, and now out here in the West.

This state has more registered Democrats than Republicans , yet Republicans have controlled the State House for nearly twenty years, have both Senate seats, most of the House seats. There are a lot of complicated reasons for this anomely that I won't go into here, but, anyway, for years many Republicans have been winning nomination in both parties. Well, yesterday results suggest the end of this one-way street may be in sight. Generally Republican candidates did not win in the Democratic primary to they must fight it out in November in the fashion normal to other states. Even many Democrats here think Eisenhower will win California in November, but there seems little doubt that on other levels the Democratic threat to Republican domination out here is rising.

Now, back to Ed Murrow in New York.

MURROW: The Senate today confirmed the nomination of Fred Seaton for Secretary of the Interior. The vote was unanimous. The Senate also approved the nomination of Charles Lowen, Jr., as administrator of the Civil Aeronautics Administration.

Soviet Premier Bulganin said today..in a broadcast beamed to South America..that Russia is cutting its armed forces because it sees no possibility of war. "In Europe", he said, "Britain will not start a war. The French don't want it, and the Germans can't make it." Bulganin described the possibilities of trade between Russia and the Latin American countries as "very bad". But he offered Russian collaboration in technical and industrial projects, with, he said, no strings attached.

Russia and Yugoslavia signed a trade agreement today, increasing the exchange of goods between the two countries this year by 40-million dollars. The agreement makes Russia Yugoslavia'a biggest partner in foreign trade.

In Russia today, Marshal Tito visited an atomic power plant...and then attended a reception in his honor at the Kremlin. He said at the reception that Senator McCarthy's resolution to cut off American aid to Yugoslavia was "not very important". He predicted his reconcilliation with Moscow will have no effect on Yugoslavia's "friendly relations with the United States." My colleague, Dan Schorr, asked Tito if he would like th visit the United States. And Tito said, "If I'm invited, of course I'll go. But I haven't been invited."

A Cairo newspaper said today that Egyptian Premier Nasser will visit Marshal Tito in Belgrade soon. The date is indefinite.

In Paris, the French government today banned the further shipment of light arms to the Middle East. The boycott applies to both Israel and the Arab states.

And in Algeria today, French troops..supported by tanks..sealed off a large mountainous area, east of Algiers, in the hope that a considerable rebel force would be trapped. The troops are now engaged in "tightening the noose."

British Foreign Secretary Selwyn Lloyd said today that Communist China has asked for permission to set up a special diplomatic office in Hong Kong. The office, Lloyd said, would be filled by what Red China chooses to call "a commissioner of foreign affairs", and his staff. Lloyd told the House of Commons Communist China made the request in February, tht that no action was taken. The proposal, he said, raises issues that "want consideration."

Indonesia announced today. that...Like Malaya and Singapore..it will soon start making rubber shipments to Red China. The announcement said Indonesia was no longer observing the embargo voted by the United Nations General Assembly (at the start of the Korean War), in order to "safeguard Indonesian rubber producers and protect the national interest." Indonesia, with Malaya and Singapore, produces more than half the world's supply of natural rubber. Much of that supply will now be available to Communist China.

Hiram Bingham, the former senator from Connecticut, died in Washington today after a long illness. Mr. Bingham also served a year as governor of Connecticut. He was 80 years old.

Here in New York today, police searched the Dominican Line freighter Fundacion for clues in the disappearance of Dr. Jesus de Galindez, an instructor at Columbia University and a bitter foe of General Trujillo of the Dominican Republic. Galindez disappeared mysteriously on March 12th. Anti-Trujillo forces charged he had been murdered on board the freighter. Police who searched the ship for four hours today said they found no sign of violence.

Representatives of the nation's three biggest steel companies and the Unites Steelworkers Union resumed their bargaining talks today in New York. The contract talks had been taking place in Pittsburgh. Both sides appeared hopeful that a new agreement would be reached before the current contract expires on June 30th.

The Western Union Telegraph Company reached agreement today with the unions on a new two-year contract. The contract calls for a 13-cent-an-hour pay increase for all Western Union employees.

This is Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. Now, here is Bob Dixon.

DIXON: COMMERCIAL

MURROW: Adlai Stevenson has won a major test in his campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination. And Mr. Stevenson doubtless would agree with Polybius, who said it takes great skill and wisdom to make use of victory. Nor does Senator Kefauver mean to surrender. He would say with Wendell Phillips, "What is defeat? Nothing but education."

Good Night and Good Luck.

Collingwood for Murrow June 7, 1956 - Thursday

Good evening:

This is Charles Collingwood. Just for tonight, I am taking Mr. Murrow's place at this microphone.

Supporters of President Eisenhower's foreign aid program lost a major battle today on the floor of the House. This is what happened. Mr. Eisenhower sent a letter to Republican House Leader Martin, expressing his conviction that the national security... and the security of the free world... would be seriously impaired, if the cut of more than a billion dollars voted by the House Foreign Affairs Committee were allowed to stand. Martin read the President's letter to the House and added his own personal appeal. House Speaker Rayburn urged the House to restore 600-million dollars of the cut, calling it "the best money Congress ever gave." But Chairman Richards of the Foreign Affairs Committee replied by charging Martin and Rayburn of trying to "destroy" two months of committee work. He said that with the cut, there was still "amply sufficient" money to meet any foreign challenge. Republican Representative Vorys then made a formal motion to have 600-million dollars of the cut restored. And the motion was defeated by a vote of 192 to 112. Because of the parliamentary situation when the vote was taken, ~~it was not a roll-call vote~~, it is subject to reconsideration. But both Republican and Democratic leaders [redacted] of the House despair of getting any sizeable amount of money put back in the bill. The House will take up the foreign aid program again tomorrow. It still has to be acted upon by the Senate.

President Eisenhower has received a new message from Soviet Premier Bulganin. White House News Secretary Jim Hagerty says the contents of the message will probably be released in the next couple of days. Mr. Eisenhower and the Russian premier have exchanged a series of messages since the summit conference last summer in Geneva... dealing mostly with the subject of disarmament. This latest message... in the form of a bulky letter... was delivered in Washington this afternoon by the Soviet ambassador.

For some time, former Senator Cain of Washington State has been wanting to talk to President Eisenhower about the government's security program as it affects federal employes. Cain, who is a member of the Subversive Activities Control Board, has complained of alleged injustices in the program. Today he met with the President for nearly an hour. He said after the meeting that he is hopeful injustices of individuals under the program would no longer be tolerated.

The United Nations secretary general... Dag Hammarskjold... held a news conference today and again expressed his conviction that both Israel and the Arab states want peace. He said, "I repeat emphatically that there is a will to peace among all the parties." Hammarskjold declined to say what steps he will take next, in his effort to promote a settlement of the Palestine problem. He did say he does not plan another trip, similar to his peace mission last month. He will depend, rather, on contacts with representatives of the countries involved and reports from United Nations observers on the scene.

Democratic Senator Mansfield said today that... in his "far-flung travels"... Secretary of State Dulles had "somehow managed virtually to overlook the second largest continent---Africa." Mansfield is a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. In a speech on the Senate floor, he warned that Russia is "moving deeply into Africa", in a cultural, diplomatic and economic penetration, and that the United States must meet the challenge. Mansfield proposed,,. as a start... the appointment of an assistant secretary of state for African affairs. He also suggested the technical assistance program in Africa be expanded, and that the nationalist ambitions of the people there be recognized. Our policy, Mansfield said, must be based on "a firm devotion to the concepts of free men."]

The State Department announced new tariff cuts today, equivalent to nearly a billion dollars a year. None of the new tariff reductions apply to imports from the Soviet bloc. They pertain to a wide variety of goods... ranging from copper to scotch whiskey... and, in return, 21 countries have cut their tariffs on American exports, ranging from heavy machinery to canned fruits and vegetables. The whole thing is on a reciprocal basis.

Secretary of Commerce Weeks said today that... in May... 65-million persons in the United States had jobs. That's a new record for the month. And it's just half a million short of the all-time record set in August of last year.

The Army announced today that 500-thousand ready reservists are being transferred to a standby reserve status. The Army said it will take a year to complete the screening process, starting July first. It described the action as a wholesale effort to terminate the service liability of veterans of the Korean War and World War Two.

The West German government said today that it will contribute 155-million dollars toward the maintenance of American troops in Germany. Negotiations on the amount of money West Germany would pay toward the support of British, Franch and American forces stationed in Germany have been in progress for months. The United States has apparently accepted a much smaller contribution than it demanded at the start of the talks.

In Korea, the neutral nations supervisory commission announced today that it is withdrawing its truce supervisors to the demilitarized zone. A week ago, the U.N. command ordered Polish and Czech inspectors on the commission to get out of South Korea, because of their "flagrantly un-neutral" behavior. The commission was set up in 1953, under the terms of the Korean armistice. No complaints were lodged against members of the inspection teams from Sweden and Switzerland.

David Marshall resigned today as chief minister of Singapore. Marshall, you remember, said last month he would resign unless the British gave Singapore its independence. Britain agreed to let the colony have a large measure of freedom, but said it had to maintain control of internal security because of the Communist threat. Marshall insisted on full independence, and so today handed his resignation in to the British governor. His Chinese deputy... Lim Yew Hock... has agreed to try to form a new government.

Prime Minister Eden announced today that Great Britain has decided "to carry out a limited number of nuclear test explosions in the megaton range." The phrase "megaton range" means that for the first time Britain will be testing a hydrogen device. Eden said the tests will be conducted early next year and will not involve a heavy radioactive fall-out. He made the announcement before the House of Commons. "I do not see any reason," he said, "why this country should not make experiments similar to those carried out by Russia and the United States."

The French foreign minister... Christian Pineau... made a speech today before the American Club in Paris, and said the West must beware of putting up an Iron Curtain of its own. Pineau said when he visits Washington in about ten days he will suggest that cultural and economic exchanges between Russia and the United States be increased... and that the United States be cautious, but not repel Russian gestures of friendship. He indicated that... while in Washington... he will also promote his plan to have help for underdeveloped countries channeled through the U.N.

Reports from Vienna say that last week Russian secret police arrested more than a hundred persons in the Peoples Republic of Georgia, where Stalin was born. According to these reports... which are not confirmed but which are attributed to Western diplomatic sources... the arrests were made when a rash of posters appeared in the capital city of Tiflis, proclaiming an independent Georgian state. Three months ago, Georgia was the scene of violent demonstrations against the downgrading of Stalin. And the full story of what happened then has never been told.

Marshal Tito is now making a tour of Russia. Today the Yugoslav president is in Leningrad. And Premier Bulganin, who went along on the trip, told Tito, "The unbreakable friendship between the Soviet and Yugoslav peoples has been restored." Tito recalled that he had been in Leningrad 39 years ago, during the revolution, and had taken part in the street fighting in progress at that time. No mention was made of Stalin.

We received a cable today from our colleague, Daniel Schorr, who has been covering this rather remarkable visit. And I should like to read it to you. His report begins:

On his arrival last Saturday he referred to "something incredible and tragic in Soviet-Yugoslav relations" without mentioning Stalin's denunciation of him in 1948. Monday he visited the Lenin-Stalin tomb, stopping to look at Lenin, passing by the body of Stalin. Yesterday at the Moscow (formerly Stalin) automobile plant Tito told a workers' rally: "We noticed one more fact which must not be underestimated. There is now a smile and a bold look in the eyes, on the faces, of the citizens of the Soviet Union." Tito left last night for Leningrad, to start his tour of the Soviet Union. In his five days in Moscow there has been only one formal negotiating session with Soviet leaders, lasting two and three-quarter hours. It's apparent that negotiations are not his main purpose; ~~He has reviewed international problems with Soviet leaders, endorsing their policies where they correspond to his,~~ - on disarming and aid to underdeveloped countries but not on Germany. ~~He has expressed willingness to strengthen the bonds between governments which were renewed with the Khrushchev-Bulganin visit to Belgrade last year, but he told me~~ Schorr says he ~~has not discussed party relations, adding that he's willing to cooperate with the Soviet Communist Party on the same basis as~~ with any other Socialist group. It is clear that after his experience

12

Things have happened here in the past five days which are not commonly seen in Moscow. Last Sunday night, at President Tito's suggestion, he and Nikita Khrushchev took a walk down Gorky Street, Moscow's Fifth Avenue, the first time a Communist leader has been seen strolling down a street in Moscow, ~~and when the excited crowd pressed them too close it was not dispersed. Instead, Khrushchev and Tito took refuge in an ice cream parlor, whiling away the time with ice cream and champagne until they could be rescued.~~ The other day a man left his car parked in the middle of a busy street and clambered out to get a view of Tito. When a policeman expostulated that his car was blocking traffic, the driver said: "Take the car away if you want to. I must see Tito." It is such things, Schorr says, more than the formal ceremonies, more than last night's glittering Kremlin reception, which have provided the greatest drama of Tito's return to Moscow after ten years and Tito, fully aware of the drama, is playing his role with masterful understatement. ~~He never stresses his role too heavily, but never lets it be forgotten.~~ He has not once referred to Stalin by name but has managed to convey in every speech, in every action, that he is here because there has been a big change.

16

~~in 1948 he is against the creation of any~~ new international Communist ~~organization.~~

Schorr says that Tito has in fact brought to Moscow a new doctrine of co-existence. The Soviets have talked of co-existence between Socialism and Capitalism. Tito's idea is that there must also be free co-existence among Socialist countries. ~~He agrees with the Soviets that a Communist country can get along with a capitalist country, but he does not assume that Communist countries necessarily get along well with each other, not unless they leave each other alone, not unless they work hard at good relations, and his idea of co-existence is good relations among individual states, not between blocs of states. He is as strongly opposed to any Communist bloc as he is to any western bloc.~~ Schorr says Tito Tito holds that there are many roads to Socialism. ~~He thinks that the bourgeois Nehru in India and the military Nasser in Egypt are moving toward Socialism in their way and he wants to see each country free to move in its own way.~~

The Soviets have already made their bow to Tito by proclaiming the "many roads to Socialism" doctrine, and by beginning to relax their hold on countries in their orbit.

7

Tito wants to see this process speeded up, carried further, and, most of all, he would like to encourage the "new look" in the Soviet Union, which, to him, looks as the best guarantee that he will be free to pursue his own course. That's why he appears in public wherever he can, as the living embodiment of the big change. That's why he shakes hands with workers and chucks babies under the chin. If he acts like a candidate it is because, in a sense, he is running for something. But what do the Soviets want of Tito? Why have they been falling all over themselves to meet his views? Tito's Yugoslavia, as the one Communist country on good terms with the West, is a key transmission belt for the Soviet co-existence campaign. Through him they think they may help to persuade the west that Russia today is really more relaxed and more tolerant. The notion that Russia is trying to lure Tito back into the fold is pointless in terms of present Soviet aims. The Russians would like to prove that there is no fold any more, in the old sense. ~~Yesterday, the Soviet Tass News Agency, in translating in English Bulganin's speech at the Kremlin luncheon, had Bulganin saying "on many international problems Yugoslavia has identical views with the Soviet Union."~~

16

Then Tass made a correction in the translation; the word "identical" was changed to "similar."

"The Yugoslavs are anxious to show that the Moscow visit means no weakening in Belgrade's ties with the West. Tito told me last night he was sure his relations with the United States would not suffer because of his trip to Moscow, although he may have been optimistic. He made it clear he would welcome an invitation to Washington, and there is no evidence that the Soviets are pressing him to weaken his Western ties. These links are very useful to present Soviet policy. These are weird times. The head of a state of 17-million people comes to a mighty land of 200-million and is treated like a conquering hero; the man whose name was once a dirty word in the international Communist lexicon gets a buildup such as no foreigner has ever received. The crowds gathering to see him today, in Leningrad, are friendly but also intensely curious, for to them he dramatizes the big change in Russia - and Tito is apparently confident that this will be understood in the United States.

10

That's Dan Schorr's report to us on the Tito visit to Moscow —

(7:57:10)

This is Charles Collingwood, sitting in for Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. (pause) But first, here is Ted Pearson.

Word for Today

The foreign aid program is facing a tough uphill fight. Henry Ford the Second once said, "It seems to me that we want to stand for steadfastness and courage and constructive imagination in our approach to world problems. If we want our influence in the world to be as strong as it should be," he said, "we need only to think and act as befits our strength."

for Ed Murrow

This is Charles Collingwood saying... goodnight and good luck!

57:10
3:45
53:30

53:25

52:25

EDWARD R. MURROW WITH THE NEWS
C.B.S. RADIO NETWORK

TUESDAY, JUNE 7, 1956
7:45--8:00 P.M., E.S.T.

CHARLES COLLINGWOOD REPORTING

Good Evening:

This is Charles Collingwood. Just for tonight, I am taking Mr. Murrow's place at the microphone.

Supporters of President Eisenhower's foreign aid program lost a major battle today on the floor of the House. This is what happened. Mr. Eisenhower sent a letter to Republican House Leader Martin, expressing his conviction that the national security..and the security of the free world..would be seriously impaired, if the cut of more than a billion dollars voted by the House Foreign Affairs Committee were allowed to stand. Martin read the President's letter to the House and added his own personal appeal. House Speaker Rayburn urged the House to restore 600-million dollars of the cut, calling it "the best money Congress ever gave." But Chairman Richards of the Foreign Affairs Committee replied by charging Martin and Rayburn of trying to "destroy" two months of committee work. He said that with the cut, there was still "amply sufficient" money to meet any foreign challenge. Republican Representativ Vorys then made a formal motion to have 600-million dollars of the cut restored. And the motion was defeated by a vote of 192 to 112. Because of the parliamentary situation when the vote was taken, it is subject to reconsideration. But both Republican and Democratic leaders of the House despair of getting any sizeable amount of money put back in the bill. The House will take up the foreign aid program again tomorrow. It still has to be acted upon by the Senate.

President Eisenhower has received a new message from Soviet Premier Bulganin. White House News Secretary Jim Hagerty says the contents of the message will probably be released in the next couple of days. Mr, Eisnnhower and the Russian premier have exchanged a series of messages since the summit conference last summer in Geneva..dealing mostly with the subject of disarmament. This latest message..in the form af a bulky letter..was delivered in Washington this afternoon by the Soviet ambassador.

For some time, former Senator Cain of Washington State has been wanting to tllk to President Eisenhower about the government's security program as it affects federal employes. Cain, who is a member of the Subversive Activities Control Board, has compalined of alleged injustices in the program. Today he met with the President for nearly an hour. He said after the meeting that he is hopeful injustices of individuals under the program would no longer be tolerated.

The United Nation secretary general..Dag Hammarskjold..held a news conference today and again expressed his conviction that both Israel and the Arab states want peace. He said, "I repeat emphatically that there is a will to peace among all the parties." Hammarskjold declined to say what steps he will take next, in his efforts to promote a settelment of the Palestine problem. He did say he does not plan another trip, similar to his peace mission last month. He will depend, rather, on contacts with representatives of the countries involved and reports from United Nations observers on the scene.

Democratic Senator Mansfield said today that ..in his "far-flung travels".. Secretary of State Dulles had "somehow managed virtually to overlook the second largest continent....Africa". Mansfield is a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. In a speech on the Senate floor, he warned that Russia is "moving deeply into Africa", in a cultural, diplomatic and economic penetration, and that the United States must meet the challenge. Mansfield proposed..as a start..the appointment of an assistant secretary of state for African affairs. He also suggested the technical assistance program in Africa be expanded, and that the nationalist ambitions of the people there be recognized. Our policy, Mansfield said, must be based on "a firm devotion to the concepts of free men."

The State Department announced new tariff cuts today, equivalent to nearly a billion dollars a year. None of the new tariff reductions apply to imports from the Soviet bloc. They pertain to a wide variety of goods..ranging from copper to scotch whisky...and, in return, 21 countries have cut their tariffs on American exports, ranging from heavy machinery to canned fruits and vegetables. The whole thing is on a reciprocal basis.

Secretary of Commerce Weeks said today that..in May..65-million persons in the United States had jobs. That's a new record for the month. And it's just a half a million short of the all-time record set for August of last year.

The Army announced today that 500-thousand ready reservists are being transferred to a standby reserve status. The Army said it will take a year to complete the screening process, starting July first. It described the action as a wholesale effort to terminate the service liability of veterans of the Korean War and World War Two.

The West German government said today that it will contribute 155-million dollars toward the maintenance of American troops in Germany. Negotiations on the amount of money West Germany would pay toward the support of British, French and American forces stationed in Germany has been in progress for months. The United States has apparently accepted a much smaller contribution that it demands at the start of the talks.

In Korea, the neutral nations supervisory commission announced today that it is withdrawing its truce supervisors to the demilitarized zone. A week ago, the U.N. command ordered Polish and Czech inspectors on the commission to get out of South Korea, because of their "flagrantly un-neutral" behavior. The commission was set up in 1953, under terms of the Korean armistice. No complaints were lodged against members of the inspection teams from Sweded and Switzerland.

David Marshall resigned today as chief minister of Singapore. Marshall, you remember, said last month he would resign unless the British gave Singapore its independence. Britain agreed to let the colony have a large measure of freedom, but said it had to maintain control of internal security because of the Communist threat. Marshall insisted on full independence, and so today handed his resignation in the British governor... His Chinese deputy... Lim Yew Hock...has agreed to try to form a new government.

Prime Minister Eden announced today that Great Britain has decided "to carry out a limited number of nuclear test explosions in the megaton range." The phrase "megaton range" means that for the first time Britain will be testing a hydrogen device. Eden said the tests will be conducted early next year and will not involve a heavy radioactive fall-out. He made the announcement before the House of Commons. "I do not see any reason," he said, "why this country should not make experiments similar to those carried out by Russia and the United States."

The French foreign minister...Christain Pineau..made a speech today before the American Club in Paris, and said the West must beware of putting up an Iron Curtain of its own. Pineau said when he visits Washington in about ten days he will suggest that cultural and economic exhcanges between Russia and the United States be increased..and that the United States be cautious, but not repel Russian gestures of friendship. He indicated that..while in Washington..he will also promote his plan to have help for under - developed countries channeled through the U.N.

Reports from Vienna say that last week Russian secret police arrested more than a hundred persons in the Peoples Republic of Georgia, where Stalin was born. According to these reports..which are not confirmed but which are attributed to Western diplomatic sources.. the arrests were made when a rash of posters appeared in the capital city of Tiflis, proclaiming an independent Georgian state. Three months ago, Georgia was the scene of violent demonstrations against the downgrading of Stalin. And the full story of what happened then has never been told.

Marshal Tito is not making a tour of Russia. Today the Yugoslav president is in Leningrad. And Premier Bulganin, who went a ong on the trip, told Tito, "The unbreakable friendship between the Soviet and Yugoslav peoples has been restored." Tito recalled that he had been in Leningrad 39 years ago, drring rhe revolution, and had taken part in the street fighting in progress at that time. No mention was made of Stalin.

We received a cable today from our colleague, Daniel Schorr, who has been covering t is rather remarkable visit. And I should like to read it to you. His report begins:

Things have happened here in the past five days which are not commonly seen in Moscow. Last Sunday night, at President Tito's suggestion, he and Nikita Khrushchev took a walk down Gorky Street, Moscow's Fifth Avenue, the first time a Communist leader has been seen strolling down a street in Moscow. The other day a man left his car parked in the middle of a busy street and clambered out to get a view of Tito. When a policeman expostulated that his car was blocking traffic, the driver said: "Take the car away if you want to

to. I must see Tito." It is such things, Schorr says, more than the fomal ceremonies, more than last night's glittering Kremlin reception, which have provided the greatest drama of Tito's return to Mosocw after ten years and Tito, fully aware of the drama, is playing his role with masterful understatement. He has not once referred to Stalin by name but has managed to convey in every speech, in every action, that he is here because there has been a big change.

Schorr says that Tito has in fact brought to Moscow a new doctrine of co-existence. The Soviets have talked of co-existence between Socialism and Captialism. Tito's idea is that ther must also be free co-existence among Socialist countries.

The Soviets have already made their bow to Tito by proclaiming the "many roads to Socialism" doctrine, and by beginning to release their hold on countries in their orbit.

Tito wants to see this process speeded up, carried further, and most of all, he would like to encourage the "new look" in the Soviet Union, which, to him, looks as the best guarantee that he will be free to pursue his own course. That's why he appears in public wherever he can, as the living embodiment of the big change. That's why he shakes hands with workers and chucks babies under the chin. If he acts like a candidate it is because, in a sense, he is running for something. But what to the Soviets want of Tito? Why have they been falling all over themselves to meet his views? Tito's Yugoslavia, as the one Communist country on good terms with the West is a key transmission belt for the Soviet co-existence campaign. Through him they think they may help to persuade the west that Russia today is really more relaxed and more tolerant. The notion that Russia is trying to lure Tito back into the fold is pointless in terms of present Soviet aims. The Russians would like to prove that there is no fold any more, in the old sense.

There is no evidence that the Soviets are pressing him to weaken his Western ties. These links are very useful to present Soviet policy. These are weird times. The head of a state of 17-million people comes to a mighty land of 200-million and is treated like a conquering hero; the man whose name was once a dirty word in the international Communist lexicon gets a build - up such as no foreigner has ever received. Thr crowds gathering to see him today, in Leningrad, are friendly but also intensely curious, for to them he dramatized the big change in Russia - and Tito is apparently confident that this will be understood in the United States.

That is Dan Schorr's report to us on the Tito visit to Moscow.

This is Charles Collingwood, sitting in for Ed Murrow. I'll be back in a moment with the Word for Today. But first, here is Ted Pearson.

PEARSON: COMMERCIAL

COLLINGWOOD: The foreign aid program is facing a tough uphill fight. Henry Ford the Second once said, "It seems to me that we want to stand for steadfastness and courage and constructive imagination in our approach toa world problems. If we want our influence in the world to be as strong as it should be," he said, "we need only to think and act as befits our strength."

This is Charles Collingwood for Ed Murrow, saying goodnight and good luck.

Edward R. Murrow . Fri., June 8, 1956

This is the news:

President Eisenhower entered Walter Reed Hospital today for treatment of an intestinal disorder. For the latest on the President's condition, we switch now to Washington and Bill Downs.

Downs to run approx four minutes, returning on cue "--to Ed Murrow in New York."

Here in New York, the Stock Market reacted with a selling wave that drove prices down 2 to 7 dollars a share. A rally marked the last half-hour of trading.

In London, word of the President's illness swept domestic news stories off the front pages of the evening newspapers.

In Paris, former President Truman said, "I am very sorry to hear this news. I do not want anything to happen to the President."

The text of the letter Soviet Premier Bulganin sent to President Eisenhower earlier this week (WAS BROADCAST TONIGHT BY THE MOSCOW RADIO.) ~~has now been made public.~~ As predicted, THE LETTER ~~it~~ calls on the United States to match Russia's [redacted] move in cutting its armed forces. Bulganin said that [redacted] in demobilizing 63 divisions and separate brigades, including three air divisions, Russia would be [redacted] disbanding 30-thousand troops in East Germany. He said that if American, British and French forces in Germany were ~~similarly~~ also reduced, it would "unquestionably prepare the ground for more decisive steps---for one thing, an agreement on the evacuation of foreign armed forces from the territory of Germany." The Bulganin letter states that, in accordance with the recent Russian decision to demobilize a million, 200-thousand men, the Soviet Union will also make comparable reductions in military spending and armaments. Bulganin said, "It is hard to count on the talks in the United Nations leading, in the near future, to any concrete results in the sphere of disarmament." However, Bulganin said, if every state should take concrete measures to reduce armaments, such steps "would unquestionably facilitate a further lessening of international tensions."

He argued that this, in turn, "would lead to the establishment of more favorable conditions for putting through an all-embracing disarmament program." In this respect, Bulganin said, "the example of the great powers would be of decisive significance." It became known today that messages... similar to this one to President Eisenhower....have also been delivered to Great Britain, West Germany, Italy and France.

The House voted today to leave the question of continuing American aid to Yugoslavia up to the President. In his foreign aid program, Mr. Eisenhower asked for 30-million dollars in economic aid to Yugoslavia, plus a larger, undisclosed amount for military assistance. The House Foreign Affairs Committee has already cut the 30-million for economic aid in half. Representative Edna Kelly of New York offered an amendment today to cut off all aid to Yugoslavia, in view of Marshal Tito's reconciliation with Russia. On a vote of 123 to 95, the amendment was changed so aid can be continued, if the President feels that Yugoslavia is still an "independont" state, not under Soviet control. The amendment was then approved in its new form, 183 to 3. Yesterday, the House refused to restore any of the billion, 109-million-dollar cut voted by the Foreign Affairs Committee in the over-all foreign aid program. Final House action on the measure is expected on Monday.

The House Veterans Committee approved a bill today to increase veterans benefits. One provision would give all needy veterans, 65 or older, a general pension of 105 dollars a month. Another provision would increase all compensation payments for death or service-connected disability by 10 to 18 percent. It was estimated that if the bill becomes law, the additional cost to the government in the first year would be in the neighborhood of 1-billion, 400-million dollars. After the first year, the cost would [redacted] increase.

Secretary of [redacted] Agriculture Benson said today that soil bank payments will be made this year on basic crop acreages damaged by drought or other natural causes. ~~This is a reversal of policy. Benson had announced that "drought relief" payments would not be made under the soil bank program. He said today that these payments will be smaller than those allowed for land farmers take out of basic crop production.~~

~~In Paris, French Premier Mollet won two votes of confidence today in the General Assembly. Both votes concerned Mollet's proposals for increasing old age pensions.~~

~~The Moscow radio confirmed today that the new Soviet foreign minister... Dimitri Shepilov... is going to visit Egypt. The visit, at the invitation of the Egyptian government, is expected to take place later this month.~~

Edward R. Murrow: June 8, 1956. 7.45 p.m.

~~Anyone who reads the full transcript of President Eisenhower's news conferences knows that he speaks with unusual freedom for a President, and earnestly tries to answer any question asked. This has great advantages to him and to the public, but it is not altogether without dangers. Things sometimes are said without due consideration of their effect.~~

The White House last night made one of its rare corrections of a statement by the President. It was called "a clarification" of what the President had said Wednesday in discussing neutrals. In the news conference the President had gone out of his way to speak understandingly of neutralism. This is a fairly recent feature in Administration policy, and is a phase in our adjustment to the new direction of Soviet diplomacy.

The "clarification" did not retreat from the position Mr. Eisenhower took up on neutrals. But he had said something about non-neutrals, about members of alliances. And this shook up the embassies of countries with whom we have security pacts. "If a nation has announced its military association with another country" the President said, "things could happen to it - difficulties along its border - and people would say: 'Good enough for it - they asked for it.'"

This sounded like an admission that a country making a military alliance with us increased, rather than reduced, its danger. That set White House telephones ringing with disturbed inquiries as to what the President meant. The "clarification" was the result. It closed with the statement that the President "does not believe that association for mutual security with the United States will involve any country in added danger, but, on the contrary, will provide added security." It added that some great powers - not the United States - have shown aggressive dispositions, and that military association with them would lead to difficulties. In other words, the President was represented as meaning that while our military allies are safer because of their alliance with us, the Allies of the Soviet Union and Red China are not. But the significant thing about the correction is that it left what Mr. Eisenhower said about neutrality in full effect.

The new attitude toward neutrality was ~~stated by Secretary Dulles~~ while he was in ~~Indonesia recently~~, and again on his ~~return from the Far~~ East. "The ~~United States~~", he said, ~~"does not seek ties of mutual defense~~ with any country whatsoever ~~unless that country believes that this application~~ of the principle ~~of collective security will better assure its independence.~~"

Vice President Nixon, in a commencement address yesterday, said that if our primary concern abroad appeared to be military hardware - that was his phrase - we might find ourselves isolated. "Of this we can be sure" he declared", the uncommitted nations are not going to be frightened into alliances with the West by military power, nor can their allegiance be purchased by dollars."

We have just had the president of the second largest neutral country as a national guest - Sukarno of Indonesia - and the prime minister of the largest - Nehru of India - is coming early next month. We value the friendship of both countries and think we deserve it. But we are troubled in trying to understand neutralism by what Tito of Yugoslavia is doing in Moscow. He has gone a long way toward a full accord with the Kremlin. If we and our allies cut off our aid altogether, he will inevitably be pushed the rest of the way, and will be lost to neutralism altogether. We don't really know how much of the way the rest of the way really is. The House today gave the President a directive, he is to decide whether Tito has lost his independence. If he has, the aid is to end. That is reasonable.

We also don't know just what is happening to Nasser of Egypt, who also is edging closer to the Kremlin. But if both Tito and Nasser should be abandoned to Moscow, the West stands to lose its leading role in the Middle East, which could be very costly indeed.

The emotional response to Tito in some circles in Washington is to cut him off. The President has stated that his case has to be re-appraised. But it is safe to say that in the re-appraisal more than emotion will be consulted. That is what the policy of "understanding neutralism" promises.

Word for Today

There is a matter of point of view, in understanding countries that want to be neutral. In 1915, when the United States was disinclined to take sides, Woodrow Wilson could go so far as to say, "The basis of neutrality is not indifference. It is not self-interest. The basis of neutrality is sympathy for mankind. It is impartiality of spirit."

Goodnight and good luck!

CBS RADIO DIVISION

EDWARD R. MURROW

Friday, June 8, 1956
7:45-8:00 p.m.

MURROW: This is the news: President Eisenhower entered Walter Reed Hospital today for treatment of an intestional disorder. For thelatest on the President's condition we switch now to Washington and Bill Downs.

DOWNS: President Eisenhower tonight faces the possibility of major surgery to correct a partial blockage of the intestine. His doctors now are in consultation and the decision on whether or not to operate may come later tonight or in the morning. The latest word is that Mr. Eisenhower is resting comfortably in Walter Reed Hospital. As we both saw at the White House photographers' dinner last night, Ed, the President was having a whale of a time and he looked great. Comedian, Bob Hope, kidded him about himsgolf and he drew the biggest laugh when Hope quipped that Kefauver is traveling so much that you can't tell whether he wants to be President or Secretary of State. Mr. Eisenhower gave a hearty wave when he left the dinner at about 11:00p.m., but an hour-and-a-half later, Mrs. Eisenhower called Dr. Howard Snyder and said that her husband felt stomach discomfort. Thinking it indigestion, Mr. Eisenhower has suffered before, Dr. Snyder prescribed milk of magnesia. Some forty-five minutes later Mrs. Eisenhower called the doctor again and the physician immediately went to the White House to see by the Chief Executive's bedside.

Without drugs or pain-killers, Mr. Eisenhower catnapped during the rest of the night. He was given an intravenous injection of a sugar solution to give him extra strength without taxing his digestive system. There was some pain and vomiting. White House news secretary James Hagerty announced at eight o'clock this morning that the President had suffered an upset stomach and a headache and was cancelling his appointments for the rest of the day. Hagerty added that it had nothing to do with the President's heart. Then came another series of bulletins and the doctors' decision to take Mr. Eisenhower to the hospital as a precautionary measure. CBS News correspondent George Herman saw the President at one-forty this afternoon as he was carried into Walter Reed Hospital and said that he looked like a sick man and it is to be recalled that "old soldier" Eisenhower abhors stretchers and ambulances, but both were used today.

The seriousness of the President's condition became evident when Major John Eisenhower left his post at Fort Belmore (?), Virginia, some twenty-five miles south of Washington, to join his mother at the hospital. The President's brother, Dr. Milton Eisenhower, also arrived from Pennsylvania State University. (correction by speaker) Then begin ... began the series of tests, - electrocardiographs and X-rays. The diagnosis was ileitis, an inflammation of the intestine, suffered by the President before. The X-rays showed a partial blockage of the intestine, a condition often corrected by surgery. The most cheering news was that the President's heart was not affected, although the condition of the heart will have to be considered in event surgery is necessary. News secretary Hagerty later in the afternoon admitted that the President may have to be operated on. This decision will be made by some of the nation's top surgeons. They are: Dr. John Lyons, of Washington; Dr. Brian Blades, Professor of Surgery at the George Washington University here, and Dr. Isador Ravdin, Professor of Surgery at the University of Pennsylvania Medical School in Philadelphia. Also summoned in the consultation is Dr. Paul Dudley White, Mr. Eisenhower's heart specialist, and here by recording is news secretary Jim Hagerty, reporting on the President's condition this afternoon.

